PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION.

THE first republication, nearly twenty years ago, of the United States Supreme Court Reports in the Lawyers' Edition, was an event of public importance. It has resulted, not merely in the increase, but in the literal multiplication, of the number of lawyers and judges who own and use this great series of decisions. It has, therefore, materially extended the influence of those decisions upon the general jurisprudence of the country. Now the inclusion of Rose's Notes obviously adds great value to these reports.

At the end of each volume of reports, several of which are bound in every book of this set, will be found Rose's Notes for that volume. These volumes are separated by colored sheets.

REPORTS

OF

THE

IN FEBRUARY TERM, 1809.

VOL. V.

BY WILLIAM CRANCH,

Chief Judge of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia.

Potius ignoratio juris litigiosa est, quam scientia.

CIC. DE LEGIBUS, DIAL. 1.

Supreme Court of the United States.

FEBRUARY TERM, 1809.

THE UNITED STATES v. WEEKS.

A writ of error does not lie directly from the Supreme Court of the United States to the District Court of the District of Maine, although the latter has all the original jurisdiction of a circuit court.

THE writ of error in this case was dismissed by the assent of the Attorney General, it having been issued from this court directly to the District Court for Maine district; whereas by the 10th sect. of the judiciary act of 1789 (vol. 1, p. 55), writs of error lie from decisions in that court to the Circuit Court of Massachusetts in the same manner as from other district courts to their respective circuit courts; notwithstanding that the District Court of Maine has all the original jurisdiction of a circuit court.

CHARLES ALEXANDER
v.
THE MAYOR AND COMMONALTY OF ALEXANDRIA.

The corporation of Alexandria has power to tax the lots and lands of non-residents. It is not necessary that the lots should be half-acre lots.
Those taxes cannot be recovered by motion, unless in the case of a person holding land, who has no other property in the town.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, to reverse a judgment of that court rendered against the plaintiff in error on motion, for taxes due to the defendant in error for paving the streets in Alexandria.

2*] *A bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiff below produced and read to the court the following acts of the general assembly of Virginia, viz., "An act for incorporating the town of Alexandria in the county of Fairfax, and the town of Winchester in the county of Frederick," passed October 4th, 1779, by which it is enacted that "The mayor, recorder, aldermen and common councilmen shall have power to erect and repair workhouses, houses of correction, and prisons and other public buildings for the benefit of the said town; and to make by-laws and ordinances for the regulation and good government of the said town," not repugnant, &c. ("and to assess the inhabitants for the charge of repairing the streets and highways,) to be observed and performed by all manner of persons residing within the same, under reasonable penalties and forfeitures, to be levied by distress and sale of the goods of the offenders for the public benefit of the said town."

Also the act of 1786, "To extend the limits of the town of Alexandria," by which it is enacted that the limits of that town "shall extend to and include as well the lots formerly composing the said town as those adjoining thereto which have been and are improved."

Also the act of December 16th, 1796, "Concerning the town of Alexandria," by which it is enacted "That it shall and may be lawful for the mayor and commonalty of the town of Alexandria to recover of and from all and every person or persons holding land within the limits of the said town, and who have no other property within the said town on which the taxes or assessments imposed on such property for paving the streets therein can be levied, the amount of such taxes or assessments, by motion in the court of the county or corporation where such person or persons reside; provided that such person or persons have ten days' previous notice of such motion, and the amount of the taxes or assessments due from him, her or them. And provided also that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to empower the court to give judgment against any person or persons residing out of the limits of the corporation *of Alexandria, and owning [*3 ground therein, having no house on it, where the service (to compensate which the tax or assessment has been or may be imposed) has been or may be performed before the last day of February, 1797; but for the collection of such taxes, the same means may be used which would have been lawful before the passage of this act."

Also the act of 13th of December, 1796, "Adding to the town of Alexandria certain lots contiguous thereto, and for other purposes therein mentioned," the preamble of which recites, that "Whereas several additions of lots contiguous to the town of Alexandria have been laid off by the proprietors of the land, in lots of half an acre each, extending to the north, to a range of lots upon the north side of a street called Montgomery; upon the south, to the line of the District of Columbia; upon the west, to a range of lots upon the west side of West street; and upon the east, to the river Potomac; that many of the lots in these additions have already been built upon, and many more will soon be improved; and whereas it has been represented to the general assembly that the inhabitants, residing on the said lots, are not subject to the regulations made and established for the orderly government of the town, and for the preservation of the health of the inhabitants, by the prevention and removal of nuisances, upon which their prosperity and well being do very much depend,"

Be it therefore enacted, that each and every lot or part of a lot within the limits aforesaid, on which at this time is built a dwelling house of at least sixteen feet square, or equal thereto in size, with a brick or stone chimney, and that each and every lot within said limits which shall hereafter be built upon, shall be incorporated with the said town of Alexandria, and be considered as part thereof."

Also an act "Extending the jurisdiction of the mayor and commonalty of the town of Alexandria, and for other purposes," the preamble whereof recites, that "Whereas by an act of assembly passed in the year 1796, entitled, an act adding to the town of Alexandria certain lots contiguous thereto, and for other purposes 4] therein mentioned, *it is enacted that certain improved lots, and all others as they become so improved, within the bounds in the said act mentioned, be added to, and made part of, the said town of Alexandria, thereby leaving out of the jurisdiction of the mayor and commonalty of the said town, the unimproved lots within the limits aforesaid, as long as they shall so remain unimproved; by which means the prosperity of the said town is in a great degree prevented, Sect. 1. "Be it therefore enacted, That the unimproved lots within the limits aforesaid shall be and are hereby incorporated with and considered as a part of the said town of Alexandria, and subject to the same regulations as the other parts thereof.

Sect. 2. "The mayor and commonalty of the said town are hereby authorized and empowered, whenever they may deem it proper, to open, extend, regulate, pave and improve the streets of the said town; provided, however, that they shall make to every person or persons injured by the extension of any of the said streets, such compensation, out of the funds of the corporation, as to the said mayor and commonalty shall appear to be just."

The plaintiffs produced also the necessary by-laws and documents to show the regularity and amount of the assessment.

On the part of the defendant it was proved that he never was an inhabitant of the town of Alexandria—that the property assessed was not within the original limits of the town, but lies within the limits described by the act "Adding to the town of Alexandria certain lots contiguous thereto, and for other purposes."

It was not proved that the defendant had ever laid off any part of the property into lots of half an acre each, or in any other manner, or that he had ever built any dwelling house thereon. But it was proved that always after the assessment the defendant had personal property 5] within the town, on which *the assessments could have been levied (but it did not appear that the personal property had been on any of the lots assessed); and that the sergeant of the town informed the mayor and common council that he could make distress on the defendant's personal property in the town of Alexandria, for the assessments.

The property assessed was part of a tract of land which the defendant holds in the neighborhood of the town. The commissioner of the streets of the town had been directed by the mayor to make a plan of the town, and had applied to the defendant to know whether he did not wish to have the plan extended on his land which lay adjoining the town on the north, to which the defendant replied that he wished to have four streets and four ranges of squares laid off through his land; and being requested to name the streets, he called them Pendleton, Wythe, Madison and Montgomery, by which names they were designated on the plan; and the defendant had sold or let lots agreeably to the plan, and designated as bounded by those streets. Some of those streets were actually laid out, and the corners designated by stakes and stones at the request of individuals. On the plan the defendant did not designate any smaller quantity of ground than regular squares of two acres each, agreeably to the manner in which the town was laid off by the act for establishing the same.

The property assessed laid within the four new ranges of squares above mentioned, and the defendant had by several deeds sold and conveyed several squares and parcels of land less than two acres within those four ranges of squares.

C. Simms, for plaintiff in error, contended,

1st. That the land was not liable to be taxed until it was laid off into half-acre lots, and that it had never been so laid off, although it had been laid off into two-acre squares.

2d. That the corporation had power to assess inhabitants only; and,

*3d. That there cannot be a judgment upon [6 motion, because there was always personal property of Mr. Alexander in the town which might have been distrained for the taxes.

Swann, contra.

The corporation has power to make all by-laws for the good government of the town, and not repugnant to the general laws of the state. This included the power to order and provide for the pavement of the streets, and to raise taxes for that purpose, by assessments on the persons and property within the town.

The acts of the 13th and 16th December, 1796, clearly recognize the power to tax the property of non-residents.

It was unnecessary to lay out the half-acre lots. The squares were regularly divided into four lots each by ideal lines.

The mode of collecting the taxes by distress and sale of personal property, was only a cumulative remedy. The corporation was not bound to resort to it. It was a more severe and harsh manner of proceeding than that by notice and motion, especially as the principal object of both parties was to try the right of the corporation to tax the property.

February 8. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, as follows, viz.:

In the proceedings in this cause two errors are assigned by the plaintiff.

1st. That the corporation had no power to assess the tax for which the judgment was rendered.

2d. That the judgment is irregular, because rendered on motion.

*Both these points are to be decided by [7 the several acts of the legislature of Virginia respecting the town of Alexandria.

In support of the first it is contended,

1st. That the corporation has no power to tax property not belonging to an inhabitant of the town; and Charles Alexander was not an inhabitant.

2d. That the property, on which this tax was assessed, was not within the corporation.

The words of the act of 1779, which is the first act shown to the court that confers the power of taxation, are these: "The mayor, recorder, aldermen and common councilmen shall have power to erect and repair workhouses, houses of correction and prisons, or other public buildings, for the benefit of the said town; and to make by-laws and ordinances for the regulation and good government of the said town; provided such by-laws or ordinances shall not be repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the laws and constitution of this commonwealth, and to assess the inhabitants for the charge of repairing the streets and highways."

For the plaintiff it is contended that the power of taxation, here given, is, in terms, confined to assessments made on the inhabitants. On the part of the defendants it is urged that the express power to assess the inhabitants is for the sole purpose of improving their streets, and that an express power is also given to make expensive establishments, the means of erecting which could be furnished only by taxes; that the power to make by-laws must therefore necessarily be construed to involve the power of taxing, at least for these objects.

Without deciding this question as depending merely on the original law, it is to be observed that acts in pari materia are to be construed together as forming one act. If in a subsequent clause of the same act provisions are introduced 8] which show *the sense in which the legislature employed doubtful phrases previously used, that sense is to be adopted in construing those phrases. Consequently, if a subsequent act on the same subject affords complete demonstration of the legislative sense of its own language, the rule which has been stated, requiring that the subsequent should be incorporated into the foregoing act, is a direction to courts in expounding the provisions of the law.

The act of the 16th of December, 1796, contains this clause: "It shall and may be lawful for the mayor and commonalty of the town of Alexandria to recover, of and from all and every person or persons holding land within the limits of the said town, and who have no other property within the said town on which the taxes or assessments imposed on such property for paving the streets therein can be levied, the amount of such taxes or assessments, by motion in the court of the county or corporation where such person or persons reside."

This clause most obviously contemplates a full right to assess taxes on property lying within the town and belonging to non-residents; for it gives a right to recover such assessment in the court of any county or corporation in which the owner of such property may reside. It is either a legislative exposition of a power formerly granted, or the grant of a new power.

If the words of the enacting clause could admit of doubt, the proviso would remove that doubt. It is that the clause which has been recited should not "be so construed as to empower the court to give judgment against any person or persons residing out of the limits of the corporation of Alexandria, and owning ground therein, having no house on it, where the service, to compensate which the tax or assessment has been or may be imposed, has been or may be performed before the last day of February, 1797; but for the collection of such tax the same means may be used which would have been lawful before the passage of this act."

*This proviso shows, as clearly as words [9 can show, the sense of the legislature in favor of taxing the land of non-residents.

The same act appears to the court to remove any doubt, which might otherwise exist, respecting the second branch of this question.

Upon a critical examination of the act of the 13th of December, 1796, the court would feel much difficulty in declaring that it comprehended in the corporation of Alexandria only that ground which was actually divided into half-acre lots, and the court would be the less inclined to take this distinction, because no inducement for making it is to be found in the nature of the thing, or could have existed with the legislature.

The preamble states the lots, represented as contiguous to the town of Alexandria, to have been laid off by the proprietors, in lots of half an acre each, within certain limits which are described by the law. The enacting clause drops the quantity of which a lot is to consist, and declares that every lot, or part of a lot, within the limits described, which had been or should be improved, should be made part of the town of Alexandria. The act of 1798 annexes to the town all the unimproved lots within those limits. The case finds that the property on which the tax for which the judgment is rendered was imposed, is within those limits, and was laid off as part of the town in squares of two acres, but these squares were not actually subdivided into half-acre lots.

The term half-acre used in the preamble of the act of 1796 is a description of a circumstance probably contained in the representation on which the law was founded. But it is impossible to consider that part of the representation as material to the law. If the squares were regularly laid out, the subdivisions of those squares were unimportant, for that subdivision would always depend on the caprice of purchasers and sellers. Lots and parts of lots might *be separated, or annexed to each [10 other, at will. The enacting clause, therefore, of the first act, comprehends every lot, or part of a lot, within the described limits, which had been or should be improved; and the enacting clause of the act of 1798 comprehends every lot within those limits. That a square comprehended in those limits, laid off as part of the town, and containing precisely four half-acre lots, should be considered as excluded from the town, and not liable to taxation for the improvement of the streets, for the single reason that the proprietor had not marked thereon the lines of subdivision, would not be readily conceded.

But if a doubt respecting the sense of the legislature could otherwise be entertained, that doubt is removed by the act of the 16th of December, 1796, already recited, which particularly respects the power of taxation, and gives the remedy by motion.

That act drops the term "lot," and uses the term "land." It authorizes the corporation to recover by motion against any person "holding land within the limits of the town," "the taxes or assessments imposed thereon." The proviso, which has been also recited, uses the term "ground," and considers every person owning ground within those limits as liable to be taxed. The 3d section of the same act declares, "that when the proprietor of any lot or ground within the said town shall fail to fill up any pond of water, or remove any nusiance," as directed by the corporation, the mayor and commonalty may exercise corporate powers in the case. If the squares in question do not consist of lots, because the subdivisions have not been actually marked, yet they consist of land, they consist of ground, and being within the limits of the town, they are, in the opinion of the court, within the corporation, and subject to taxation.

But the remedy in the actual case is not by motion. The act affording this remedy gives it only in a specified case. It is given only in the case of "a person or persons holding land 11] within the limits of *the said town, and who have no other property within the said town." This is not, as has been said, a direction to the officer of the corporation, but is a description of the precise case in which alone the remedy by motion is allowed. It being found that Charles Alexander had property in the town from which the officer could have levied the tax assessed on him, a motion for that tax was not sustainable. If the corporation did not choose to risk levying the tax by seizure, they might have instituted a suit to determine their right.

This court is unanimously of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in giving judgment for the plaintiff on motion, and therefore directs that the said judgment be reversed and annulled.

HENDERSON v. MOORE.

The refusal of the court below to grant a new trial is not error.

Upon the plea of payment to an action of debt upon a bond conditioned to pay 500 dollars, evidence may be received of the payment of a smaller sum with an acknowledgment by the plaintiff that it was in full of all demands; and from such evidence, if uncontradicted, the jury may and ought to infer payment of the whole.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia.

On the plea of payment to an action of debt upon a bond, for 500 dollars, dated in 1781, the defendant offered evidence to prove that in the year 1797 the plaintiff acknowledged that he had received of the money of the defendant to the amount of about 1,000 dollars, of one Willoughby Tibbs, out of the amount of a decree which the defendant had obtained against him for 3,000 dollars, and that the money which he so received was in full of all his claims against the defendant, the plaintiff having paid for the defendant several sums of money. There was no settlement made, nor any receipt given. "Whereupon the plaintiff prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if from the evidence they should be satisfied that the bond had not been fully paid off, no declaration of the plaintiff's 'that his claims against the defendant were all satisfied' would be a bar to his recovery in 12] this action; which instruction *the court refused to give as prayed, but directed the jury that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the defendant, in the year of 1797, paid the plaintiff a sum of money less than the amount mentioned in the condition of the bond, which the plaintiff at that time acknowledged to be in full satisfaction of all his claims against the defendant, such payment and such acknowledgment are competent evidence upon the plea of payment, and that the jury may and ought to presume therefrom that the whole sum mentioned in the condition of the said bond has been paid to the plaintiff, unless such presumption be repelled by other evidence in the cause; to which refusal and instruction the plaintiff excepted."

The verdict being for the defendant, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court for a new trial, and grounded his motion upon sundry affidavits tending to prove that the whole amount of the bond remained due to the plaintiff, and that he was surprised by unexpected testimony at the trial. But the court refused to grant a new trial.

Two errors were assigned.

1. That the court below refused a new trial.

2. That the court ought to have given the instruction to the jury as prayed by the plaintiff; and ought not to have given the direction which they did.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., said that this court had decided at the last term, that a refusal by the court below to grant a new trial was not error.

The case being submitted upon the other point, without argument,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court,

That there was no error in the opinion of the court below. A part of the money due on the bond *might have been paid before; and [13 such an acknowledgment, upon receipt of a sum smaller than the amount of the condition of the bond, was good evidence upon the plea of payment.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

COOKE AND OTHERS v. WOODROW.

In an action of trover, if the judgment below be in favor of the original defendant, the value of the matter in dispute upon the writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States, is the sum claimed as damages in the declaration. Due diligence must be used to obtain the testimony of the subscribing witness.

If inquiry be made at the place where the witness was last heard of, and he cannot be found, evidence of his handwriting may be admitted.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, in an action of trover brought by the plaintiffs in error for sundry household goods.

A bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiffs on the trial produced in evidence to support their title to the goods, a certain paper writing signed by one John Withers, to which one John Pierson had subscribed his name as a witness, and offered parol evidence to prove that the subscribing witness "had upwards of a year ago left the District of Columbia, and that before he left the said district he declared that he should go to the northward, that is to say, to Philadelphia or New York, and said he had a wife in New York. That the said subscribing witness went from the said district to Norfolk, and that when he got there he declared that he should go on further to the south, but where was not known, and that he has not been heard of by the witness for the last twelve months. It appeared that a subpœna had been issued in this case, for the said subscribing witness, directed to the marshal of the District of Columbia, but he could not be found in the said district by the said marshal. The plaintiff then offered to prove the handwriting of the subscribing witness and of the said John Withers to the said writing, but the court refused to permit the plaintiffs to produce evidence of the handwriting of the said subscribing witness, and refused to permit the plaintiffs to prove the handwriting of the said John Withers, otherwise than by the testimony of the said 14] *subscribing witness; to which refusal the plaintiffs excepted."

C. Simms, for the plaintiffs in error, suggested that this court must be satisfied by evidence (other than the declaration) that the sum in demand exceeded 100 dollars, exclusive of costs; and cited the rule made in the case of Course v. Stead's Executors (ante, vol. 1, p. 17).

But MARSHALL, Ch. J., said, that that rule applied only to cases where the property itself (and not damages) was the matter in dispute—such as actions of detinue, &c.

If the judgment below be for the plaintiff, that judgment ascertains the value of the matter in dispute; but where the judgment below is rendered for the defendant, this court has not, by any rule or practice, fixed the mode of ascertaining that value.

The point arising upon the bill of exceptions was submitted without argument.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case as it appeared in the bill of exceptions, observed, That the court had some difficulty upon the point. The general rule of evidence is, that the best evidence must be produced which the nature of the case admits, and which is in the power of the party. In consequence of that rule, the testimony of the subscribing witness must be had if possible. But if it appear that the testimony of the subscribing witness cannot be had, the next best evidence is proof of his handwriting. In the present case it does not appear to the court that the testimony of the subscribing witness could not have been obtained if proper diligence had been used for that purpose. It does not appear that the witness had ever left Norfolk. It is not stated that any inquiry concerning him had been made there. If such inquiry had been made, and he could not be found, evidence of his handwriting might have been permitted. But 15] *as the case appears in the bill of exceptions, the court below has not erred.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

MANDEVILLE AND JAMESSON v. WILSON.

Amendments are within the discretion of the court below.

Quære, whether the court ought to permit amendments after judgment upon demurrer.

In the statute of limitations, the exception in favor of merchants' accounts applies as well to actions of assumpsit as to actions of account.

It extends to all accounts current which concern the trade of merchandise.

An account closed, by the cessation of dealings between the parties, is not an account stated.

It is not necessary that any of the items should have been charged within the five years, nor that the declaration should aver the money to be due upon an open account between merchants.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of assumpsit brought by the defendant in error for goods sold and delivered, and for the hire of a slave.

The defendants below pleaded non assumpserunt, and the statute of limitations.

To the latter plea the plaintiff replied, "that the said money in the several promises and undertakings aforesaid above mentioned in the declaration, at the time of the making of the promises and undertakings aforesaid, became due and payable on an account current of trade and merchandise had between the said plaintiff and the said defendants as merchants, and wholly concerned the trade of merchandise, to-wit, at Alexandria aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and this he is ready to verify."

To which the defendants rejoined, "that in the month of January, 1799, the partnership of Mandeville and Jamesson was dissolved, and public notice given of such dissolution, of which the said plaintiff had a knowledge at the time, and that at the time of the said dissolution of the partnership aforesaid, all accounts between the said plaintiff and the said Mandeville and Jamesson ceased, and since which time no accounts have existed, or been continued, between the plaintiff and the said defendants, which the said defendants are ready to verify."

The plaintiff surrejoined, "that the goods, wares *and merchandise in the said dec- [16 laration mentioned, were by the said plaintiff sold and delivered to the said defendants, and the said negro in the said declaration mentioned was hired by the plaintiff to the defendants before the month of January, in the year 1799, the time when the said defendants in their said rejoinder state their said copartnership was dissolved, and this the plaintiff is ready to verify."

To this surrejoinder the defendants demurred, and assigned for cause of demurrer, that "the surrejoinder is a departure in this, that it is no answer to the defendants' rejoinder."

Upon joinder in demurrer, the court below gave judgment for the plaintiff.

A bill of exceptions stated, that on the day on which the cause was called for trial, the court permitted the plaintiff to withdraw his general replication to the plea of the statute of limitations, and to file the above special replication. And that after the court had given judgment upon the demurrer, it refused to permit the defendants to withdraw their demurrer, and their rejoinder, and to file a general rejoinder to the plaintiff's replication.

Youngs, for the plaintiffs in error.

1. The plaintiff below ought not to have been permitted to withdraw his general replication, and to reply specially.

LIVINGSTON, J. Is that a proper subject for a writ of error?

Youngs. There are other points; but I suppose it is good ground for a writ of error. It creates delay; and although amendments may be matter of discretion with the court, yet the court is bound to exercise its discretion soundly and legally; it is a discretion which this court will control.

2. The exception in the statute of limitations in favor of merchants' accounts, applies only 17] to accounts *current, where there have been mutual dealings, and where some of the items are more and some less than five years' standing. In such cases the last item shall draw all the rest out of the statute. But if all dealings between the parties have ceased for more than five years next before the commencement of the suit, the whole account is barred. An account which has ceased to run is an account closed. An account closed is an account stated; and it is expressly decided that an account stated is not excepted from the general operation of the statute. Besides, the exception of the statute is only in favor of actions of account, and not actions of assumpsit. (2 Ves. 400, Welford v. Liddel; 4 Mod. 105, Chievly v. Bond; 2 Saund. 124, Weber v. Tivill.)[1]

The replication is repugnant to the declaration; for money due for the hire of a negro cannot be "money due on an account current of trade and merchandise."

The declaration ought to have stated the money to be due upon such an account.

3. The court below ought to have permitted the defendant to withdraw his demurrer and his rejoinder, and rejoin generally to the replication

E. J. Lee, contra, having cited 3 Wooddeson, 83, 85, as to the principal question, was stopped by the court, as to the error alleged in the permission given by the court below to the plaintiff to amend before trial, and the refusal to allow the defendants after judgment upon the demurrer to withdraw it and take issue on the fact.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., observed that the permitting amendments is a matter of discretion. He did not mean to say that a court may in all cases 18] permit or *refuse amendments without control. A case may occur where it would be error in a court, after having allowed one party to amend, to refuse to suffer the other party to amend also before trial. But that is not this case. After the parties have gone to trial upon a set of pleadings, and the judgment has been pronounced, it may be doubted whether the court can permit the demurrer to be withdrawn. It would not be right in all cases, after the party had taken issue upon the law, and it has been decided against him, to suffer him also to take issue upon the fact. If it be permitted, it is a matter of great indulgence.

There is no ground for the objection taken to the declaration in this case, that it ought to have averred that the money was due on an account concerning the trade of merchandise.

A declaration need not set forth the circumstances which take the case out of the statute of limitations.

Youngs cited 6 T. R. 691, Holt v. Scholefield, to show that when general damages are given, if there be one bad count in the declaration, the court will arrest the judgment.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. But by the statute of jeofails in Virginia, under whose laws this case was tried, the judgment shall be rendered for the plaintiff, upon a general verdict, if there be one good count in the declaration.

On a subsequent day

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court,

That the exception in the statute applied to actions of assumpsit, as well as to actions of account. That it extended to all accounts current which concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant. That an account closed by the cessation of dealings between the parties is not an account *stated, [19 ed, and that it is not necessary that any of the items should come within the five years. That the replication was good, and not repugnant to the declaration; and that the rejoinder was bad.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

FAIRFAX'S EXECUTOR
v.
ANN FAIRFAX.

Upon the issue of plene administravit the jury must find specially the amount of assets in the hands of the executor, otherwise the court cannot render judgment upon the verdict.

If the defendant below intermarries after the judgment, and before the service of the writ of error, the service of the citation upon the husband is sufficient.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of assumpsit brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, as executor.

Upon the issues of non assumpsit and plene administravit, the jury found a general verdict, which was recorded in this form: "We of the jury find the issues for the plaintiff, and assess the damages to two hundred and twenty dollars and ninety-five cents." Upon which verdict the judgment of the court was "that the plaintiff recover against the defendant her damages aforesaid in form aforesaid assessed, and also her costs by her about her suit in this behalf expended, to be levied of the goods and chattels of the said Bryan Fairfax, deceased, at the time of his death, in the hands of the said defendant to be administered, if so much, &c., but if he hath not so much, then the costs aforesaid to be levied of the proper goods and chattels of the said defendant; and the said defendant in mercy," &c.

1.—But see Sergeant Williams's note to that case in his edition of Saunder's Reports. The statute of Virginia, so far as it relates to the questions in this case, is precisely like the British statute of 21 Jac. c. 16, s. 3.

The error relied upon by the plaintiff in error was, that the jury had not found the amount of assets in his hands to be administered.

Swann, for the plaintiff in error, having cited Esp. N. P. 263, and the case of Booth's Executors v. Armstrong (2 Wash. 301), was stopped by the court, who requested to hear Mr. E. J. Lee on the other side.

20*] E. J. Lee*, contra.

There was no necessity for the jury to find specially the amount of the assets, for if ever so small a sum had been found, the judgment would have been the same as if assets had been found to the whole amount of the plaintiff's claim. The sum found by the jury would not alter the judgment. It would still have been for the whole debt de bonis testatoris si, &c., and si non, then the costs de bonis propriis.

But here the jury have in substance found that the defendant had assets more than sufficient to satisfy the debt due to the plaintiff; for that is the allegation of the plaintiff in her replication, and the jury have found the issue for the plaintiff upon that replication.

It is not more necessary to find specially upon this issue than upon non assumpsit or nil debet.

There is a difference between this case and that of Booth's Executors v. Armstrong (2 Wash. 301), for there the finding was not, as here, generally, "we find the issues for the plaintiff;" but "we find for the plaintiff the debt in the declaration mentioned, and one penny damages." The finding there was special, and could not be construed to be a finding of the matter of the plaintiff's replication as the finding in the present case may and ought to be.

The cases cited to show that the amount of assets found could not alter the judgment were, 8 Co. 34, Mary Shipley's case; Cro. Eliz. 592, Waterhouse v. Woodstreet; Styles, 38, Gaudy v. Ingham; Freem. 351, Oxendan v. Hobdy; Bro. Execution, pl. 34, pl. 82; Godbolt, 178, Newman v. Babington; Cro. Car. 373, Dorchester v. Webb, Lex Test. 414.

February 21. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

21*] *The verdict ought to have found the amount of the assets in the hands of the defendant to be administered.

The cases cited to show that the judgment must be for the whole sum, if the verdict find any assets, have been overruled. This is declared by Lord Mansfield, in a case cited in Gwillim's edition of Bac. Abr. and the law is now well understood to be, that the executor is only liable for the amount of assets found by the jury. In Virginia the law has been so settled. The case cited from 2 Wash. Rep. is precisely in point. The counsel for the defendant in error attempted to show a distinction arising from the difference of form in which the verdicts were rendered. But the two verdicts appear to the court to be precisely alike in substance.

The defendant in error relies on the form of the issue. She contends that as the replication alleges that the defendant has assets more than sufficient to satisfy the debt, the finding of that issue for the plaintiff below, is in effect finding that the defendant has assets more than sufficient to satisfy the debt; and if so, it is wholly immaterial what the real amount of assets is. But if this were the issue, and the demand were 500 dollars, if the jury should find that the defendant had assets to the amount of 499 dollars, the judgment must be for the defendant.

But the law is not so. An executor is liable for the amount of assets in his hands, and not more.

The issue really is, whether the defendant has any, and what amount of assets in his hands.

*M'KEEN v. DELANCY'S LESSEE. [*22

Under the act of Pennsylvania of 1715, which requires a deed to be acknowledged before a justice of the peace of the county where the lands lie, it had been the long-established practice before the year 1775 to acknowledge deeds before a justice of the Supreme Court of the province of Pennsylvania. And although the act of 1715 does not authorize such a practice, yet as it has prevailed it is to be considered as a correct exposition of the statute.

Under the same statute, if a deed conveyed lands in several counties, and was recorded in one of those counties, an exemplification of it was good evidence as to the lands in the other counties.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, in an action of ejectment.

The only question was, whether the exemplification of a deed from Allen to Delancy, could be lawfully read in evidence at the trial.

This question arose upon the following case:

William Allen, on the 27th of December, 1771, being seized in fee of the land in controversy, lying in Northampton county, by deed of bargain and sale of that date, conveyed the same to James Delancy and Margaret, his wife, in fee. The deed also conveyed real estate in the counties of Philadelphia and Bucks, and was acknowledged by the bargainor in the city of Philadelphia, on the 7th of December, 1772, before John Lawrence, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the province of Pennsylvania, and recorded on the 11th of May, 1773, in the office of the recorder of deeds for the city and county of Philadelphia; but not recorded in the county of Northampton, nor in the county of Bucks, nor in any other county in Pennsylvania; offices for recording deeds being established in the said counties of Northamption and Bucks, according to law, from the date of the said deed to the present time.

The Circuit Court admitted the exemplification to be read in evidence; and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff below

Rodney*, Attorney-General for the [*23 plaintiff in error.

By the laws originally agreed upon and adopted by William Penn and his followers, before they left England, in May, 1682, section 20, 1.—Vide, 3 T. R. 688, 689, Harrison v. Beecles.

E. J. Lee had previously moved this court to quash the writ of error, because the citation was not served on Ann Fairfax, the defendant in error; but on her husband Charles I. Catlett, with whom she had intermarried since the judgment below.
But the court overruled the motion, saying,
That the act of Congress (vol. 1, p. 62, § 22), does not designate the person upon whom the citation shall be served, but only directs that the adverse party shall have at least thirty days' notice.
The citation served on the husband is well. The service is sufficient.

(Appendix to laws of Pennsylvania, p. 4), it was declared, that "to prevent frauds and vexations within the said province," "all conveyances of land made in the said province" "shall be enrolled or registered in the public enrollment office of the said province, within the space of two months next after the making thereof, else to be void in law." Deeds made out of the province were to be enrolled in like manner within six months.

This shows that it was the prevailing sentiment among them that means should be taken to prevent clandestine conveyances; and from thence it may be inferred that such was the intention and end of all their laws requiring the enrollment of deeds.

By the act of 1683, c. 79, (Appendix, p. 9), it is enacted, "that all deeds of sale, mortgages, settlements, conveyances (except leases for a year), shall be declared and acknowledged in open court."

In 1688, a temporary law, to continue one year only, confirmed deeds theretofore made and not properly recorded, and allowed twelve months for recording deeds made out of the province, and six months for those made in the province; otherwise they were to be void. The same act permits the recording of bills, bonds and specialties, for safe keeping, but expressly declares that such recording is not necessary as to those writings.

In 1693 it was enacted that deeds were good and valid, although never recorded; and it was declared that no deeds or other writings shall be required to be recorded; but that such deeds and writings as shall be enrolled or registered in the Roll's Office, and the exemplification of [*24 the records of the same, *in all courts of judicature, shall be allowed and judged as valid as the original.

Then came the act of 1715, c. 9, (Laws of Pennsylvania, p. 78), the first section of which enacts, "that there shall be an office of record in each county in this province, which shall be called and styled the office for recording of deeds," and that the recorder "shall record, in a fair and legible hand, all deeds and conveyances that shall be brought to him for that purpose, according to the true intent and meaning of this act." The 2d and 3d sections provide that all conveyances of land in the province "may be recorded in the said office," but before the same could be recorded they were to be acknowleged or proved "before one of the justices of the peace of the proper county or city where the lands lie."

The 4th section enacts, "that all deeds and conveyances made and granted out of this province, and brought hither and recorded in the county where the lands lie, (the execution thereof being first proved by the oath or affirmation of one or more of the witnesses thereunto, before one or more of the justices of the peace of this province," or before any mayor, &c., of the place where executed, certified, &c.) "shall be as valid as if the same had been made, acknowledged or proved in the proper county where the lands lie in this province."

The 5th section enacts, "that all deeds made, or to be made, and proved or acknowledged and recorded as aforesaid, which shall appear so to be, by indorsement made thereon, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, shall be of the same force and effect here, for the giving possession and seizin, and making good the title and assurance of the said lands, tenements and hereditaments, as deeds of feoffment with livery and seizin, or deeds enrolled in any of the King's courts of record at Westminster, are or shall be in the kingdom of Great Britain: and the copies or exemplifications of all deeds so enrolled, being examined by the recorder, and certified under the seal of the proper office (which the *recorder or [*25 keeper thereof is hereby required to affix thereto), shall be allowed in all courts where produced, and are hereby declared and enacted to be as good evidence, and as valid and effectual in law, as the original deeds themselves, or as bargains and sales enrolled in the said courts at Westminster, and copies thereof, can be, and that the same may be showed, pleaded and made use of accordingly.

The 6th section declares the force and effect of the words "grant, bargain and sell."

The 7th section declares the punishment for forging certificates of acknowledging and recording.

The 8th section enacts, "that no deed or mortgage, or defeasible deed in the nature of mortgages, hereafter to be made, shall be good or sufficient to convey or pass any freehold or inheritance, or to grant any estate therein for life, or years, unless such deed be acknowledged or proved, and recorded within six months after the date thereof, where such lands lie as herein before directed for other deeds."

The 9th and 10th sections prescribe the mode of acknowledging satisfaction of mortgages.

The 11th section appoints recorders for the respective counties of Philadelphia, Bucks and Chester, which were then the only counties in the province.

By this act no power was given to a judge of the Supreme Court. Indeed, no such court then existed. The Supreme Court was established by the act of May 22, 1722, section 11, but no such power is given thereby to the justices of that court.

The act of 1775 expressly gives the power to the justices of that court, from whence a strong inference is drawn that they had not the power before. The expressions of the second section of that act are, "that all such deeds and conveyances, which shall be made and executed out of this province, after the *publication of this [*26 act, and acknowledged or proved in manner as directed by the laws heretofore for that purpose made, or proved by one or more of the subscribing witnesses before any supreme judge of this province, shall be recorded," &c. It is clear from this mode of expression, that a deed acknowledged or proved before a supreme judge, was not acknowledged or proved in manner as directed by the laws therefore for that purpose made. Such an acknowledgment, therefore, prior to the year 1775, was not legal, and did not, under any existing law, authorize the recording of the deed; and the exemplification of a deed from the records, not legally recorded, cannot be evidence.

This deed was acknowledged before a supreme judge prior to the year 1775, and not before any justice of peace of the province.

Again, it is clear from the purview of the act of 1715, that the proper office for recording deeds of lands was the office in the county where the lands lie.

These lands lie in Northampton county, but the deed was recorded only in the office of the county of Philadelphia. This objection is as fatal as that respecting the acknowledgment.

Lewis, contra.

There was a Supreme Court in Pennsylvania long before the act of 1715. It is mentioned in the 9th section of the act of March 27, 1713, (c. 3.) where an appeal from the sentence of the Orphans' Court is given to the Supreme Court.

1. As to the place of record.

Part of the lands conveyed by this deed lie in the county of Philadelphia, in which county the deed was recorded. It was therefore within the strict letter of the law recorded in the county where the lands lie. It was not 27] necessary by the act that the *deed should be recorded in every county in which any part of the land should lie. It was sufficient if recorded in the county where any part of the lands lie.

But it was not necessary that it should be recorded in the county where the lands or any part of them lie.

The object of the act was not noticed but safe keeping of the deeds. It does not require that any deed should be recorded. It was intended merely for the benefit of the grantee, and for that purpose it was immaterial in what public office the deed was recorded. Before the act of 1715, the Roll's Office in Philadelphia was the only place of record. That act simply provided that there should be such an office in every county, to which people might with convenience resort to put their deeds on record for safe keeping.

By the first section of the law, the recorder in each county is bound to record all deeds which shall be brought to him for that purpose, whether the lands lie within or without the county. "The said office," in the second section, means either of the said offices. No time is limited within which the deed must be recorded.

The whole tenor of the act shows that the purpose of recording was merely for safe keeping.

Thus stood the law till the act of 1775 declared, that unless deeds and mortgages should be acknowledged, or proved and recorded, within a certain time, in the counties where the lands lie, such deeds or mortgages should be void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers.

The provisions of this act show that no such provisions existed before. The evil complained of in the preamble of the act, was the frauds upon creditors and subsequent purchasers by 28] means of secret deeds *and mortgages. This evil could not have existed if the object of the act of 1715 was to give notice.

The object of that act, therefore, was safe keeping. The recording or the omission to record the deed did not affect the title. It was therefore perfectly immaterial in which of the offices the deed should be recorded. It was perfectly optional with the grantee whether he would have his deed recorded at all; and if he did choose to have it recorded, it was equally optional with him in which of the offices it should be recorded.

2. As to the acknowledgment.

It had been the cotemporaneous and uniform practice from the year 1715 to the date of this deed, to acknowledge deeds before a judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. That practice had never been questioned. The grantor in the present deed was the chief justice of that court and had been so for 40 years before. He and the judge who received the acknowledgment must have been perfectly satisfied of the practice, and that it had been unquestioned. Judge Peters, who sat in the trial of this cause in the court below, stated, and the whole bar admitted, the practice to be so. No person could be better acquainted with this practice than Judge Peters, whose father was secretary of the land office, and who was himself a large landholder.

There never was a doubt suggested upon this subject until the present case. If the practice be now decided to be incorrect, it will cut deep into the titles of Pennsylvania.

LIVINGSTON, J. I doubt whether this court can take notice of such a practice unless it be spread upon the record by a bill of exceptions, or found by a special verdict. If we can, and if the practice be so, I think it puts an end to the question.

Lewis. The evidence of the practice was offered, not to the jury as a fact, but to the judge, to inform him what had been the construction uniformly put *upon the law by courts, [29 judges and legislators, and by the whole people of the state.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. I do not know how this court can take notice of it as a practice or custom, without the consent of the parties; but I consider it as an exposition or construction of the law. If decisions of the courts of Pennsylvania had been made upon the question, they might be produced. If no cases are reported, the court will take other information as to the construction given to the law by the courts of Pennsylvania.

If such have been the uniform decisions of their courts at the time, as there are no reports of cases, if the counsel agree as to the construction given by the courts, this court can receive it as evidence of those decisions. But if gentlemen differ in their statements, the court would not be willing to decide as to the credit to be given to the one statement or the other.

Ingersoll, for the plaintiff in error, said he could not admit any statement admitting that it had been the practice to admit in evidence exemplifications of deeds not recorded in the county where the lands lie.

Lewis named 27 cases in which he had been concerned as counsel, and in which such exemplifications had been used in evidence, and no objection ever taken.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. That part of the argument may be omitted for the present, and if the court should not be able to decide the case without evidence of the practice, we will decide whether we will hear the statements on that subject.

Lewis. Part of the lands lie in Philadelphia county, where the deed was recorded. An exemplification would be good evidence in a contest respecting those lands, and if good evidence for one purpose, it will be good as to the other. 30] *If the law authorizes a deed to be recorded in a particular office, an exemplification from that office is good evidence in all cases. It would have been good evidence in an action of covenant upon the deed; and there can be no difference in an action of ejectment. (Gilb. Ev. 97, 99, 100; 2 Vin. Abr. 598; 12 Vin. 105, 107; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 413.)

Ingersoll, in reply.

The common law did not require any deed to be recorded. Before the act of 1715, the English register acts, and the acts for enrollment of deeds, were well known in Pennsylvania: and they were for the purpose of notice. The evil to be remedied was the frequency of clandestine conveyances.

The 1st section of the act does not require the recorder to record "all deeds and convcyances which shall be brought to him for that purpose," but "all deeds and conveyances which shall be brought to him for that purpose according to the true intent and meaning of this act;" that is, all deeds and conveyances of land lying in his county.

The 2d and 3d sections require the acknowledgment or proof to be before one of the justices of the peace of the proper county or city where the lands lie. The power to certify acknowledgments was not given to a judge of the Supreme Court until 1775, when the express grant of the power was strong evidence that they did not already possess it.

There is no more reason that a foreign deed should be proved and recorded in the county where the lands lie than that a domestic deed should be so proved and recorded. Yet the 4th section of the act is explicit with regard to foreign deeds, that they shall be so proved and recorded; and in order to show that they meant the same thing in the case of domestic deeds, the legislature say that a foreign deed, so proved and recorded, shall be as valid "as if the same had been made, acknowledged, or proved, in the proper county where the lands lie;" thereby 31] *intimating that the acknowledgment or proof in the county where the lands lie was the proper mode in all other cases.

The 5th section immediately follows, and declares that all deeds "proved or acknowledged and recorded as aforesaid," shall transfer the possession, and that exemplifications thereof shall be evidence.

Here the words "as aforesaid" refer to the description last antecedent, that is, in the county where the lands lie. Again in the 8th section it is declared that no mortgage shall be good unless acknowledged or proved and recorded where the lands lie "as herein before directed for other deeds." This expression clearly shows that the legislature had before directed that other deeds should be recorded where the lands lie.

They had mentioned before but two other kinds of deeds, viz., foreign and domestic. With regard to foreign deeds they had been as explicit as in the case of mortgages; and if any doubt could be raised as to their expressions relative to domestic deeds, that doubt must be removed by the expressions in the 4th and 8th sections.

This case depends entirely on the acts of the legislature of Pennsylvania, respecting the registering of deeds.

The law of Pennsylvania, on this subject, had varied at different times; but as it stood in 1715, when the act passed which must decide this controversy, the recording of a deed was not necessary to its validity; but deeds might be enrolled, and an exemplification was testimony in all courts.

The act of 1715 established an office of record in *each county in which deeds were to [32 be recorded, and declared an exemplification from the record to be as good evidence as the original. This act, however, does not make the recording of a deed essential to its validity.

To entitle a deed to be recorded, the act requires that it shall be acknowledged or proved "before one of the justices of the peace of the proper county or city where the lands lie."

In this case the lands lie in different counties; and the deed was acknowledged before John Lawrence, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; and was recorded in the office for the city and county of Philadelphia, in which a part of the lands lie. The land, however, for which this suit was brought, lies in a different county.

The first question which presents itself in this cause is, was this deed properly proved?

Were this act of 1715 now, for the first time, to be construed, the opinion of this court would certainly be that the deed was not regularly proved. A justice of the Supreme Court would not be deemed a justice of the county, and the decision would be that the deed was not properly proved, and therefore not legally recorded.

But, in construing the statutes of a state on which land titles depend, infinite mischief would ensue, should this court observe a different rule from that which has been long established in the state; and in this case, the court cannot doubt that the courts of Pennsylvania consider a justice of the Supreme Court as within the description of the act.

It is of some weight that this deed was acknowledged by the chief justice, who certainly must have been acquainted with the construction given to the act, and that the acknowledgment was taken before another judge of the Supreme Court. It is also recollected *that [33 the gentlemen of the bar, who supported the conveyance, spoke positively as to the universal understanding of the state, on this point, and that those who controverted the usage on other points, did not controvert it on this. But what is decisive with the court is, that the judge who presides in the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, reports to us that this construction was universally received.

On this evidence the court yields the construction which would be put on the words of the act, to that which the courts of the state have put on it, and on which many titles may probably depend.

The next question is, was this deed recorded in such an office as to make the exemplification evidence?

Without reviewing all the arguments which have been urged from the bar, or all the sections of the act, it may be sufficient to observe, that this court is satisfied that, where a single tract of land is conveyed, the law requires the deed to be recorded in the office of the county in which the land lies; but if several tracts be conveyed, it appears to this court that neither the letter nor the spirit of the act requires that the deed should be recorded in each county.

It is material in the construction of this act, that the validity of the deed is not affected by omitting to record it. Though not recorded, it is still binding to every intent and purpose whatsoever. The only legal effect produced by recording it is its preservation, by making a copy equal to the original. The principle motive, then, for requiring that it should be proved before a justice of the particular county in which the land lies, and recorded in that county, is that which has been assigned at the bar. It is the additional security given by those provisions, that a deed, never executed, might not be imposed on the recorder. This object is as completely obtained by placing the deed on the records of that county in which 34] *one of the tracts of land lies, as it could be if the deed conveyed no other tract. The verity of the deed is as completely secured in the one case as in the other.

It appears to the court also to be within the letter of the law. This deed was unquestionably properly admitted to record in the office of the city and county of Philadelphia. It conveyed lands lying within that city and county, and, on any construction of the act, might be there recorded. The act then proceeds to say, "that the copies of all deeds, so enrolled, shall be allowed in all courts where produced, and are hereby declared and enacted to be as good evidence, and as valid and effectual in law as the original deeds themselves."

The whole deed, then, is evidence by the letter of the act. The whole is a copy from the record. If the validity of the conveyance depended on its being recorded in the county where the land lies, then a deed might be good as to one tract, and bad as to another. But the deed is valid, though not recorded; and the question is, whether the copy is evidence as to everything it contains. The execution of the deed is one entire thing, and is proved so as to admit the instrument to record. The copy, if true in part, is true in the whole; and if evidence in part, must, under the act, and on the general principle that it is the copy of a record, be evidence in the whole.

There is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court; and it is affirmed with costs.

JOHN AND JAMES TUCKER

v.

OXLEY, ASSIGNEE OF T. MOORE, A BANKRUPT.

Under the bankrupt law of the United States a joint debt may be set off against the separate claim of the assignee of one of the partners. But such offset could not have been made, at law, independent of the bankrupt law.

A joint debt may be proved under a separate commission, and a full dividend received. It is equity alone which can restrain the joint creditor from receiving his full dividend until the joint effects are exhausted.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, brought by Oxley, *assignee of Thomas [35 Moore, a bankrupt, against the plaintiffs in error. Upon the general issue, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff below for 143 dollars and 33 cents, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following case:

Thomas Moore, the bankrupt, carried on the trade and business of a vendue master in copartnership with one Henry Moore, which copartnership was on the 31st of March, 1802, dissolved on the terms that Thomas Moore should collect the balances due to, and pay the debts due from the joint concern as far as the joint property would extend. Thomas Moore carried on the trade and business of a vendue master on his separate account from that time until the 2d of September following, when he became bankrupt, and a commission being duly awarded and issued against him, he was duly declared a bankrupt according to the laws of the United States then in force concerning bankrupts; under which the plaintiff was duly appointed assignee.

While Henry and Thomas Moore carried on the business of vendue master in partnership, they became jointly indebted to the defendants, John and James Tucker, in the sum of 106 dollars and 49 cents, being the balance of account due to the defendants, for their goods sold by H. and T. Moore, at vendue. After the dissolution of the partnership, and while Thomas Moore carried on business on his separate account, the defendants, the Tuckers, at different times, from the 19th of April to the 22d of July, 1802, knowing that the partnership was dissolved, and that Thomas Moore carried on business on his separate account, purchased of him at vendue, goods to the amount of 113 dollars and 12 cents, which goods were charged to the defendants, the Tuckers, in the separate books of Thomas Moore, without credit being given to the defendants for the joint debt due to them from Henry and Thomas Moore. Thomas Moore being examined as a witness, proved that he intended, at the time of selling the goods to the defendants, to give them credit for the joint debt due to them from Henry and *Thomas Moore, but nothing was said or [36 agreed on the subject, between him and the defendants, nor was any such credit ever given before his bankruptcy. This action is brought for the price of the goods so sold and delivered by Thomas Moore in his separate capacity. If the court should be of opinion, upon the case stated, that the defendants are entitled to have the joint debt due to them by Henry and Thomas Moore deducted from the sum claimed in this action, the verdict was to be reduced to 16 dollars and 63 cents, and judgment to be entered accordingly.

The opinion of the court below being that the joint debt could not be set off against the separate claim of the bankrupt, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for the larger sum; whereupon the defendants brought a writ of error.

C. Simms, for the plaintiff in error.

All contracts with partners are joint and several; and every partner is liable to pay the whole. In what proportion the others are to contribute is a matter merely among themselves. The plaintiff may bring his action at law against any one of the partners, and can only be compelled by plea in abatement to join them all. (5 Burr. 2613; 1 Esp. 117.)

By the 42d section of the bankrupt law, (vol. 5, p. 74), it is declared that where there hath been mutual credit given by the bankrupt and any other person, or mutual debts between them, the assignee shall state the account between them, and one debt shall be set off against the other, and the balance of such account, after such set-off, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively.

Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, in Edwards's case, (1 Atk. 100,) doubted whether, under the statute relating to mutual debts, a debt due from A. to B. could be set off against a debt due from B. to A. and C. In that case C. was not in any manner liable to B. for the debt due from A. to B.

37*] *But in the present case, Thomas Moore was liable to the Tuckers for the debt due to them from Henry and Thomas Moore, and the Tuckers might have compelled payment from Thomas alone.

The clause in the act of parliament (5 Geo. II.), relating to mutual credits, and which is the same as the 42d section of our bankrupt law, has received a very liberal construction. (1 Atk. 228, Ex parte Deeze; 1 Atk. 230, Ex parte Charles Prescot.)

By the 34th section of the bankrupt law it appears that a partnership debt may be proved on a separate commission against one of the partners. By that section it is declared that the "bankrupt shall be discharged from all debts by him due or owing at the time he became bankrupt, and all which were or might have been proved under the commission;" with this proviso, "that no such discharge of a bankrupt shall release or discharge any person who was a partner with such bankrupt, at the time he became bankrupt, or who was then jointly held or bound with such bankrupt, for the same debt or debts from which such bankrupt was discharged as aforesaid."

And it may be laid down as a general rule, that a debtor of a bankrupt may be allowed to set off any debt due from the bankrupt which he could have proved under the commission. (Coop. B. L. 247.)

Jones, contra.

The debt for which this action was brought against the Tuckers, was contracted long after the dissolution of the partnership of Henry and Thomas Mooore. It was, and yet stands, charged against them on the separate books of Thomas Moore.

It is neither a mutual debt, nor a mutual credit. They are claims in different rights.

It is a general principle, in cases of bankruptcy, that the joint funds are to be applied to the discharge of the joint debts, and the 38] separate funds to the discharge *of the separate debts. The separate creditors can only come upon the joint fund for their debtor's share of the surplus, after paying the joint creditors; and the joint creditors can only come upon the separate fund for the surplus after payment of the separate creditors.

A joint creditor can only prove under the separate commission for the chance of that surplus, and to assent to or dissent from the allowance of the certificate. (Cooke's B. L. (4th edit.) 237, 244, 250; 3 Vez. Jun. 238, Ex parte Elton; 4 Vez. Jun. 837, Ex parte Abell.)

There is no statute in Virginia which authorizes set-off. The question depends entirely upon the 42d section of the bankrupt law of the United States, which is precisely like the 28th section of the act of parliament of 5 Geo. II. c. 30; Cooke's B. L. 541, 544.

It is clear that the separate creditors cannot come upon the joint fund until all the joint creditors are paid; it is unreasonable that the joint creditors should take the whole separate estate without looking at all to the joint estate. In the present case it is not stated that the joint funds were exhausted. It does not appear but that the other partner is solvent. The assignee of Thomas Moore cannot collect the debts due to Thomas and Henry Moore, and it is inequitable that he should be obliged to pay their debts.

In order to be set off under the bankrupt law, it must be a plain mutual credit. (Cooke's B. L. 568.) If due in different rights, it cannot be set off. A separate claim against one partner cannot be set off against a joint demand. (1 Wash. 77, Scott v. Trent.)

Simms, in reply.

The defendants below might have proved their debt under the commission against Thomas Moore.

The 34th section of the bankrupt law provides, *that a discharge under a com- [39 mission against one partner shall not discharge the other partner; which provision would be wholly unnecessary, if a joint debt could not be proved under that commission.

It is true that there is no statute in Virginia authorizing set-off; but under the equity of the statute respecting the action of debt by the assignees of promissory notes and bonds, set-off has been allowed in that state.

But the assignee of T. Moore, if he had an equitable right to the joint debts, might bring an action in the joint name, and a court of law would protect his equity.

LIVINGSTON, J. I do not recollect any particular authority, but I have always considered it as one of the clearest principles of law, that a joint debt cannot, at law, be set off against a separate claim.

February 15. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

In this case the plaintiffs in error, who were defendants in the Circuit Court, claimed to set off against a debt due from them to Thomas Moore, the bankrupt, a debt previously due to them from the firm of H. and T. Moore, which firm was dissolved, and the partnership fund had passed to T. Moore. This offset was not allowed; and its rejection is the error alleged in the proceedings of the Circuit Court.

At law, independent of the statute of bankruptcy, the court is of opinion that this discount could not have been made in a suit instituted by Thomas Moore against the Tuckers; and if the words of the act of Congress allowing set-off in the case of mutual debts and credits were to be expounded without regard to the provisions of that act in other respects, it is probable that they would not be extended beyond that technical operation, to which has 40*] been *allowed the term "mutual debts," in ordinary cases. But the bankrupt law changes essentially the relative situation of the parties; and the provisions making that change are thought, by a majority of the court, to have a material influeuce on the words of the 42d section of the act, which provide for the case of mutual debts and credits.

It is the opinion of the court that this is a debt, which might have been proved under the 6th section of the act. It is a debt, which, by a suit against both the partners, might have been recovered against either of them, and either might have been compelled to pay the whole. Although due from the company, yet it is also due from each member of the company; and the claim of the creditor for its satisfaction extended, previous to the act of bankruptcy, to the whole property of each member of the firm, as well as to the joint property of the firm. It would be certainly impairing that claim to apply, by the operation of law, the whole particular fund to other creditors, who, at the time of the bankruptcy, had not a better legal claim on that fund than the Tuckers, without allowing them to participate in it. The court, therefore, would be much inclined to consider the creditors of the partnership as having a right, under the general description of creditors of the bankrupt, to prove their debts before the commissioners. But all doubt on this subject seems to be removed by the proviso to the 34th section. That section declares, that the bankrupt shall be discharged from all debts which were due from him at the date of the bankruptcy, and all which were or might have been proved under the said commission, "Provided that no such discharge of a bankrupt shall release or discharge any person, who was a partner with such bankrupt at the time he or she became bankrupt, or who was then jointly held or bound with such bankrupt for the same debt or debts, from which such bankrupt was discharged as aforesaid."

Thomas Moore, then, is discharged from the debt due from Henry and Thomas Moore to the Tuckers; and if he is discharged therefrom, it 41*] would seem to *be an infraction of their pre-existing rights not to allow them a share of his property. It is deemed by the court material in the construction of this statute, that, as the proviso shows the joint creditors to be within the descriptiou of the terms creditors of the bankrupt, so as to enable them to prove their debts under the commission, they are of necessity comprehended within the same terms in those sections which direct to whom the dividends are to be made. The words of the 29th and 30th sections are imperative. They command the commissioners to divide the estate of the bankrupt among such of his creditors as shall have made due proof of their debts, in proportion to the amount of their claims. Consequently, every creditor who proves his debt is entitled to a dividend.

But, although the creditors of H. and T. Moore might have proved their debt before the commissioners, and have received a dividend out of the estate of the bankrupt, it may be contended that, having failed to do so, they are not entitled to set off their whole claim.

The 42d section of the act directs, that where it shall appear to the commissioners that there hath been mutual credit given by the bankrupt and any other person, or mutual debts between them at any time before such person became bankrupt, the assignee or assignees of the estate shall state the account between them, and one debt may be set off against the other; and what shall appear to be due on either side, on the balance of such account, after such set-off, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively.

The term "debt," as used in this section, is fairly to be construed to mean any debt for which the act provides. A debt which may be proved before the commissioners, and to the owner of which a dividend must be paid, is a debt in the sense of the term as used in this section.

*Were this doubtful, it cannot be de- [*42 nied that the advantage given by the section is reciprocal, and in any case where the set-off would be allowed, if the balance was against the bankrupt, it must be allowed if in his favor. It has already been stated that the Tuckers might have proved their claim before the commissioners. Can it be doubted that the whole of the debt due to the bankrupt would, under this section, have been deducted from that claim? We think it cannot be doubted. Then, the terms applying alike to each party, the debt due to the Tuckers must be set off from that which they owe the bankrupt.

If the "assignee of the estate ought to have stated the account," and have only claimed the balance, his omitting so to do cannot enlarge his rights; he can only recover what he ought to have claimed.

This, which seems to be the naked law of the case, is not unreasonable. It is fair to conclude that the Tuckers forbore to recover the money due to them from H. and T. Moore, in consideration of their dealings with T. Moore, after he traded on his separate account.

This exposition of the bankrupt act appears to the court to conform to that which is given in England. As the bankrupt law of the United States, so far as respects this case, is almost, if not completely, copied from that of England, the decisions which have been made on that law by the English judges may be considered as having been adopted with the text they expounded.

In England, it has never been doubted that a man, having a claim on two persons, might become a petitioning creditor for the bankruptcy of one of them. Such petitioning creditor has always been admitted to prove his debt before the commissioners, and to receive his dividends, in proportion, with the other creditors. He is, then, in contemplation of the act, a creditor of the bankrupt; and, consequently, all the *provisions of the act apply to him, as [*43 to other creditors. This would seem to prove that, under the legal operatiou of the act, a creditor of a firm, of which the bankrupt was one, and a creditor of the bankrupt singly, were equally creditors of the bankrupt, in contemplation of the law, and were construed to come equally within the meaning of the term, as used in the act. If this position be correct, the rules which we find laid down by the chancellor, for marshalling the respective funds, are to be considered merely as equitable restraints on the legal rights of parties, obliging them to exercise those rights in such manner as not to do injustice to others. This is the peculiar province of a court of chancery. It is the same, in principle, with the common case of marshalling assets, where specialty creditors, who have a right to satisfaction out of lands, exhaust the personal estate, to the injury of simple contract creditors.

It is undoubtedly unjust that the Tuckers, having a claim on H. and T. Moore, and being able to obtain payment from H. Moore, should satisfy that claim entirely out of the separate estate of T. Moore, to the exclusion of other creditors, who had no resort to Henry; and it is probable that a court of chancery might restrain this use of his legal rights within equitable limits. But suppose H. Moore, also, to be a bankrupt; or to be insolvent, and unable to pay the debt; would it not be equally unjust to apply the estate of each individual to the discharge of the several debts, to the entire exclusion of their joint creditors, who, previous to their bankruptcy, had a legal and equitable right to satisfaction out of the separate estate of each?

Mr. Cooke has made a very good collection of the decisions in England, on this question. It will be found that a creditor of the partnership was first permitted by consent to prove his debt before the commissioners of the individual bankrupt, and to receive dividends from the separate fund. It was afterwards decided by 44] the chancellor that he had a right *so to do: and in conformity with this decision was the regular course of the court, until the year 1796. During this time, however, the chancellor, sitting, as chancellor, on a bill suggesting equitable considerations for restraining the order he had made, was accustomed to enjoin the dividends which he had ordered, sitting in bankruptcy. This would seem to prove that, at law, the creditor of the partnership had a right to his dividends from the separate fund, but that equity would compel him first to exhaust the joint fund.

In 1796 this whole subject was reviewed in the case Ex parte Elton, reported in 3 Ves. Jun. This case has been considered as overruling former decisions; but, in the opinion of the court, it confirms the principle already stated. After stating his objection to the prevailing practice, because each order carried in its bosom a suit in chancery, the chancellor took time to consider the subject; and finally determined that the petitioner should be permitted to prove his debt, and that his dividend should be set apart, but not paid to him until an account should be taken of the joint fund.

It is perfectly clear that, in this case, the chancellor, for convenience, exercised, at the same time, his common law and equitable jurisdiction. In conformity with the uniform exposition of the act, he permitted the partnership creditor to prove his debt before the commissioners of the bankrupt, and directed the dividend to be allotted to him out of the separate fund; and then, without the expense of a bill, exercising his equitable powers, he suspended the payment of this dividend, until it should be ascertained how much of it a court of equity would permit the creditor to receive. This does not negative, but affirms, the legal right of a partnership creditor to come on the separate fund.

It appears also to be admitted, that if the particular creditors should be satisfied without exhausting the fund, the residue might be paid to the partnership *creditors. This seems [45 to admit the legal right of those creditors to prove their debts, and to receive their dividends. It is equity, not law, which can postpone them.

It is the opinion of a majority of the court, that the Circuit Court erred in rendering a judgment on this special verdict for the sum of 143 dollars and 33 cents, instead of the sum of 16 dollars and 63 cents; which was the balance after deducting the debt due from H. and T. Moore to the defendants in that court. It is therefore considered by the court, that the said judgment be reversed and annulled; and that judgment be rendered for the plaintiffs in the Circuit Court for the sum of .16 dollars and 63 cents, and the costs in the Circuit Court.

YOUNG
v.
THE BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

Suits brought by the bank of Alexandria upon promissory notes, made negotiable in that bank, are entitled to trial at the return term of the writ.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting in Alexandria, in an action of debt upon a promissory note, negotiable in the bank of Alexandria, made by Young to Yeaton, and by him indorsed to the bank.

The only question now argued, was whether the court below erred in ruling the plaintiff in error into a trial at the return term of the writ.

The bill of exceptions set forth the capias ad respondendum issued by the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, on the 10th of November, 1807, returnable "at the next court." The defendant below was taken on the 12th of November. The next court was holden by law on the 4th Monday of November, 1807.

*It further stated, that the counsel for [46 the plaintiffs below, having filed his declaration at the return term, prayed the court to fix a day for the trial of the cause during the present term, and also to rule the defendant to plead at a short day during the term, and offered to consent that the defendant should plead the general issue, and under that plea give in evidence any special matter which he could plead either in bar or abatement; to which the defendant objected; but the court ruled him to plead the next day, and upon the general issue being joined, ruled him to trial immediately.

By the general rules of practice established by the Circuit Court it is ordered, that all process issuing from that court, except executions, be made returnable before the court in term time; and that rules be held in the clerk's office on the day after the rising of the court in each term, and on the same day in each month thereafter during the vacation; and that all proceedings and orders taken at the rules shall conform as near as may be to the rules of proceeding directed by an act of the assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act reducing into one the several acts concerning the establishment, jurisdiction and powers of district courts," and the several acts amending the same. By that act, which was passed December 12, 1792, it is ordered, that "one month after the plaintiff hath filed his declaration he may give a rule to plead with the clerk, and if the defendant shall not plead accordingly at the expiration of such rule, the plaintiff may enter judgment for his debt or damages and costs." "All rules to declare, plead, reply, rejoin, or for other proceedings, shall be given regularly from month to month, shall be entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, and shall expire on the succeeding rule day." By the 25th section of that act, it is provided that in certain cases the sheriff may take the engagement of an attorney of the court, indorsed on the writ, that he will appear for the defendant, "and such appearance shall be entered with the clerk in the office, on the first day after the end of the court to which such 47] process is returnable, which *is hereby declared to be the appearance day in all process returnable to any day of the court next preceding."

By the act of Congress of 27th of February, 1801, it is declared that the laws of Virginia, as they then existed, should be and remain in force in that part of the District of Columbia which was ceded by Virginia to the United States.

By the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1801, § 3, it is enacted, that the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, shall possess and exercise the same powers and jurisdiction civil and criminal as was then possessed and exercised by the district courts of Virginia.

By the act of assembly of Virginia, passed on the 23d of November, 1792, and which incorporated the bank, it is ordered, that in suits brought by the bank upon notes made negotiable therein, an issue shall be made up, and trial had at the return term of the writ.

Youngs, for the plaintiff in error.

The act of 27th of February, 1801, conferred on the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, no other powers than those which had been given generally to the circuit courts of the United States, by the act passed in the same session (vol. 5, p. 237, § 11), and by that act no such power is given to those courts in respect to the debts due to the bank.

The 3d section of the act of the 3d of March, 1801, relates to criminal jurisdiction only, or if it relates to the civil jurisdiction, it is not clear that the district courts of Virginia could exercise the power, because those courts were established after the act incorporating the bank.

When this case was before this court at the last term, upon the motion to quash the writ of 48] error, *this court decided that so much of the charter as took away the right of appeal from the debtors to the bank, in the courts of Virginia, did not apply to the courts of the United States; and a distinction was taken between the rights which the bank had as a body corporate and its remedies derived from particular provisions in its charter. The summary trial is nothing more than a form of remedy given by its charter, and cannot be binding upon the courts of the United States. The proviso in the 16th section of the act of the 27th of February, 1801, only saves the rights, not the remedies, of the corporation.

Simms and Swann, contra.

The act incorporating the bank of Alexandria is a public act, and obligatory upon all the courts of Virginia. By the act of Congress of the 27th of February, 1801, it is adopted, together with all the other laws of Virginia, as the law within the county of Alexandria; and is therefore as binding upon the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia as it was upon the courts of Virginia; but lest any doubt should exist on the subject, the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1801, declares, that the Circuit Court of that District "shall possess and exercise the same powers and jurisdiction, civil and criminal, as is now possessed and exercised by the district courts of Virginia." There has never been a doubt but that the district courts of Virginia had jurisdiction in cases in which the bank was plaintiff, and was bound, if requested, to compel the defendant to go to trial at the return term.

The clause in the charter of the bank is an exception to the general law upon the subject of judicial proceedings; but the exception is equally valid with the general rule.

Jones, in reply.

The bank has not brought the case within the act. The writ is not returnable until the return day, and the return day is not until after the rising of the *court; so that [49 the bank is not entitled to a trial until the second term after issuing the writ. The writ is returnable to the next court; but the officer has the whole term to return it in, and may delay it until the very last moment of the session.

March 10. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

The writ being returnable to the court, is returnable the first day of the court. It was known to the legislature of Virginia that the appearance day for all process was the day after the term. When, therefore, they directed that a trial should be had at the return term, they must have intended that this case should be an exception to the general rule.

Judgment affirmed.

YEATON
THE BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

The bank of Alexandria may maintain an action against the indorser of a promissory note made negotiable in that bank, without first suing the maker, or proving him insolvent, although the indorsement was for the accommodation of the maker, and notwithstanding that in Virginia the implied contract of the indorser of a promissory note, by the general understanding of the country, is, that he will pay the debt, if by due diligence it cannot be obtained from the maker.

Perhaps the undertaking of the indorser of a note to a bank may be different.

It is no objection that the indorsement was for the accommodation of the maker. The consideration moving from the bank to the maker of the note, on the credit of the indorser, charges both the maker and indorser.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, in an action of assumpsit brought by the defendants in error against the plaintiff in error as indorser of a promissory note for the accommodation of R. Young, the maker.

The declaration contained two counts. One upon the indorsement of the note, in the usual form, and without any averment of the insolveney of the maker, or of any steps taken to enforce payment from him. The other was for money had and received.

The same questions arose in this case as in the preceding case of Young v. The Bank of Alexandria, but the only question argued in this cause, was, whether an indorser of a promis-50] sory note to the bank *of Alexandria, for the accommodation of the maker, was liable in an action by the bank, until after a suit, judgment and execution against the maker had proved fruitless, or the maker was otherwise proved to be insolvent.

Upon the opening of the point, MARSHALL, Ch. J., observed that it had been decided by this court in the cases of French v. The Bank of Columbia (ante, vol. 4, p. 141), and Violet v. Patton, at this term, that the circumstance of its being for the accommodation of the maker makes no difference. The indorser is as much liable as if he had himself received the money.

Youngs, for the plaintiff in error.

The general law of Virginia, upon the subject of promissory notes, is, that the indorser is not liable until a suit has been brought against the maker, and judgment recovered; and the execution has proved fruitless, or the maker is otherwise proved to be insolvent. If there be any exception in favor of the bank it must be a privilege granted by its charter. The only words under which such a privilege can be supposed to exist are these: "And whereas it is absolutely necessary that debts due to the said bank should be punctually paid, to enable the directors to calculate with certainty and precision on meeting the demands that may be made upon them, be it enacted, that when any person or persons indebted to the said bank on bonds, bills or notes, given or indorsed by them, with an express consent in writing that they may be negotiable at the said bank, shall refuse or neglect to make payment at the time the same may become due, and a suit shall be thereupon commenced against such defaulter, and a capias ad respondendum returned executed, or a copy left at the usual place of residence of such defaulter, at least ten days before the return day of such writ, the court shall" order the proceedings to be made up, and the cause tried at the first court.

51*] *But according to this act, the person to be sued must be a person indebted to the bank by indorsement; and under the general law of Virginia no person is indebted by indorsement of a note until the maker be insolvent, or the plaintiff shall have failed to obtain payment from the maker by suit, judgment, and execution.

Swann, contra, admitted the general law of Virginia respecting promissory notes to be as stated, but contended that by the words of the act of incorporation, an indorser of a note is to be considered as indebted to the bank upon failure to pay the note when it becomes due. The preamble shows that punctuality in payment was the object in view; which would be entirely defeated if the bank could not compel payment from an indorser until they had pursued the maker through all the tedious delays of the law. If the note be not paid when it becomes due, the act calls the indorser a defaulter, and directs judgment to be entered up against him at the first court thereafter.

The question in this case is, whether the indorser of a note negotiable in the bank of Alexandria, if such indorsement be for accommodation, may be sued by the bank, before a suit shall be instituted against the maker, if the maker be solvent.

In Virginia, the indorser of a promissory note was not, when the town of Alexandria was separated from that state, liable to the holder by any express statute. He was only liable under the implied contract created by his indorsement. This implied contract, by the general understanding of the country, was, that he would pay the debt, if by due diligence it could not be obtained from the maker. This condition, however, was not expressed. Yet *it was just, because it was consistent [52 with general usage, and, therefore, was the real understanding with which such an indorsement was made and received.

But in banks, this is probably not the usage; and if it be not, then the same reason does not exist for annexing such a condition to the contract created by indorsement. If banks are understood to receive notes made negotiable with them, as subject to the law which governs inland bills of exchange, then it would seem reasonable, in the case of notes actually negotiated with them, to imply, from the act of indorsement, an undertaking conformable to that usage. If, then, the case showed that such was the usage of the bank, and such the understanding under which notes were discounted, this court is not prepared to say that the undertaking created by the indorsement would not be so fashioned as to give effect to the real intention of the parties.

But the incorporating act removes any doubt which might otherwise exist on this point.

The 20th section of that act declares, "that whenever any person or persons indebted to the said bank on bonds, bills, or notes, given or indorsed by them, with an express consent, in writing, that they may be negotiable at the said bank, and shall refuse or neglect to make payment at the time the same may become due, and a suit shall thereupon be commenced, &c., judgment is to be rendered in a summary manner.

A person, then, may become indebted to the bank on a note indorsed by him, as well as on a note made by him; and the question is, when does he become indebted? The act appears to answer this question in the succeeding member of the sentence. The words are, "and shall refuse or neglect to make payment at the time the same may become due." To what antecedent does the word "same" refer? Most obviously to the words "bond, bill or note." When the bond, bill or note becomes *due, the maker or indorser, who shall [53 refuse or neglect to make payment, is within the description of the act. No man can be said to refuse or neglect to make payment before the money is demandable from him, and till then no action can be brought. But the law proceeds to say, "and a suit shall thereupon be commenced." The word "thereupon" must refer to the note, or to the circumstances previously stated. Give it the one meaning or the other, and the law obviously contemplates a suit against the maker or indorser, on his refusing or neglecting to pay such note, when it shall become due. The act then proceeds to say, that, when this suit shall be so commenced, the court shall render judgment thereon in a summary way.

It is alleged that the preceding part of the section is all recital, and cannot, therefore, be construed to give a right to sue, where that right did not before exist: that the enacting clause gives no remedy where one did not before exist; but substitutes a summary mode of proceeding, for that more tedious action which the previous laws had given.

It is true that the first part of this section is recital; but it describes the precise case in which judgment shall be rendered in a summary way. That precise case is, where a person indebted, by making or indorsing a note negotiable and negotiated in the bank, shall refuse or neglect to make payment thereof, when such note shall become due. The time when he becomes indebted is declared to be when the note becomes due.

It is alleged that an accommodation indorser cannot then become indebted. This distinction was completely overruled in the case of Violet and Patton. The consideration moving from the bank to the maker of the note, on the credit of the indorser, charges both the maker and indorser. The indorser is, in this respect, as liable, both in reason and in law, to the claim of the bank, as if he had placed his name on the face instead of the back of the note.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

54*] *JOHNSON, J. Both the questions,[1] argued in this case, arise out of the act of Virginia incorporating the bank of Alexandria.

On the point of the summary jurisdiction, I concur with my brethren, and think this opinion perfectly consistent with the decision, at the last term, relative to the right of appeal. I remember that my opinion in that case was founded on the idea that the provisions of that act, relative to the summary recovery of debts, was entirely a judicial regulation. That the judicial power was unalienable from the sovereignty of a country, and must, therefore, in all its modifications, remain subject to the will of succeeding legislatures. That it was, in fact, a subject in which a peculiar, indefeasible right could not be vested in an individual. I thought it, therefore, from its nature, unaffected by the clause of the act of acceptance reserving to the bank its corporate rights, and of course affected by the law which gives an appeal, generally, from the courts of this district to the Supreme Court, above a certain amount. I have no doubt of the power of Congress to deprive them also of their summary remedy; but it has not yet legislated to that effect.

On the other question, I entertain a very strong opinion in opposition to that of the court.

The doctrine has been repeatedly sanctioned in this court, that, in the state of Virginia, the holder of a promissory note cannot recover against an indorser without proving the insolvency of the drawer. But it is contended that the act, incorporating this bank, has placed the notes negotiable therein on a different footing; and that an indorser of such a note may be sued as soon as it is dishonored, without any evidence of the insolvency of the drawer. The following are the words of the clause, so far as they are material to this case: "And whereas it is *absolutely necessary that debts due [55 to the said bank should be punctually paid, to enable the directors to calculate with certainty and precision on meeting the demands that may be made upon them, be it enacted, that whenever any person or persons indebted to the said bank on bonds, bills, or notes, given or indorsed by them, with an express consent in writing that they may be negotiable at the said bank, and shall refuse or neglect to make payment at the time the same may become due, and a suit shall be thereupon commenced against such defaulter, and a capias ad respondendum returned and executed, or a copy left at the usual place of residence of such defaulter, at least ten days before the return day of such writ, the court shall," &c. It then goes on and enacts, that, in such case, "the court shall order the proceedings to be made up, and the cause tried at the first court." This bare recital, or preamble, without one enacting word, is what is supposed to have effected this important change in the law of Virginia, relative to the liability of an indorser. Much stress was laid, in the argument, upon the use of the word "indebted," as applied to the indorser, the words "negotiable at the said bank," and words which suppose the commencement of a suit, as soon as a note "becomes due." I positively deny the correctness of maintaining any repeal or alteration in the principle of a law, upon an implication drawn from a mere preamble or recital to an act. Enacting words will undoubtedly often produce a repeal by implication, but a recital or preamble sets forth merely the motives or inducements of the legislator, and, whether founded in error or truth, serves no other purpose than to justify him to those for whom he is legislating, or, at times, to assist in developing the meaning of doubtful enacting words. Admit the principle, that a preamble may have the effect of enacting words, and there is no necessity for dilating on the inextricable absurdities in which a court may be involved. In the case before us, it is possible that the legislature may have supposed that the law of Virginia would sanction an immediate suit against the indorser, without evidence of the drawer's insolvency; *but their courts [56 of justice have decided otherwise; and it would be singular if an erroneous opinion, entertained by that body, should have all the effects of a law passed by it. But there is not a word contained in this preamble which may not be fully satisfied, without producing any necessary implication against the general law of Virginia, relative to the liability of the indorser.

When the legislature speaks of a person in-

1.—This case was argued in connection with that of Young v. The Bank of Alexandria, as one case. This opinion, therefore, applies to both cases.

debted by indorsement, it can only be understood to speak of one indebted according to the legal liability of an indorser; which is only, by the laws of Virginia, in case of the insolvency of the drawer.

When it speaks of a consent in writing, that it may be negotiable at the said bank, it can only mean what it expresses; and intends it for the purpose of subjecting the individual to the summary recovery given in such a case; for, as to his general liability as indorser, such a consent was in no wise necessary; that liability existed in its full extent without it.

And as to the supposition of the indorser's liability to be sued when the note becomes due, this also is strictly and literally true, if the drawer should then be insolvent, or (I suppose) if he should become so at any time before the trial of the issue.

Upon the whole, therefore, it appears to me that there is no possible difference between the liability of an indorser generally, and an indorser of a note negotiable in the bank of Alexandria; that the legislature intended to make no distinction; and, if it had expressly declared such to be its intent, no such change would have been produced, without following up that intention with sufficient enacting words; but that in fact, its sole object was to do that which it professes to intend, and alone has effected, viz., to give a summary remedy against all persons becoming indebted to that bank, whenever their legal liability is incurred. In fact it may, with 57] the utmost correctness, *be affirmed of an indorser that he is indebted, and that he may be sued when the note becomes due, without at all interfering with the laws of Virginia on this subject: for a thing may be debitum in presenti, and yet no cause of action exist against him; he may lie under a present obligation to pay a sum of money, upon some contingency or future event. And, with regard to his liability to be sued when the note becomes due, it may be very correctly affirmed that it is not due from him until the insolvency of the drawer can be shown. As to the drawer, the note is due when it is made payable; but the principles of the Virginia law add a contingency to the liability of the indorser, so that, in fact, his undertaking is collateral and contingent, and the amount is not legally due from him until after the day of payment, and provided the drawer should prove insolvent.

THE HOPE INSURANCE COMPANY OF PROVIDENCE

BOARDMAN, et al.

A corporation aggregate cannot be a citizen—and cannot litigate in the courts of the United States, unless in consequence of the character of the individuals who compose the body politic, which character must appear by proper averments upon the record.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, in an action upon a policy of insurance.

The only question decided in this court was that relative to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

The parties were described in the declaration as follows: "William Henderson Boardman, and Pascal Paoli Pope, both of Boston, in the District of Massachusetts, merchants and citizens of the state of Massachusetts, complain of The Hope Insurance Company of Providence, a company legally incorporated by the legislature of the state of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, and established at Providence in said district."

*The question of jurisdiction was not [58 made in the court below.

Ingersoll, for the plaintiffs in error, contended, that the jurisdiction must appear upon the face of the proceedings, according to the decision in the case of Bingham v. Cabot (3 Dal., 382). And that it does not appear upon this record that the parties are citizens of different states; a corporation aggregate cannot be a citizen of any state; and here is no averment of citizenship of the individuals who compose the corporation.

Adams, contra.

The whole argument against us depends upon the single case of Bingham v. Cabot; for although in other cases the same point has been decided,

---

NOTE.—All the stockholders of a corporation, are, in a suit by or against a corporation, in a United States court, for the purposes of jurisdiction, conclusively presumed to be citizens of the state which created the corporation.

Muller v. Dows, 4 Otto, 444.

The U. S. Circuit Court has jurisdiction of a suit against a foreign insurance company doing business within the state, under leave conditioned upon its filing a stipulation that process may be served on its agent with like effect as if service were actually made on the company within the state.

Ex parte Schollenberger, 6 Otto, 369; See Pomeroy v. N. Y. R. Co., 4 Blatchf., 420, contra.

Citizens of a state holding bonds of a corporation of another state, secured by mortgage on lands in the latter state, may bring an action against the trustee, the corporation, and other bond and coupon holders, all citizens of the latter state, to compel the trustee to foreclose the mortgage, although some of the persons were made defendants solely on the ground that they had refused to join as plaintiffs in the action.

Hotel Co. v. Wade, 7 Otto, 13.

Where a company is incorporated by two states, a citizen of one of the states may sue it in a United States court in the other state in which it is incorporated.

City of Wheeling v. Mayor of Baltimore, 1 Hugh, 90; Minor v. Phil. R. Co. 2 Abb., U. S., 323.

In the case of a mere collective body, associated by voluntary articles, a joint stock association, the presumption that all its members are citizens of the state does not arise, and if it be not alleged in the bill that it is a corporation, or that the members thereof are citizens of the state, a demurrer will be sustained.

Dinsmore v. Phil. & Co., 1 L. & Eq. Reporter, 351.

A corporation that has appeared and answered generally cannot insist upon want of jurisdiction on the ground that it is not an inhabitant of the district.

Kelsey v. Penn. R. Co., 14 Blatchf., 89.

A corporation created by the laws of a state, is, in suits in a federal court of that state, to be considered a citizen of such state, whatever its citizenship in other states may be by legislation of those states.

yet the subsequent decisions are all founded upon that case. The effect of that decision has been to exclude many cases upon nice questions of pleading, which would otherwise have been clearly within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. No exception was taken to the jurisdiction in the court below; and this court would not willingly turn us out of court, after encountering all the risk, expense, delay and labor of a jury trial, upon an exception, which, if taken in the first instance, might have prevented all that risk, expense and delay. In the case of Abercrombie v. Dupuis (ante, vol. 1, p. 343), the present Chief Justice (Marshall) intimated a doubt how the question would then have been decided if it were a new case, and if the court was not bound by the case of Bingham v. Cabot. This doubt shows that the court was not then inclined to extend the principle farther than that case warrants. At the time the court decided the case of Bingham v. Cabot, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States was an object of jealousy, and there was probably a desire on the part of the court to remove all ground of suspicion, by deciding doubtful cases against the jurisdiction. This circumstance probably induced them to be over scrupulous 59] upon that *subject. But it is as much the duty of this court to exercise jurisdiction in cases where it is given by the constitution and laws of the United States, as to refuse to assume it where it is not given.

The person who drew the declaration in the present case seems to have been aware of the decision in the case of Bingham v. Cabot, and to have intended to describe the parties in such a manner as to give the court jurisdiction. The defendant is described as "a company legally incorporated by the legislature of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, and established at Providence in the said district."

The term citizen could not with propriety be applied to a corporation aggregate. It could only be a citizen by intendment of law. It is only a moral person; but it may be a citizen quoad hoc, i. e., in the sense in which the term citizen is used in that part of the constitution which speaks of the jurisdiction of the judicial power of the United States. The term is indeterminate in its signification. It has different meanings in different parts of the constitution. When it says "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states," the term citizens has a meaning different from that in which it is used in describing the jurisdiction of the courts.

To say that all the individual members of a body corporate must be citizens of a certain description, destroys the idea of a body politic. It is the body politic, the moral person, that sues, and not the individuals who compose the corporation. Its powers, its duties and capacities are different from those of the individuals of whom it is composed. It can neither derive benefit from the privileges, nor suffer injury by the incapacities, of any of those individuals.

Thus the infancy of any or even of all the members of a body corporate does not affect the validity of its acts. Nor does the alienage of 60] the members *prevent the body politic from holding lands. A majority of the members of the Bank of the United States are aliens.

The objection goes to exclude all corporations aggregate from the federal courts. For if a corporation cannot be a citizen it cannot be an alien. And as the individual members are constantly changing by the transfer of stock, it is impossible to ascertain at any precise moment who are the individuals who constitute the corporate body; and it would at any time be in the power of a corporation defendant to evade the jurisdiction of the court, by taking in a new member who should be of the same state with the plaintiff.

At all events it is an objection which ought to be pleaded in abatement according to the course of the common law, so that the plaintiff may have a better declaration; and by that means much expense, time and labor would be saved.

The reason of giving jurisdiction to the courts of the United States in cases between citizens of different states, applies with the greatest force to the case of a powerful moneyed corporation erected within, and under the laws of a particular state. If there was a probability that an individual citizen of a state could influence the state courts in his favor, how much stronger is the probability that they could be influenced in favor of a powerful moneyed institution which might be composed of the most influential characters in the state. What chance for justice could a plaintiff have against such a powerful association in the courts of a small state whose judges perhaps were annually elected, or held their offices at the will of the legislature?

If the jurisdiction of the federal courts is limited by the letter of the constitution, they have no jurisdiction in a case between a citizen of one state and a citizen of another state; because the constitution speaks of citizens, in the plural, so that there must *be more [61 than one plaintiff, and more than one defendant. So also there could be no jurisdiction if one of the parties was a woman, because a woman cannot be a citizen; which is a term applicable only to a male.

It is not necessary that a person should be a citizen to commit treason: it may be committed by an alien.

Judge Jay, as an argument in favor of the suability of the states, urged that a corporation could undoubtedly be sued in the courts of the United States.[1]

THE COURT having, in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Deveaux et al., decided that the right of a corporation to litigate in the courts of the United States depended upon the character (as to citizenship) of the members which compose the body corporate, and that a body corporate as such cannot be a citizen, within the meaning of the constitution, reversed the judgment, for want of jurisdiction in the court below.

1.—A similar question of jurisdiction being involved in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Deveaux et al., and the counsel in that case expressing a wish to be heard before this case should be decided, the court agreed to hear both cases at the same time; the further arguments in this case were consequently blended with those in the other.

THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. DEVEAUX et al.

A corporation aggregate, composed of citizens of one state, may sue a citizen of another state in the Circuit Court of the United States.

Where the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States depends, not on the character of the parties, but upon the nature of the case, the circuit courts derive no jurisdiction from the judiciary act, except in the case of a controversy between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants from different states.

No right is conferred on the bank, by its act of incorporation, to sue in the federal courts.

A corporation aggregate cannot, in its corporate capacity, be a citizen.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia.

The declaration, or petition, as it is there called, was as follows:

District of Georgia.

To the Honorable the Judges of the Sixth 62*] Circuit *Court of the United States, in and for the district aforesaid.

The petition of the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States, which said bank was established under an act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed the 25th day of February, 1791, showeth;

That Peter Deveaux and Thomas Robertson, both of the city of Savannah, Esquires, have endamaged your petitioners in the sum of three thousand dollars, for this, to wit, that the said Thomas Robertson, then acting under authority from the said Peter Deveaux, on the 20th day of April, 1807, at Savannah, in the district aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this honorable court, with force and arms entered into the house and premises of your petitioners, at Savannah aforesaid, and then and there seized, took, and detained, two boxes (the goods and chattels of your petitioners), containing each one thousand dollars in silver, then and there found in the possession of your petitioners, and being of the value of two thousand and four dollars, and carried the same away, and converted and disposed thereof to their own use, and other wrongs to your petitioners then and there did against the peace of the district, and to the great damage of your petitioners, therefore your petitioners say they are injured, and have sustained damage to the value of three thousand dollars, and therefore they bring suit. And your petitioners aver that they are citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, and the said Peter Deveaux and Thomas Robertson are citizens of the State of Georgia. Wherefore your petitioners pray process, &c.

And the said Peter and Thomas, by R. L., their attorney, come and defend the force and injury, when, &c., and pray judgment of the declaration aforesaid, because they say that the sixth Circuit Court of the United States ought 63*] not to have and *entertain jurisdiction of the said declaration, and the matters therein contained, for that the said president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States aver themselves to be a body politic and corporate, and that in that capacity these defendants say they cannot sue or be sued, plead or be impleaded in this honorable court, by anything contained in the constitution or laws of the same United States, and this they are ready to verify; wherefore, for want of jurisdiction in this behalf, they pray judgment, and their costs, &c.

To this plea there was a demurrer and joinder, and judgment in favor of the defendants upon the demurrer.

Binney, for the plaintiffs in error.

In the year 1805 the state of Georgia passed a law to tax the Branch Bank of the United States, at Savannah. The bank having refused to pay the tax, the state officers entered their office of discount and deposit, and took and carried away two thousand dollars, for which the Bank of the United States brought their action of trespass in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Georgia. The plea to the jurisdiction does not deny that the plaintiffs were citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, but relies upon the fact that the plaintiffs sue as a body corporate.

The record presents two questions.

1. Whether a body politic, composed exclusively of citizens of one state, can sue a citizen of another state in the Circuit Court of the United States.

2. Whether the Bank of the United States has not a peculiar right to sue in that court.

The objections to this right are two.

1. That the individual character of the members *is so wholly lost in that of the [64 corporation, that the court cannot take notice of it.

2. That the suit being in a corporate capacity, it is impossible by the pleadings to bring into question the fact of citizenship of the individual members.

The answer to the first objection embraces three propositions.

1. That in many instances, the character, situation and attributes of the members of a corporation, are brought into notice in judicial proceedings against the corporate body.

2. That even if it were otherwise, still the spirit of the federal constitution and laws demands that the citizenship of the members should be noticed, as well to affect the question of jurisdiction as for other purposes.

3. That the constant practice in the circuit courts, and the tacit approbation of this court, have sanctioned their jurisdiction in such cases.

1. What is a corporation aggregate? It is a collection of many individuals united into one body, under a special name, having perpetual succession under an artificial form, and vested, by the policy of the law, with the capacity of acting in several respects as an individual. (1 Kyd. on Corp., 13). To say that it is an "ens civile, a jus habendi et agendi, an ens rationis, a mere metaphysical being, and that it rests only in consideration and intendment of law," are terms calculated to mislead the understanding.

A corporation is composed of natural persons; it is a visible, tangible body; and although the whole collectively have faculties in law which the individuals have not, yet it does not follow that the whole body may not be seen, examined, sifted and contemplated, as any other body of individuals having *col- [65 lectively a particular faculty. (11 Co., 98, b). The individuals hold their rights as members in their natural, and not in a politic capacity. A corporation is a mere collection of men having collectively certain faculties.

When the president, directors and company of a bank are assembled, the corporation is visible. If all the members should die, or surrender their charter to the King, the corporation would be extinct. A corporation must exist by means of natural persons; and the law will examine whether the natural persons claiming to be members have all the necessary qualifications according to their charter. If any individual member does not possess them, he is to be disfranchised.

If a suit were brought against a corporation it would be a decisive bar that all the members were dead.

A corporation as a "faculty" has no "local habitation," though it has a "name." If it is an ens rationis only, it cannot be said to reside anywhere; and it certainly occupies nothing; yet habitancy, residence and occupation may be predicated of a corporation aggregate. The residence and inhabitancy of the particular members have been taken into consideration, and have been deemed to impart these characters to the corporation.

Lord Coke, in his exposition of the statute of 22 Hen. VIII. c. 5, concerning the repairing of decayed bridges in highways (2 Inst., 697, 703), says, "the persons to be charged by this act are comprehended under this only word "inhabitants." "Every corporation and body politic residing in any county," &c., "or having any lands or tenements in any shire," &c., "quæ propriis manibus et sumptibus possident et habent, are said to be inhabitants there within the purview of this statute." In the case of Rex v. Gardner (Cowp., 83), it was decided that a corporation aggregate was an inhabitant or 66 occupier of *certain lands, and therefore liable to be taxed for them under the act of 43 Eliz., c. 2.

It must be an inhabitant or resident where its members or officers inhabit or reside. If an action be brought against the corporation in respect of its residence or occupation, it must be competent to the corporation to show that it does not so reside or occupy, which can only be done by showing that this is not true of its members or officers.

But the characters of individual members are in many cases examined for the purpose of settling the very question of jurisdiction.

The division of corporations into ecclesiastical and lay, is familiar. There is nothing in the name or patent to distinguish them. (1 Bla. Com., 470.) An ecclesiastical corporation is subject to the ordinary alone. His court alone has jurisdiction of proceedings by or against the corporation. (1 Bla. Com., 480.) A lay corporation is visited by the founder. The King is the founder of all civil corporations, and he visits them in the King's bench.

By ascertaining the characters of the members of the corporation alone can it be decided whether the corporation be lay or ecclesiastical; and, consequently, whether the King's bench or the ordinary has jurisdiction. Blackstone says, that an ecclesiastical corporation is where the members that compose it are entirely spiritual persons; and that the universities of Oxford and Cambridge are not ecclesiastical corporations, "being composed of more laymen than clergy." In this question of jurisdiction, therefore, is always involved the character of the individual members who compose the body.

The members of a corporation are further noticed in chancery, and are compelled as individuals to execute a trust, which at common law they were not bound to do. (Gilb. Uses, 5, 174; 1 Kyd., 73; 2 Leon., 122.) A corporation trustee is the same in chancery *as [67 an individual, or number of individuals. (2 Ves. Jun., 46. Attorney General v. Foundling Hospital.)

The rule seems to be, not that the individuals confer their private privileges upon the body corporate, but that as often as justice or convenience require that the corporation should be considered as composed of natural persons, the individuals are disclosed, and their character becomes the subject of legal contemplation.

2. The spirit of the constitution and laws of the United States demands that the citizenship of the members of a corporation should be noticed in order to decide the question of jurisdiction, as well as for other purposes.

The constitution has conferred on the courts of the United States jurisdiction in two classes of cases.

1. Where the peace of the confederacy might be involved.

2. Where the state tribunals could not be supposed to be impartial.

The one upon the ground that the Union was answerable for the misconduct of its members, who, by unjust decisions against aliens, might furnish a just ground of war.

The other to preserve the real equality of citizens throughout the Union, by guarding against fraudulent laws and local prejudices, in particular states.

The design of the constitution was to retain jurisdiction in those cases where substantially these great interests were to be affected. It cannot be supposed that it was to be retained only where there was a nominal character, alien or citizen, and abandoned where substantially aliens or citizens were concerned, but whose names did not appear. It is unimportant by what name citizens are by the laws *of their own state permitted to sue, they [68 are still citizens, and entitled to that substantial justice, and the benefit of those independent tribunals which were intended to be secured by the federal constitution. The constitution does not speak of the name on record; of the nominal party; it speaks of "controversies" "between citizens of different states." The question is not, what names appear upon the record, but between whom is the controversy; who are the real litigants.

In conformity with the spirit of the constitution, the federal courts have always inquired after the real parties. Although the nominal parties are really persons competent to sue in those courts, yet they will inquire into the character of the real litigants, and if they find them unable to sue there, they will dismiss the suit. (4 Dal., 330, Mansfield's Lessee v. Lery.) They will allow no fiction to give jurisdiction to the court where the substance is wanting. Can it be admitted then that they will allow the jurisdiction to be excluded by a name, if the substance exists which gives jurisdiction?

If a state be substantially a party, is the jurisdiction cut off if her agent brings a suit? The case of Fowler v. Lindsey (3 Dal., 412), clearly implies the contrary.

It is the privilege of citizens of one state to have their controversies with citizens of another state tried in the federal courts. The constitution guaranties it to them. It cannot be taken away, because they are authorized to bring one joint suit in a particular name, instead of bringing it in the names of each individual. Their corporate name is given them as a benefit, and ought not to be converted into an injury. Besides, if the bank cannot sue, they cannot be sued in the federal courts; nor any other corporation. The consequence is, that if a citizen of Georgia would sue the bank of the United States, at Philadelphia, he must go into the state courts. If he would sue the corporation of Philadelphia, 69] he must *sue in the state courts; nay, even in the County Court of Philadelphia itself.

But it is not more a question of jurisdiction than of right. If you cannot inquire who are the members of a corporation, whenever a right depends upon the question of citizenship, that right cannot be enjoyed by a corporation.

If citizenship of the members cannot give jurisdiction, neither can their alienage. A corporation composed of aliens cannot sue in the federal courts. Neither the East India Company, the Bank of England, nor even a sole corporation, such as the Chamberlain of London, can sue in those courts; for in his corporate capacity he is not an alien.

An alien cannot sue a domestic corporation unless in the state courts. Although you permit an obscure alien to sue a citizen in the federal courts, yet you deny that privilege to a corporation consisting of a great number of aliens.

Again: by the constitution, the jurisdiction of the federal courts is to extend to "controveries between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states;" yet a corporation of Pennsylvania claiming lands under Virginia, against a citizen of Pennsylvania claiming the same lands under Pennsylvania, must go into the courts of Pennsylvania, and cannot get into the federal courts.

This would be a result clearly contrary to the intention and spirit of the constitution, which meant that no man claiming land by title adverse to a state should be obliged to resort to the courts of that state to try his title.

The argument from inconvenience is very strong. Lord Coke says plurimum valet. When other reasoning is nearly on an equipoise it ought to turn the scale.

70*] *The court cannot consider the individual members as citizens for any purpose, if it cannot for that of jurisdiction.

How is it under the act of Congress for registering vessels? (Laws of the U. S., vol. 2, p. 147.) A corporation cannot hold an American registered vessel. An insurance company to whom an American vessel is abandoned must forfeit her register, although every member of that corporation be an American citizen. A foreign corporation, although composed entirely of aliens, may yet hold lands in this country, although an alien cannot.

3. The practice of the courts of the United States has been uniform and never questioned. This court has decided a great number of cases in which a corporation has been a party. It is no answer to these to say that there was no plea to the jurisdiction; for none was necessary. Whenever the court sees that it has not jurisdiction, or that its jurisdiction does not appear upon the record, it dismisses the suit. And in every case where a corporation is a party, the title of the suit alone was sufficient to give the court information.

But this point may be considered as almost, if not quite, decided by the case of The Bank of North America v. Turner (4 Dal., 98), where the plaintiffs were described in the same manner as the present plaintiffs, and Ch. J. Ellsworth, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, "the plaintiffs are well described as citizens of Pennsylvania."

The second objection is, that by no form of pleadings can the citizenship of the members be put in issue.

But if the citizenship be material, it may be averred; and if averred, it may be put in issue. The materiality of the averment is indeed the only question.

*2. The second question upon this record [71 is, whether the bank of the United States has not a peculiar right to sue in the federal courts?

This right depends upon two questions;

1. Whether Congress could, under the constitution, give such a jurisdiction to the circuit courts? And,

2. Whether Congress has given it?

1. The judicial power of the United States is co-extensive with the legislative. It extends to all cases arising under the laws of the United States. Every case in which the bank of the United States is a party must be a case arising under those laws; for the only capacity which the bank has to sue or be sued is derived from a law of the United States. No contract can be made with the bank, no trespass can be committed upon its property, without involving the question of its existence as a corporate body, and of its rights, powers and duties, all of which depend upon the laws of the United States.

Congress, therefore, had a right to give to the circuit courts of the United States cognizance of all cases in which the bank should be a party.

2. Have they done it?

The 3d section of the act of Congress which incorporated the bank, gave them the power and capacity "to sue" "in courts of record, or any other place whatsoever."

If they had a right to sue in courts of record, can it be presumed that Congress meant to exclude them from the courts of the United States? the only courts over whom Congress could exercise any control, and to whom alone they could imperatively impart jurisdiction. If the bank has a capacity to sue in the circuit courts, the circuit courts are bound to take cognizance of their suits.

*The presumption that Congress meant [72 to give such jurisdiction to the circuit courts is fortified by the reasonableness of the jurisdiction, the extensiveness of the institution, and its character as an agent in the fiscal operations of the United States; by the danger of an attack from some of the states; by the jealousies of state banks; by the inconvenience of discordant decisions upon the construction of their charter, and the certainty that all cases in which the bank is a party must involve questions arising under the laws of the United States.

P. B. Key, contra.

Two questions arise in this case.

1. Whether a body politic, a corporation aggregate, created by a law of the United States, is competent to sue in the circuit courts of the United States.

2. Does the averment of citizenship give jurisdiction to those courts?

1. The first point depends upon the constitution and laws of the United States.

The 2d section of the 3d article of the constitution designates the limits of judicial authority which Congress could confer on the several courts of the United States, but it confers no powers on the circuit courts. It defines the limits which neither Congress, nor the courts erected by Congress, can transcend. It was within the discretion of Congress to organize courts, and grant them powers to the whole extent of the constitution; but they were under no obligation to do it.

The question, then, is not what powers might Congress give to the circuit courts, but what have they given.

By the judiciary law of 1789 (vol. 1, p. 55, § 10), the Circuit Court has original cognizance of [*73 civil *suits, in three cases only. 1. Where the United States is plaintiff; 2. Where an alien is a party; and, 3. Where the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state.

The president, directors and company of the bank of the United States do not answer to either of those cases. They are neither the United States, nor an alien, nor a citizen of a state.

They are a corporation aggregate, consisting of many natural persons, created by the act of Congress of the 25th of February, 1791 (vol. 1, p. 283), under the name and style of "The President, Directors and Company of the Bank of the United States," and by that name only can they sue and be sued. The present suit is brought by them in their corporate name and capacity.

A corporation aggregate is an artificial, invisible body, existing only in contemplation of law. It has no analogy to a natural person. It has no organ but its seal. It cannot sue, or be sued, for any personal injury. It cannot be outlawed. It is not subject to an attachment of contempt. It never dies. It cannot be a citizen of any state, because it cannot owe allegiance. It cannot commit treason nor felony. It can have no residence, because it is an artificial, invisible, intangible body. It cannot appear in person, but must appear by attorney. For all these reasons it cannot come within the description of those who are entitled to sue in the circuit courts of the United States. Neither residence nor inhabitancy is sufficient to give jurisdiction. It must be a citizen, possessing political rights, and owing allegiance to some state.

The bank has mistaken its proper course. Wherever the only ground of jurisdiction is a question upon the construction of the constitution, or of a law or treaty of the United States, the only remedy is by writ of error from this court to the highest *state tribunal having [*74 cognizance of the cause, agreeably to the provisions of the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789. (Vol. 1, p. 63.)

If an act of Congress could authorize any person to sue in the federal courts, on the ground of its being a case arising under a law of the United States, it would be in the power of Congress to give unlimited jurisdiction to its courts. But it is only when the state courts disregard or misconstrue the constitution, laws, or treaties, of the United States, that the federal courts have cognizance under that clause of the constitution which declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States.

It is supposed to be absurd to say that the United States have erected a body corporate, and given it a power to sue and be sued in any courts but those of the power creating the corporation. But there is nothing absurd in the idea. Persons are daily becoming citizens of the United States, under an act of Congress, and yet they have no right to sue in the federal courts except in particular cases, and under special circumstances; if the bank can bring itself within one of those cases, and clothe itself with those special circumstances, it may sue in those courts.

But it is contended that it has brought itself within one of those cases, by the averment that the president, directors and company of the bank of the United States are citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, and the defendants citizens of the state of Georgia.

This averment cannot give jurisdiction; because,

1. It is repugnant and void; and,

2. It is contrary to their own showing on the face of the declaration.

1. It is repugnant because the suit is brought in the corporate name. The corporation is the plaintiff, *and it is absurd and impossible [*75 to say that a corporation aggregate is a citizen or citizens. The body politic is the plaintiff, and not the individual stockholders.

2. It is contrary to their own showing, because they have in the declaration expressly averred themselves to be a body corporate, and to sue in that capacity; and an averment relative to the individual characters of the stockholders is in contradiction to the corporate character in which they sue. No corporation aggregate can derive aid from the personal character of its members; nor does it incur any disability from the disabilities of the individuals who compose the society. Neither the infancy, coverture, nor outlawry of the individuals can affect the body corporate.

It is laid down in the books that "an averment contrary to that which appears to the court, shall not avail." (Com. Dig. tit. Pleader.)

But it is said that you may raise the veil which the corporate name interposes, and see who stand behind it. You may strip them of the corporate capacity in which they sue, to give the court a jurisdiction which they cannot claim in their corporate capacity.

But the name of a corporation is not a mere accident. It is substance. It is the knot of its combination. It is its essence. It is the thing itself. (1 Tuck. Bl., 474, 475).

As to the case of ejectment from 4 Dal., 333, the nominal plaintiff must have the same character, as to citizenship, as his lessor; and the court will be astute to see that no deception be practiced upon them to give them a jurisdiction which they could not otherwise exercise.

The authority from 2 Inst., 697, only proves that a corporation aggregate may be adjudged [*76] to be an *inhabitant in respect to its holding of lands, and so as to render those lands liable to taxes for the repair of bridges and highways under the statute of 22 H. VIII., c. 5.

In the case of The King v. The Inhabitants of St. Bartholomews, in 4 Burr., 2435, Lord Mansfield said the corporation were not occupiers. And in Rex v. Gardner (Cowp., 84), the question was, whether a corporation, seized in fee for its own profit, was ratable to the poor, under a law which taxed all inhabitants. The court decided that inasmuch as persons seized in fee were always assessed as inhabitants of the land, if there was no other tenant upon it, a corporation seized in fee should, pro hac vice, be deemed an inhabitant within the meaning of that statute. But this goes but a little way towards proving that a corporation aggregate may be a citizen for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the federal courts; or towards establishing the point that the court will inquire into the individual circumstances of the members of a corporation, for the same purpose.

Of still less weight is the doctrine respecting the visitatorial power in England. That power is given for the express purpose of examining the qualifications of the members, to see whether the charter of the corporation has been adhered to in the election of members, and whether the corporation has acted consistently with the purposes of its creation. It is not a power to examine the character of the individuals to ascertain whether the corporation has a right to sue in a certain court.

At law, a corporation cannot be a trustee. And a court of equity acts in personas to compel the members to perform their corporate functions; but even this doctrine depends upon the mere dictum of a lord chancellor.

In the case cited from 4 Dal., 8, the question respecting the averment of citizenship was not raised. The gentlemen of the bar were not [*77] very *desirous of raising questions as to the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

If denial of justice be a cause of war, as is alleged, the person who claims it must preserve an entirety of character; he must not associate himself with others who have no right to claim it in that form. Foreign nations have no right to prescribe the mode of administering justice to their subjects in this country. If they have the same resort to the same courts which our own citizens enjoy, they cannot complain.

But it is said that the death of all the members of a corporation is a fact which may be pleaded; that cannot be pleaded unless you can go into the question who were the last members of the corporation. And if you can plead anything respecting the individual members, you may plead their citizenship. But if this be true, it must be pleaded in a different manner. The name of each individual must be set forth, and his death averred. And it may well be doubted whether even such a plea would be good; and whether the only remedy would not be by quo warranto; or a rule to show cause.

If the averment in the declaration relate to the body politic, it is repugnant. If to the individual members, it is immaterial. No issue could have been taken upon it. It does not name a single individual member of the corporation. If they had named every individual, it would have appeared that some of them were citizens of Georgia. If the defendant had pleaded that A. B., one of the members, was a citizen of Georgia, it would have been a bad plea, because immaterial and argumentative.

Jones, on the same side, cited (Co. Litt. 66, b; 10 Co., 32, b; 1 Ld. Raym., 80; 2 Cranch, 445; 2 Burr., 1054; 1 Bl. Com., 497, 512; 10 Co., 30; 1 Bl. Com., 502; 1 Leach's Cr. Law, 287).

This cause being argued in connection with the * cases of The Hope Insurance Com- [*78] pany of Providence against Boardman et al. (ante, p. 57), and The Maryland Insurance Company against Wood, post, in the latter of which Mr. Harper was counsel for the defendant in error, he was permitted to reply to the arguments of the plaintiffs in error in this case.

Harper, in reply.

The point of jurisdiction gives rise to two questions.

1. As to the form of the averment.

2. As to the effect of the incorporation on the original character of the members.

1. In the case of The Maryland Insurance Company against Wood, the averment is. "The Marylaud Insurance Company, citizens of the state of Maryland."

This does not mean that the corporation, as such, is a citizen of Maryland, but that the individuals who compose it are citizens. It is the same thing in substance as to say, "The Maryland Insurance Company, a corporate body composed of persons who are citizens of Maryland."

It is objected that such an averment cannot be true; but it is surely possible that all the members of a corporate body may be citizens of one state; and with regard to insurance companies it is almost always true. But if not true, the contrary may be shown.

It is also objected that the averment is defective, because it does not name the individuals who are affirmed to be citizens.

But it may be answered that they need not be named, because they have authority to join in the *suit in their corporate name, and [*79] therefore in that name may make the averment. There is no uncertainty, because it is averred that they are all citizens. But if it were necessary to aver that some were citizens, in that case it would be necessary to show who they were. If the fact be not as averred, it may be pleaded, and the plea may state that A, B and C are members of the corporation, and are citizens of another state.

2. As to the effect of the incorporation.

The question is not whether a corporation can be a citizen in its corporate capacity.

But whether, by becoming members of the corporation, the individuals who compose it lose, in their corporate affairs, those privileges which as individuals they possessed before.

This leads us to inquire into the nature and objects of an incorporation.

1. Of its nature.

It is a privilege conferred on a number of individuals. The corporate body is the form under which the privilege is enjoyed and exercised. The individuals are the substance. It is a fiction of law; the individuals are the real parties. It is a trustee; the individuals are the cestui que trusts.

It is a privilege conferred and accepted. But neither the grant nor the acceptance deprives the party accepting it of other privileges which he before possessed, unless they be incompatible with each other.

Thus the law confers on infants the privilege of being free from the obligation of their contracts; and it takes from them the privilege of acquiring rights under those contracts, because these two privileges are incompatible; but it 80*] does not take *from them the privilege of suing for rights derived otherwise than from their contracts.

So a woman, by entering into wedlock, acquires the privilege of being free from arrest for debt. And she renounces the privilege of making contracts, because that would be incompatible; but she does not renounce the privilege of taking land by descent, gift or devise.

So a man, by entering into civil society, acquires the privilege of being protected by the society; and he renounces the privilege of seeking, by his own force, redress for his wrongs, because incompatible. But he does not renounce the privilege of defending himself against personal violence.

The privileges of a corporation are,

1. To sue and be sued by a corporate name.

2. To have perpetual succession by the transfer or transmission of the shares, &c.

3. To make contracts by which the separate property or persons of the individuals shall not be bound.

These privileges are not incompatible with that now claimed.

But an incorporation is not only a privilege, but it is a privilege conferred on individuals. Individuals are the basis and essence of the corporation. It cannot subsist without them. The law must take notice of them. It must take notice of their character and privileges as individuals. The existence of the corporate body cannot be known without taking notice of the individuals. The most important of its privileges, that of perpetual succession, depends upon it.

If the law cannot notice the privileges of individuals, *neither can it notice their [81 obligations or disabilities.

It may happen that all the members of a corporation may be infants or femes covert. Suppose in an action brought by this corporation the statute of limitations should be pleaded, could not the plaintiff reply the infancy or coverture?

Again, suppose a corporation to have existed and made a contract in Pennsylvania with a citizen of Maryland; suppose that all the members came into Maryland, and after remaining there some time returned to Pennsylvania; and that three years afterwards the corporation brought suit in Maryland, on the contract; could not the statute of limitations be pleaded? And if the plaintiffs should reply absence from the state, might not the defendant rejoin the special matter?

Suppose all the members of a corporation to be outlawed, could not the outlawry be pleaded to an action brought by the corporation?

Suppose the corporation to hold land, and all the members to be attainted of treason, would not the land be forfeited?

Suppose a corporation to be composed entirely of alien enemies, could such a corporation sue? Might not the special matter be pleaded?

The corporate body is the form; the individuals are the substance. The purpose of the incorporation is to enable individuals to transact business more conveniently for their mutual benefit. Individual benefit is the object. The incorporation is the instrument and means, like the fictitious lessee, and casual ejector, in ejectment.

The construction contended for would sacrifice the *substance to the form, and would [82 make the means defeat the end.

The corporation is a fiction of law; the individual members are the real parties. But fictions of law are introduced for the benefit of the real parties, not for their injury; and they are to be so moulded as to answer the purpose. Fictions of law never must shut out the truth. But the construction contended for would set up a fiction against the truth. The parties here are in fact citizens of different states; but this fiction, it is said, must preclude them from averring the fact.

The corporate body is a trustee. The individual members are the cestui que trusts. It is like infant and prochein ami.

Suppose a man, seized in fee of lands in Pennsylvania, mortgages it to a citizen of that state, and then devises it in fee to a citizen of Maryland in trust for a feme covert also a citizen of Maryland and her heirs. The trustee dies, and his heir, on whom the trust descends, is a citizen of Pennsylvania. The feme covert dies, leaving issue citizens of Maryland, upon whom the trust estate descends.

Cannot the issue, joining the heir of the trustee, bring a bill to redeem in the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania? Would not the court look to the real parties?

Again, suppose an infant citizen of Maryland sues in the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania, by a prochein ami who is a citizen of Pennsylvania, has not that court jurisdiction of the case?

2. Of the object of the incorporation.

It is to confer additional privileges and advantages, not to take away those formerly held. To the privilege of suing in the federal courts in their individual *capacity, was superadded [83 the privilege of so suing in their corporate capacity.

The true construction is, that they should sue and be sued in their corporate capacity, to the whole extent, and in as beneficial a manner, as in their individual capacity.

The construction contended for would restrict the privilege of suing; and would take away one of its most important properties.

One great object in allowing citizens of different states to sue in the federal courts, was to obtain a uniformity of decision in cases of a commercial nature. The most numerous and important class of those cases, and the class in which it is most important to have uniform rules and principles, is that of insurance cases. They are almost wholly confined to corporations, though most frequently, in fact, between citizens of different states.

Ingersoll, on the same side, and also in reply to the argument of Mr. Adams, in the case of The Hope Insurance Company v. Boardman, et al.

The character of the corporation must follow the character of its members. The averment of the citizenship of its members is sufficient. But it is clear that a corporation aggregate cannot be a citizen. An avermeut of residence is not sufficient. (1 Cranch, 343, Abercrombie v. Dupuis.) The place of its establishment does not make it a citizen. It is not necessary, under its charter, that all the members of The Hope Insurance Compauy of Provideuce should be citizens of the state of Rhode Island. The declaration in that case does not even aver either the corporation or its members to be citizens of any state whatever. If any one of the members be a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought, the federal court has no jurisdiction. (3 Cranch, 267, Strawbridge v. Curtiss.)

84*] *It is a bold proposition to say that no corporation can sue in the federal courts. It would be in hostility to the spirit of the constitution, and would deprive the citizens of one state of that chance of justice in their contests with citizens of another state, which the coustitution intended to secure to all; and this merely because they have been enabled to sue under a fictitious name.

Every corporation aggregate must be composed of uatural persons, and courts of law will take notice of them as members of the corporate body. If a suit be brought by or agaiust the inhabitants of an incorporated town, the court will inquire whether any of the jurors or wituesses are inhabitants. So a corporate body may own an American registered ship, and one of the corporation may take the necessary oaths.

Numerous cases have already been decided in the federal courts, in which a corporation has been a party, involving the right of property to the amount of millions. What will become of all these cases? In all the cases within the last five years writs of error will be brought.

In ejectmeut, the court, on a question of jurisdiction, always inquires who are the real parties.

The constitution declares that the judicial power shall extend to "controversies" "between citizens of different states." It is necessary, therefore, that the court should inquire between whom the real controversy exists.

March 15. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opiuion of the court as follows:

Two points have been made in this cause.

1. That a corporation, composed of citizens

85*] of *one state, may sue a citizen of another state, in the federal courts.

2. That a right to sue in those courts is conferred on this bank by the law which incorporates it.

The last point will be first considered.

The judicial power of the United States, as defined in the constitutiou, is dependent, 1st. On the nature of the case; and, 2d. On the character of the parties.

By the judicial act, the jurisdiction of the circuit courts is extended to cases where the constitutional right to plead and be impleaded, in the courts of the Union, depends ou the character of the parties; but where that right depends on the uature of the case, the circuit courts derive no jurisdiction from that act, except in the single case of a controversy between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants from differeut states.

Unless, then, jurisdiction over this cause has been given to the Circuit Court by some other than the judicial act, the bank of the United States had not a right to sue in that court, upon the principle that the case arises under a law of the Uuited States.

The plaiutiffs contend that the incorporating act confers this jurisdiction.

That act creates the corporation, gives it a capacity to make coutracts and to acquire property, and enables it "to sue aud be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record, or any other place whatsoever."

This power, if not iucident to a corporatiou, is conferred by every incorporating act, and is not understood to enlarge the jurisdiction of any particular court, but to give a capacity to the corporation to *appear, as a corpora- [86 tion, in any court which would, by law, have cognizance of the cause, if brought by iudividuals. If jurisdiction is given by this clause to the federal courts, it is equally given to all courts having original jurisdictiou, and for all sums however small they may be.

But the 9th article of the 7th seetion of the act furnishes a conclusive argument against the construction for which the plaiutiffs coutend. That section subjects the president and directors, in their individual capacity, to the suit of any person aggrieved by their putting into circulation more notes than is permitted by law, and expressly authorizes the bringing of that action in the federal or state courts.

This evinces the opinion of Congress, that the right to sue does not imply a right to sue in the courts of the Union unless it be expressed. This idea is strengthened also by the law respecting patent rights. That law expressly recognizes the right of the patentee to sue in the circuit courts of the United States.

The court, then, is of opiuion, that no right is conferred on the bauk, by the act of incorporation, to sue in the federal courts.

2. The other point is one of much more difficulty.

The jurisdiction of this court being limited, so far as respects the character of the parties in this particular case, "to controversies between citizens of differeut states," both parties must be citizens, to come within the description.

That invisible, intangible, and artificial beiug, that mere legal entity, a corporatiou aggregate, is certainly not a citizen; and, consequently, cannot sue or be sued iu the courts of the United States, unless the rights of the members, in this respect, can be exercised in their corporate name. If the corporation *be [87 considered as a mere faculty, and not as a company of individuals, who, in transacting their joint concerns, may use a legal name, they must be excluded from the courts of the Union.

The duties of this court, to exercise jurisdiction where it is conferred, and not to usurp it where it is not conferred, are of equal obligation. The constitution, therefore, and the law, are to be expounded, without a leaning the one way or the other, according to those general principles which usually govern in the construction of fundamental or other laws.

A constitution, from its nature, deals in generals, not in detail. Its framers cannot perceive minute distinctions which arise in the progress of the nation, and therefore confine it to the establishment of broad and general principles.

The judicial department was introduced into the American constitution under impressions, and with views, which are too apparent not to be perceived by all. However true the fact may be, that the tribunals of the states will administer justice as impartially as those of the nation, to parties of every description, it is not less true that the constitution itself either entertains apprehensions on this subject, or views with such indulgence the possible fears and apprehensions of suitors, that it has established national tribunals for the decision of controversies between aliens and a citizen, or between citizens of different states. Aliens, or citizens of different states, are not less susceptible of these apprehensions, nor can they be supposed to be less the objects of constitutional provision, because they are allowed to sue by a corporate name. That name, indeed, cannot be an alien or a citizen; but the persons whom it represents may be the one or the other; and the controversy is, in fact and in law, between those persons suing in their corporate character, by their corporate name, for a corporate right, and the individual against whom the suit may be 88] instituted. Substantially *and essentially, the parties in such a case, where the members of the corporation are aliens, or citizens of a different state from the opposite party, come within the spirit and terms of the jurisdiction conferred by the constitution on the national tribunals.

Such has been the universal understanding on the subject. Repeatedly has this court decided causes between a corporation and an individual without feeling a doubt respecting its jurisdiction. Those decisions are not cited as authority; for they were made without considering this particular point; but they have much weight, as they show that this point neither occurred to the bar or the bench; and that the common understanding of intelligent men is in favor of the right of incorporated aliens, or citizens of a different state from the defendant, to sue in the national courts. It is by a course of acute, metaphysical and abstruse reasoning, which has been most ably employed on this occasion, that this opinion is shaken.

As our ideas of a corporation, its privileges and its disabilities, are derived entirely from the English books, we resort to them for aid, in ascertaining its character. It is defined as a mere creature of the law, invisible, intangible and incorporeal. Yet, when we examine the subject further, we find that corporations have been included within terms of description appropriated to real persons.

The statute of Henry VIII. concerning bridges and highways, enacts, that bridges and highways shall be made and repaired by the "inhabitants of the city, shire, or riding," and that the justices shall have power to tax every "inhabitant of such city," &c., and that the collectors may "distrain every such inhabitant as shall be taxed and refuse payment thereof, in his lands, goods and chattels."

Under this statute those have been construed inhabitants who hold lands within the city where the *bridge to be repaired lies, [89 although they reside elsewhere.

Lord Coke says, "every corporation and body politic residing in any county, riding, city, or town corporate, or having lands or tenements in any shire, quæ propriis manibus et sumptibus possident et habent, are said to be inhabitants there, within the purview of this statute."

The tax is not imposed on the person, whether he be a member of the corporation or not, who may happen to reside on the lands; but is imposed on the corporation itself, and, consequently, this ideal existence is considered as an inhabitant, when the general spirit and purpose of the law requires it.

In the case of the King v. Gardner, reported by Cowper, a corporation was decided, by the Court of King's bench, to come within the description of "occupiers or inhabitants." In that case the poor rates to which the lands of the corporation were declared to be liable, were not assessed to the actual occupant, for there was none, but to the corporation. And the principle established by the case appears to be, that the poor rates on vacant ground belonging to a corporation, may be assessed to the corporation, as being inhabitants or occupiers of that ground. In this case Lord Mansfield notices and overrules an inconsiderate dictum of Justice Yates, that a corporation could not be an inhabitant or occupier.

These opinions are not precisely in point; but they serve to show that, for the general purposes and objects of a law, this invisible, incorporeal creature of the law may be considered as having corporeal qualities.

It is true that as far as these cases go they serve to show that the corporation itself, in its incorporeal character, may be considered as an inhabitant or an occupier; and the argument from them would be more strong in favor of considering the corporation *itself as endowed [90 for this special purpose with the character of a citizen, than to consider the character of the individuals who compose it as a subject which the court can inspect, when they use the name of the corporation, for the purpose of asserting their corporate rights. Still the cases show that this technical definition of a corporation does not uniformly circumscribe its capacities, but that courts for legitimate purposes will contemplate it more substantially.

There is a case, however, reported in 12 Mod. which is thought precisely in point. The corporation of London brought a suit against Wood, by their corporate name, in the Mayor's Court. The suit was brought by the mayor and commonalty, and was tried before the mayor and aldermen. The judgment rendered in this cause was brought before the Court of King's bench and reversed, because the court was deprived of its jurisdiction by the character of the individuals who were members of the corporation.

In that case the objection, that a corporation was an invisible, intangible thing, a mere incorporeal legal entity, in which the characters of the individuals who composed it were completely merged, was urged and was considered. The judges unanimously declared that they could look beyond the corporate name, and notice the character of the individual. In the opinions, which were delivered seriatim, several cases are put which serve to illustrate the principle and fortify the decision.

The case of The Mayor and Commonalty v. Wood, is the stronger because it is on the point of jurisdiction. It appears to the court to be a full authority for the case now under consideration. It seems not possible to distinguish them from each other.

If, then, the Congress of the United States had, in terms, enacted that incorporated aliens 91] might sue *a citizen, or that the incorporated citizens of one state might sue a citizen of another state, in the federal courts, by its corporate name, this court would not have felt itself justified in declaring that such a law transcended the constitution.

The controversy is substantially between aliens, suing by a corporate name, and a citizen, or between citizens of one state, suing by a corporate name, and those of another state. When these are said to be substantially the parties to the controversy, the court does not mean to liken it to the case of a trustee. A trustee is a real person capable of being a citizen or an alien, who has the whole legal estate in himself. At law, he is the real proprietor, and he represents himself, and sues in his own right. But in this case the corporate name represents persons who are members of the corporation.

If the constitution would authorize Congress to give the courts of the Union jurisdiction in this case, in consequence of the character of the members of the corporation, then the judicial act ought to be construed to give it. For the term citizen ought to be understood as it is used in the constitution, and as it is used in other laws. That is, to describe the real persons who come into court, in this case, under their corporate name.

That corporations composed of citizens are considered by the legislature as citizens, under certain circumstances, is to be strongly inferred from the registering act. It never could be intended that an American registered vessel, abandoned to an insurance company composed of citizens, should lose her character as an American vessel; and yet this would be the consequence of declaring that the members of the corporation were, to every intent and purpose, out of view, and merged in the corporation.

The court feels itself authorized by the case in 12 Mod., on a question of jurisdiction, to 92] look to *the character of the individuals who compose the corporation, and they think that the precedents of this court, though they were not decisions on argument, ought not to be absolutely disregarded.

If a corporation may sue in the courts of the Union, the court is of opinion that the averment in this case is sufficient.

Being authorized to sue in their corporate name, they could make the averment, and it must apply to the plaintiffs as individuals, because it could not be true as applied to the corporation.

Judgment reversed; plea in abatement overruled, and cause remanded.

Judge Livingston, having an interest in the question, gave no opinion.

MATTHEWS v. ZANE'S LESSEE.

The lands included within the Zaneville district by the act of the 3d March, 1803, could not, after that date, be sold at the Marietta land-office.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio for the county of Muskingum, in an action of ejectment brought by Zane's Lessee against Matthews, in which both parties claimed title under the laws of the United States. The question of jurisdiction in this case was settled at last term. (Ante. vol. 4, p. 382.)

The remaining question was, whether the plaintiff in error, or the defendant, had the title to the west fraction of section No. 15, in township No. 12, in range No. 13, in the state of Ohio.

This question arose upon a special verdict, which stated the following facts.

On the 7th of February, 1804, the office of receiver *of public moneys at Marietta [93 then being vacant, Matthews applied to the register of the land-office at Marietta, for the purchase of that fraction, who received the application, and gave Matthews a certificate thereof.

On the 26th of March, 1804, a register and receiver were appointed for the Zaneville district, and also a receiver of public moneys for the Marietta district, who commenced the duties of his office on the first of May, in that year.

After the 12th of May, in the same year, Matthews purchased the land at the Marietta land-office, by making such payments, and receiving such certificates, as are prescribed by law.

On the 21st of May, 1804, the land-office was first opened at Zaneville, and the sales of land commenced therein.

On the 17th of the same May, a schedule was forwarded from the Surveyor General, purporting to be a complete list of the lands lying within the Zaneville district, which had been before sold at the Marietta land-office, and in which the land in controversy was not included.

Subsequent to the passage of the law for the erection of the Zaneville district, and prior to the time when the office of receiver of public moneys for the Marietta district became vacant, two entries were made in the Marietta land-office, of land lying within the Zaneville district, which entries and sales were acknowledged as good and valid by the government of he United States, who considered Matthews's entry as void, and the Secretary of the Treasury has directed his purchase money to be repaid to him. The two tracts, the sales of which were confirmed by the government of the United States, were in the Surveyor General's schedule returned as sold at Marietta; but the land in controversy was not included in that schedule, because 94] *the register of the land-office at Marietta had not made his return, as by law directed, to the Surveyor General, who had no guide by which to make out the schedule, but the returns of the register. The officers of the Zaneville land-office were directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive the schedule as the only evidence of what land had been sold at Marietta.

On the 26th of May, 1804, Zane purchased, at the Zaneville land-office, the land in controversy, by making such payments, and receiving such a certificate, as by law are prescribed, at which time Matthews produced his certificate from the register of the Marietta land-office, and gave notice of his having purchased the same land.

Zane's purchase was confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

P. B. Key, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the purchase made by Matthews was legal and valid. And,

2. That the defendant in error was not entitled to recover.

That this subject may be distinctly understood, it may be necessary concisely to state the land system of the United States.

In 1785, the old Congress passed an ordinance for the survey and sale of public lands in the north-western territory. Seven ranges of townships were laid off, and sales made at New York, to a considerable extent. The Indian wars that soon followed, closed the sales. But after General Wayne's treaty at Greeneville, in 1795, Congress took up the subject again, and in May, 1796, passed an act for appointing a surveyor general, and directing surveys and sales. (Vol. 3, p. 293.) These surveys could not be completed till the end of the year 1799. The act 95] *of the 10th of May, 1800, (vol. 5, p. 174), established the present system, by which four land-offices were to be opened, viz., at Cincinnati, Chilicothe, Marietta and Steubenville. That at Marietta was for the lands lying east of the sixteenth range of townships, south of the military lands, and south of a line drawn due west from the north-west corner of the first township of the second range to the military lands. A register of the land-office, and a receiver of public moneys, was to be appointed for each of the offices. A person wishing to purchase any of the lands was to pay to the Treasurer of the United States, or the receiver of public moneys, one-twentieth part of the purchase money besides certain fees, and take his receipt therefor, which he was to carry to the register, who was to enter his application in a book, stating the date of the application, the date of the receipt, and the number of the section, or half section, township and range applied for. No lands were to be sold at less than two dollars an acre, one-fourth, including the one-twentieth, in forty days, one-fourth in two years, one-fourth in three years, and the residue in four years, with interest. A discount of 8 per cent. per annum was to be allowed for prompt payment. Upon payment of the whole purchase money, a patent was to be issued by the President of the United States.

Thus stood the land system, and the mode of purchasing and acquiring title until Congress, desirous of bringing more lands into the market, passed an act on the 3d of March, 1803 (vol. 6, p. 291), by the 6th section of which a new district was created called the Zaneville district, which covered part of the lands in Marietta district, and, among others, the lands in controversy, and certain lands in the military tract which had not been surveyed. This act did not prescribe the time when the land-office should be opened at Zaneville, nor when the officers should be appointed.

The first question which presents itself under this law is, did it prevent a continuance of sales at Marietta, *of the lands which had been [96 surveyed in that district, and now included in the Zaneville district?

We contend it did not.

All these laws are to be construed together as forming one system. The two great principles of the system are,

Settlement of the western frontier, and revenue to be derived from the sales of the lands.

The importance of the first, and the policy of settling the western frontier, are too obvious for illustration. It has been an object of anxiety at all times from the first organization of the Union.

As an object of revenue it has been the incessant subject of attention, and of primary importance. The proceeds of the sales were in 1790 assigned to the sinking fund. With a view to facilitate sales, the lands have been divided into sections and half sections. Discounts and abatement of interest have been allowed on prompt payment. The sale of the western lands, therefore, being a leading object of national policy, it is to be presumed that they were not to cease unless by positive law.

There is nothing in the act creating the Zaneville district to prevent a sale at Marietta, before the Zaneville office should be opened.

There is nothing repugnant to such a construction. Both acts may so far stand together, and be consistent with each other and with the general policy of the United States.

The 5th and 6th sections of the act of 1803, taken together, show that a previous survey was to be made of the unappropriated military lands which were to form a part of the Zaneville district, before the sales could commence there.

*The 4th section of the act of 1800, [97 gave full powers to the Marietta land office to sell all the lands within that district.

This power exists until destroyed, and cannot be repealed by doubtful implication against the great national policy and the scope of the laws. It was well understood that the Zaneville land-office could not be opened until a survey should be made. Officers were to be appointed; and none were appointed until a year after, because they could not act until the surveys should be completed, and the lands ready for sale.

This shows what construction the executive gave to the law. The Surveyor General also returned a list of sales made at Marietta, up to the 17th of May, 1804. All the sales upon that list have been confirmed by the treasury.

In the course of the year 1803 a survey was made, and Congress, by the act of the 26th of March, 1804 (vol. 7, p. 106, § 12), opened the Zaneville land-office on the 21st of May, 1804, and directed the sales to commence there on that day.

Is it a reasonable construction to contend that 700,000 acres should be locked up from market for a whole year, when every act of the government demonstrated their anxiety to make sales.

The act of 1803 described limits within which an office was erected for future sales, but the opening of that office and proceeding to sell was to be settled by a future law. This was done, and the office directed to go into operation on the 21st of May, 1804. Until that period the office at Marietta might proceed to sell.

This construction derives weight from an analogous case, a case also of revenue.

Suppose a district, for the collection of duties, 98] divided, *and a new port of entry established, and a collector to be appointed, would this put a stop to the entry and collection at the first port until the second office was open for business?

If Matthews's purchase had been inserted in the Surveyor General's schedule, it would have been confirmed by the treasury for the same reason that the two other similar sales were confirmed.

The reason why it was not upon that schedule was the neglect of the register. Shall the neglect or omission of his duty by an officer of the United States prejudice the claim of an innocent purchaser?

The schedule of the Surveyor General was not the only admissible evidence of sales at the Marietta office. There was no statute, nor any principle of law, which made it such. It was a matter in pais, which might be proved by any kind of legal evidence. The register's certificate which Matthews produced at the Zaneville office at the time and place of sale to Zane, was the very best evidence which could then be required; and it ought to have been respected. Zane purchased with a full knowledge of Matthews's title.

Harper, contra, contended that the authority to sell at Zaneville was inconsistent with the authority to sell at Marietta; and that consequently the latter was revoked by the former. When the act of March 3, 1803, directed that these lands should be offered for sale at Zaneville, they could no longer be sold elsewhere. The act provides for the appointment of officers to sell. Congress had only to create the office. The President was to appoint the officers, under the general authority given to him by the constitution. If the President did not appoint, that did not prevent the effect of the act. The President cannot dispense with the law, nor suspend its operation.

The act of the 26th of March, 1804 (vol. 7, 99] p. 106), *directs positively that the lands shall be offered for sale at Zaneville on the third Monday of May.

No quarter sections or fractions of sections of this land could be sold elsewhere. This act of the 26th of March, 1804, first gave the power to sell the fractions of sections separately. It could not be done at Marietta until the 14th of May, 1804, yet Matthews's purchase was on the 12th, so that even if this land could have been sold at Marietta at all, it could not, on the 12th of May, have been sold separately from a section; nor could have been sold until it had first been offered at public auction.

P. B. Key, in reply.

The purchase of this fraction was with a whole section, and therefore the fact does not support the argument on the other side.

The only questions are whether the authority to sell these lands at the Marietta office ceased before the Zaneville office was opened; and whether the neglect of the register to make a return of this sale to the Surveyor General shall prejudice the claim of the plaintiff in error.

February 16. MARSHALL, Ch. J., stated the opinion of the court to be that the decision of the court below was correct; that the erection of the Zaneville district suspended the power of sale in the Marietta district.

Judgment affirmed.

*HODGSON [*100
v.
THE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY OF ALEXANDRIA.

A general policy, insuring every person having an interest in the thing insured, and containing no warranty that the property is neutral, covers belligerent as well as neutral property.

In an action of covenant on a policy, it is no defense to say that the premium has not been paid, but is enjoined by a court of chancery.

A misrepresentation, not averred to be material, is no bar to an action on a policy. A misrepresentation, to have that effect, must be material to the risk of the voyage.

It is not necessary, in an action of covenant on a policy, that the declaration should aver that the plaintiff had abandoned to the underwriters.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, in an action of covenant upon a sealed policy, whereby the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria, in consideration of seventeen and a half per cent. premium paid by the plaintiff Hodgson, for "George F. Straas and others, of Richmond," covenanted with the plaintiff for the said "George F. Straas and others, of Richmond, as well in his own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person and persons to whom the same did, might, or should appertain, in part or in all," to insure eight thousand dollars on the brig Hope "a prize vessel," lost or not lost, at and from her last port of lading in St. Domingo to a port of discharge in the Chesapeake. The vessel was valued in the policy at ten thousand dollars. The declaration averred the vessel to be of that value, and that in prosecution of the voyage insured she was seized by certain British vessels and carried into Jamaica, where she was libeled, condemned and sold, whereby she was totally lost. In one count of the declaration the vessel was averred to be the property of George F. Straas and Jereiniah Leeds, of Richmond, in the other it was averred to be the property of Leeds alone.

The defendants, after oyer, pleaded eight pleas. Upon the three first there were issues in fact.

The 4th plea, in substance, was, that the vessel, at the time of the capture and sale was the property of the enemies of Great Britain, and as such was captured, libeled, condemned and sold. That Richmond was the capital town of the state of Virginia, a neutral state. That Straas and Leeds were of Richmond, and citi-
101*] zens of Virginia, and were *known to be so to the parties to the policy at the time of insurance. That the insurance was made by the contracting parties upon the property of American citizens in which no belligerent subject or citizen was interested; and that at the time of insurance, capture, condemnation and sale of the vessel, there was open war between France and Great Britain.

To this plea there was a demurrer, and the following causes were stated:

1. Because the plea alleges that the vessel was the property of the enemies of Great Britain, but does not show in particular who were the owners thereof.

2. Because the plea is double in this, 1st. That it tenders an issue upon the fact of its being enemies' property; 2d. That it was condemned as such; 3d. That the insurance was made upon the property of American citizens.

3. Because it alleges that the insurance was made upon the property of American citizens, which is matter of law, and not of fact.

4. Because, as the policy contained no warranty of neutrality, it is wholly immaterial whether the property was neutral or belligerent.

5. Because the plea is no answer to the plaintiff's declaration.

6. Because it admits Straas and Leeds to be owners of the property insured, and to be American citizens, and it does not state any other person or persons to be the owners thereof.

7. Because the defendants were estopped by the policy from alleging that the insurance was made upon the property of American citizens.

102*] *The 5th plea, in substance, was, that it has always been, and is the rule and practice of the defendants, never to make an insurance upon a vessel beyond her reasonable and just value according to the representation and description given of her, especially as to her age, tonnage and equipment, which rule and practice were well known to the contracting parties at the time of the contract, at which time the plaintiff proposed to the defendants that the value of the vessel should be agreed in the policy to be ten thousand dollars; and that at the time of executing the policy, the plaintiff, to induce the defendants to execute it, thereby insuring to the value of 8,000 dollars upon the vessel, represented that she was "about 250 tons burthen," "and from six to seven years old." That the defendants, in consequence of that representation, and placing full faith and credit therein, executed the policy. That the representation was untrue in this, that the vessel was not of two hundred and fifty tons burthen, but less than one hundred and sixty-five tons burthen, and was not from six to seven years old at the time of the representation, but much older, viz., more than eight and a half years old. That the vessel was not of the value of eight thousand dollars, but of the value of 3,000 dollars only. That the misrepresentation respecting the age and tonnage of the vessel induced the defendants to execute the policy, whereby the value was agreed to be ten thousand dollars, and whereby insurance was made to the amount of 8,000 dollars; "and so the said deed is void as to them; and this they are ready to verify."

To this plea also there was a demurrer, and the following causes were stated:

1. Because the plea does not aver the misrepresentation to be material.

2. Because it is not alleged to have been fraudulently made.

3. Because the matter of the plea is not sufficient to annul or make void the policy.

*4. Because the misrepresentation [103 alleged is not of a definite fact; but that the vessel was of about 250 tons burthen, &c.

5. Because the plea is double in this, that it puts in issue the custom of the defendants, the representation touching the vessel, the age, the tonnage and the value of the vessel.

6. Because the defendants are estopped by the policy from averring that the vessel was of less value than 10,000 dollars.

The 6th plea was like the 5th, except that the averment respecting the rule and practice of the defendants was omitted, and that it contained an averment that the difference between the true and the represented age and tonnage of the vessel "was material in regard to the contract of insurance," in the policy set forth; and so the policy was void as to them.

To this plea the plaintiff, protesting that the vessel was seaworthy, and that he did not knowingly and fraudulently state any misrepresentation, and admitting that the vessel was of less than 165 tons burthen, and was eight and a half years old, replied, that the difference between the true and the represented age and tonnage of the vessel, was not material in regard to the seaworthiness of the vessel, and her ability to perform the voyage insured, and did not increase the probability of loss by means of any of the risks insured against, but was altogether immaterial in regard to those risks.

The rejoinder of the defendants set forth their rule and practice as stated in the 5th plea; and averred that the misrepresentation induced and deceived the defendants into the agreement as to the value of the vessel, and as to the sum insured, and that the sum insured was more than double the value of the vessel, and so the defendants say that the difference between the true and the represented age and tonnage of the vessel was material.

*To this rejoinder the plaintiff demur- [104 red, and stated causes of demurrer nearly like those to the 5th plea.

The 7th plea was, in substance, that the vessel was in part owned by one Alexander Burot, a French citizen, and an enemy of Great Britain, and that this fact was not disclosed to the defendants at the time of executing the policy.

To this plea there was a general demurrer.

The 8th plea was, in substance, that the plaintiff had not paid the premium, but had obtained a perpetual injunction from the Court of Chancery in Virginia, against the defendants, to prevent the recovery thereof.

To this plea also there was a general demurrer.

The judgment of the court below was in favor of the defendants on the demurrer to the 6th plea, and in favor of the plaintiff upon all the other demurrers.

Swann, for the plaintiff in error.

It is a sufficient answer to the 4th plea, that the policy is general; it contains no warranty of neutrality, and therefore covers belligerent as well as neutral property. (1 N. Y. T. Rep., 230, 238, 243; 2 Emerig., 460; Doug., 16; Marsh., 286.)

The objections to the 5th plea are,

1. That no misrepresentation touching the subject of a sealed contract is sufficient, in a court of law, to set it aside.

The insurance cases against incorporated companies in England show that an equitable defense may be made in that country under the statutes. All other cases upon insurances are cases of simple contract.

105*] *This question then depends upon the general principles of the common law. By that law a misrepresentation touching the subject of a sealed contract was not pleadable against that contract.

It is true that any fraud in the execution of an instrument which will authorize the plea of non est factum, may be relied on at law. (1 Burr., 391.) So you may show that the consideration of a deed is unlawful, as in the cases of usury, gaming, simony, &c. But this plea shows no fraud, nor unlawful consideration. It relies merely upon a mistake which goes only to a part of the subject matter of the contract.

2. The misrepresentation set forth in this plea would not be sufficient to vacate the policy, even if it were a simple contract. The misrepresentation must relate to the risk, and be material as it regards the risk. All the cases speak a uniform language upon this subject. (Marsh., 334, 335; Park, 197, 204, 205; 1 N. Y. T. Rep., 237, 238, 245.)

If the representation must be material in regard to the risk, the plea is bad in substance; because it does not show any facts which would increase the risk, nor aver the representation to be material to the risk.

3. As the misrepresentation relates to the value of the vessel, and not to the risk of the voyage, the defendants are estopped from alleging that the vessel was worth less than the value agreed upon in the policy.

4. In a valued policy the underwriter waives all inquiry into any fact or circumstance that relates to the value of the thing insured: and the extent or amount of value in such a policy is altogether immaterial. (Park, 1, 109.)

The 6th plea concludes by saying that the 106] representation *was material in regard to the contract of insurance.

This averment is difficult to be understood. It might mean material as it regarded the amount insured, or material as it regarded the risk. If issue had been taken upon this averment, the jury might have decided that the representation was material as it regarded the amount insured; and upon that ground the cause might have been lost. If the plaintiff had demurred to it, it might have been an admission that it was material to the risk. If the averment had been that it was material as to the amount insured, we should have demurred; if it had been that it was material to the risk, we should have taken issue.

In this uncertainty it was necessary for the plaintiff to reply specially, tendering an issue as to the materiality of the representation in regard to the risk of the voyage. This issue the defendants refused to join, and have thereby explained their averment to be that the representation was material, not to the risk, but to the amount insured. In this point of view it is bad not only for the reasons alleged against the 5th plea, but because it neither shows nor avers the representation to be material in regard to the risk.

No falsehood or misrepresentation; not increasing the risk, is material. No misrepresentation touching the ability of the vessel to perform the voyage can be material if she is seaworthy. The law does not notice grades of seaworthiness; and with regard to this point her age and tonnage were perfectly immaterial: and it was equally immaterial as to the value, because the value was conclusively fixed in the policy.

E. J. Lee and C. Lee, contra, contended, 1st. That the expression "of Richmond" implied a warranty that the property was neutral, and the condemnation was conclusive evidence of a breach of that *warranty. 2d. That [107 the declaration was bad because it contained no averment of an offer to abandon; and, 3d. That the misrepresentation, as stated, amounts to a fraud in law, and that fraud will vacate every kind of instrument; and that in all cases of insurance any misrepresentation material to the contract is fatal.

It is because it is a valued policy, that the misrepresentation as to the age and tonnage became material to the contract. It was a misrepresentation of those facts upon which a judgment was to be formed of the value of the vessel. The defendants never would have agreed to fix that value, unless they had believed the representation of the plaintiff as to those facts. The misrepresentation induced the defendants to make a contract which they would not otherwise have made. It is unnecessary that the plaintiff should have known that he was misrepresenting the facts.

He undertook to represent the facts, and by so doing must take the risk of their truth, and the consequences of their falsehood.

The materiality was a question for the jury. Whenever the question of law is involved with the fact, the court may leave the whole to the jury.

The plea is not double. A misrepresentation may be in a variety of particulars necessary for the formation of a correct judgment as to the value.

The defendants are not estopped by their deed from alleging facts which show the mistake, or misrepresentation upon which the instrument was predicated; because if the deed be void the estoppel cannot exist.

If the goods of an enemy be insured as the goods of an ally, the policy is void. The only question on this point is, whether the vessel was insured as an American vessel.

108*] *The payment of the premium is forever enjoined, and nothing can be more unjust than to compel the defendants to pay the loss.

Jones, in reply, was directed by the court to confine his observations to the 5th and 6th pleas.

No fraud or covin is charged in either of those pleas; the doctrines, therefore, respecting a sealed instrument being vacated by fraud, do not apply. The case depends upon the principles of the common law applicable to contracts under seal.

The 5th and 6th pleas are in substance the same; and if the 5th be bad, as the court below decided, the 6th must be bad for the same reasons.

There is no case in which a sealed instrument has been set aside on the grounds alleged in the plea. If the facts would not maintain an action of deceit, they will not avoid a contract under seal. They cannot even be given in evidence.

109*] It must be a *matter that goes to the whole contract, and shows it to be void ab initio. It must be an allegation of fraud, or of illegal consideration.

The case of Hayne v. Maltby (3 T. R. 438), is the only one cited which bears upon the present. But there the contract was void ab initio, and the case was decided upon the principle of fraud. It is immaterial what the facts of the case were, or how slight the evidence of fraud was. It is the principle only which is to be considered.

In an action at law upon a sealed contract you cannot go into the question of consideration, but to show it fraudulent or illegal. (2 Cro., 4, Chandler v. Lopus; 1 Com. Dig., 184; 2 East, 446.)

February 24. CUSHING, J. (Marshall, Ch. J., not sitting in the cause), delivered the opinion of the court[1] as follows:

The insurance in this case being general, as well for the parties named as "for all and every other person or persons to whom the vessel did or might appertain," and containing no warranty of neutrality, belligerent as well as American property was covered by it. Some of the parties being described as of Richmond, does not necessarily imply that they all resided there; but if they did, mere residence would not make them citizens; and even then, an express warranty was necessary, if it had been designed to run only a neutral risk. This is an answer to the 7th as well as to the 4th plea; because there can be no undue concealment as to the parties interested, where the terms of the policy are so broad as to preclude the necessity, either of disclosing their names, or of inserting them in the instrument.

*The 8th plea is also bad. The de- [110 fendants acknowledge, under seal, to have received a consideration of 17 1-2 per cent. for the insurance they made, which it appears was secured by a note, the amount of which was to be deducted from the sum to be paid for a loss, if any happened. On the face of the instrument, then, a valid consideration, if that be necessary, is stated, and if the note be never paid it cannot vacate the contract, or be relied on as a defense to an action on it. This court knows not why a court of equity has been applied to for an injunction. Its proceedings, therefore, can have no influence on the present suit, for notwithstanding its interposition in the way mentioned in this plea, the defendants cannot be deprived of the right they have reserved of deducting the amount of premium from whatever sum they may have to pay for the loss that has occurred.

Without deciding whether a material misrepresentation, not fraudulent, can be pleaded in avoidance of a sealed instrument, the court thinks there is no fact disclosed by either the fifth or sixth plea which could vacate an insurance were it only a simple contract. In no part of the 5th plea is the misrepresentation alleged to be material. It is only to be inferred that it had some influence (but to what degree does not appear) in prevailing on the defendants to agree to so high a valuation. It will hardly, however, be insisted, that every over-valuation, however inconsiderable, or however innocently produced, will annul a contract of this nature. It would seem more reasonable to let mistakes of this kind (if they are to have any operation at all) regulate the extent of recovery, and not deprive the party of his whole indemnity: for if an extravagant valuation be made, an underwriter cannot reasonably ask to be relieved beyond the excess complained of. The allegation that the vessel was worth, when insured, only 3,000 dollars, is also very unimportant, it being nowhere stated that the plaintiff represented her to be worth more, but only proposed that her value in the policy should be agreed *at ten thou- [111 sand dollars. Now, although she might not in fact have been worth this sum, it is impossible for the court to say that this difference was produced entirely by the mistake which was made in her age and tonnage. This would be to say that a difference of a year or two in the age, and of fifty or sixty tons in the burden of a vessel, must, in all cases, have the same effect on her value; a conclusion which, on investigation, would be found very incorrect. Nor, if it appeared on trial that her actual worth were no more than 3,000 dollars, would it necessarily avoid the contract, or restrict the damages to that sum; for she may, notwithstanding, have fairly cost her owners the whole amount of her valuation; who, in that case, would have honestly represented her as worth 10,000 dollars.

But a more fatal objection to this plea is, that the misrepresentation relied on is not stated to have been material to the risk of the voyage; and yet the only cases in which policies have been avoided for innocent misrepresentations are those in which the matter disclosed or concealed has affected the risk so as to render it different from the one understood at the time, and on which the premium was calculated.

Most of the remarks on the 5th apply also to the 6th plea: for although it be here alleged that the misrepresentation was material "in regard to the contract of insurance," it should have been stated in what particular, that it might appear whether the risk run were at all affected by it.

An objection is made to the declaration, but not much relied on, that no abandonment is averred to have been made. In covenant such averment cannot be necessary. If it be proved on the trial, it will be sufficient.

The judgment of the Circuit Court on the 4th, 5th, 7th and 8th pleas must be affirmed with costs; and its judgment in favor of the defend-112*] ants on the *6th plea reversed; and judgment on that plea be also rendered for the plaintiff.

JOHNSON, J. The difficulties in this case arise partly from the pleadings, and partly from the case presented by the pleadings.

This policy, having been effected by a corporation under its corporate seal, has been considered as imposing an obligation on the insured to bring covenant instead of assumpsit, as is usual on such contracts.

Thus the defendants have been obliged to plead specially; and the cause comes up on demurrer, which, of course, admits the case as made up on the pleadings.

Whether there is sufficient matter well pleaded why the plaintiff ought not to recover? is therefore the question before us.

I am of opinion that there is. I cannot for a moment suffer the sealing of the policy, or the form of the action, to impose any restriction upon the latitude of defence applicable to the contract of insurance. Such a doctrine would be fatal to every incorporated insurance company. I therefore maintain, that, in the action of covenant on a policy of insurance, every defense may be taken advantage of, in pleading, that could be introduced, in evidence, before a jury. It is an exceedingly inconvenient form of action for trying the merits of questions arising out of this species of contract, and I feel disposed, if possible, to diminish the inevitable difficulties, and the intricate and voluminous pleadings, which must grow out of this form of action, and to admit every facility which the rules of pleading will possibly sanction.

There are eight pleas filed to the present action. On the three first there are issues in fact, and the court below has given judgment on the 113*] remaining *five. I am disposed to concur in their decisions on each of these several pleas, although, perhaps, on some of them, for reasons not altogether the same with those by which they were influenced; but I shall confine my observations solely to the sixth plea, as that disposes of the case finally, if decided for the defendants, and has been the principal subject of the argument before this court.

The substance of this plea is, that the plaintiff misrepresented the age and tonnage of the vessel, whereby the defendants were induced to insure to a higher amount than they otherwise should; and concludes with averring, that the difference between the true age and tonnage of the vessel, and the represented age and tonnage, was material in regard to the contract of insurance.

The plaintiff replies that this misrepresentation was immaterial in regard to the seaworthiness of the vessel, her ability to perform the voyage, and the other risks insured against.

To me it appears that the plea presents the true turning points of the case, and that the replication draws towards questions very different from that which ought to control our decision.

It is not on the doctrine of seaworthiness that a misrepresentation is held to vitiate the policy, because the insured is always held to guarantee the sufficiency of his vessel to perform the voyage insured. Nor is it an evident and necessary increase of the risk; but it is presenting such false lights to the insurer as induce him to enter into a contract materially different from that which he supposes he is entering into. It is a rule of law introduced to protect underwriters from those innumerable frauds which are practiced upon them in a contract which must of necessity be regulated almost wholly by the information derived from the insured.

I do not lay so much stress upon the misrepresentation with regard to the age of the [ 114 vessel; for that appertains much to her seaworthiness; but with regard to her size the misrepresentation was so enormous as leaves no doubt upon my mind that had the case been submitted to a jury, the court would have been bound to charge them in favor of the defendants. It had in its nature an immediate tendency to entrap the defendants into one of the most common and most successful snares laid for the unwary underwriter. To make it the interest of the insured rather to sink than to save his vessel. It can very well be conceived that an underwriter may be induced to insure a certain sum upon a certain vessel for a very moderate premium, when no premium would induce him to insure double that amount upon the same bottom. I am aware of a very considerable difficulty arising out of this case, viz., how we are to estimate the degree of misrepresentation with regard to tonnage which shall vitiate a policy; but it is a difficulty arising out of the mode in which we are drawn into a decision on the case, rather than out of the case itself.

If this question had been brought before a jury, the difficulty would have vanished; but shall the party lose the benefit of this defense because the pleadings have assumed such a shape as to force the court into a decision upon the point without a jury? I am of opinion that he ought not; if it can be avoided; an extreme case may be supposed in which the misrepresentation may be very inconsiderable, as of a single ton for instance; but, on the other hand, we may suppose an extreme case of a misrepresentation to the highest possible number of tons burden, say 1,000 tons; will it be said that, in the latter case, the misrepresentation would not avoid the policy?

From these considerations it seems to result that the court is driven to the necessity of deciding this case upon its intrinsic merits, and reserving its opinion upon successive cases as they shall occur. This necessity is forced upon us by the alternative either to decide that no 115*] misrepresentation, however gross, *of the size of the vessel will avoid a policy, or that any misrepresentation, however minute, will have that effect. It is to be hoped, in the meantime, that some statutory provision may be made which will relieve the court from a similar embarrassment.

Judgment reversed.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
JUDGE PETERS.

The legislature of a state cannot annul the judgments, nor determine the jurisdiction, of the courts of the United States.

The Court of Appeals in prize causes, erected by the Continental Congress, had power to revise and correct the sentences of the state courts of admiralty.

Although the claims of a state may be ultimately affected by the decision of a cause, yet if the state be not necessarily a defendant, the courts of the United States are bound to exercise jurisdiction.

AT the last term Gideon Olmstead, in behalf of himself and Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale, and David Clark, moved the court for a mandamus[1] to be directed to the honorable Richard Peters, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the Pennsylvania District, commanding him to order and direct an attachment or other proper process to issue to enforce obedience to the sentence of the said District Court in a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, in which the said Gideon Olmstead and others were libellants, and Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters were respondents. This motion was made upon a suggestion, supported by affidavit, that a copy of the sentence had been served upon the respondents, which they refused to obey; and that application had been made to the judge for an attachment, which he had refused to grant; whereupon a mandamus nisi was granted returnable to this term; when the judge made the following return:

116*] *"To the Honorable the Supreme Court of the United States,

"The subscriber, judge of the District Court of the United States, in and for the District of Pennsylvania, in obedience to the mandamus issued by order of the Supreme Court in the case of Gideon Olmstead and others, libellants, against the surviving executrixes of the late David Rittenhouse, Esq., and to the said district judge directed, begs leave to return,

"That the proceedings of the District Court in the above cause, which are herewith transmitted, and respectfully submitted, will show the grounds of the judgment by the said court rendered. Every opportunity, through the whole course of these proceedings, was given to the parties to litigate the claim, or discuss questions, either on the merits or jurisdiction. Nor was any step taken without due and timely notice.

"The answer of the respondents will show their objections to the claim of the libellants. This answer refers to an act of assembly of the state of Pennsylvania, passed the 26th day of February, 1801, which was not produced or brought under the legal notice of the court.

"No application for execution of the decree was made until within twelve or eighteen months past; nor has it been, till more recently, much pressed.

"By the suggestion filed by the respondents, their objections to the execution of the decree will appear. They have made an act of assembly of the state of Pennsylvania a part of their suggestion; and thus, for the first time, during the pendency of the suit, brought this act under the judicial notice of the court. It is entitled "An act relating to the claim of this commonwealth against Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters, surviving executrixes of David Rittenhouse, Esq., deceased, passed *April [117 the second, 1803:" and to this act I pray leave to refer.

"This act, or any of its allegations, has no influence on my opinion. Let this opinion be erroneous or correct, a proceeding, in some of its parts, indecorous, and, in others, unjustifiable, can have no operation in rectifying supposed errors, or convincing my judgment. But from prudential, more than other motives, I deemed it best to avoid embroiling the government of the United States and that of Pennsylvania (if the latter government should choose so to do) on a question which has rested on my single opinion, so far as it is touched by my decree: and, under the influence of this sentiment, I have withheld the process required. If this be not considered a legal cause, it must be deemed a candid acknowledgment that I do not invariably obey a rigorous dictate of duty, or follow an inflexibly strict construction of law.

"I entertained a hope that a legislature succeeding that by which the act before mentioned was passed, would, under a more temperate view of the subject, have repealed it; and enabled and directed the executive of the state, or some other authority, to put this case in a legal train of investigation: so that the final judgment and decree of the superior tribunal of the United States might have been, in a proper course, obtained; and thereby any erroneous opinion, or decree, given or made by me, might have been rectified (if any opinion or decree should have been found illegal or erroneous) in a manner more becoming the real dignity of a state, more suitable to the situation of those who execute the duties of a branch of the government of the United States, and more consistent with the good order and peace of the community. This hope was cherished by the proceedings of the legislature of Pennsylvania, in other cases wherein the state claimed interests. This expectation has been disappointed. There being no other legal mode of obtaining the decision of 118] *the superior tribunal of the United States, (the only jurisdiction by which the judgments of inferior courts of the United States can be finally rectified or judicially annulled,) I have thought it proper, and, under all circumstances, fully justifiable, to obtain that decision, by placing the case under the cognizance of your honorable court, in its present form.

1.—On Saturday, March 5th, 1808, upon the affidavit of Olmstead, a rule was granted that Judge Peters should show cause by the next Saturday, why a mandamus should not issue. On Saturday, March 12th, a letter was received by one of the counsel for Olmstead, from Judge Peters, acknowledging service of the rule; and stating that an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania had commanded the governor of that state to call out an armed force to prevent the execution of any process to enforce the performance of the sentence. That such being the state of things he should not direct process to issue unless he should be so ordered by this court; whereupon a mandamus nisi was granted, returnable at the next term.

"On the merits and justice of the claim of the libellants, I have no doubt; but remain of the same opinion I have mentioned in my decree.

"As to the jurisdiction; I have never conceived that the allegations on this point, contained in the act of assembly last mentioned, had legal foundation. It is well known to your honorable court, that third persons claiming interests in pais, cannot, by such claims, constitute themselves, or be judicially considered, parties in suits pending in the names of others. Nor does there now exist any legal mode of interpleading, or compelling states to become parties to suits in the courts of the United States. Yet if your honorable court shall be of opinion that the objections to jurisdiction are relevant, I shall, agreeably to my duty, continue to withhold any farther proceeding. But if, on the other hand, a peremptory direction to execute the decree shall be the consequence of your deliberations, having now the whole case before you, there can be no order or direction, which it is in my legal obligation to obey, to which (impelled by a sense of justice, however I may regret the circumstance, as it respects the parties respondents, or other consequences which may flow from it) I shall more cheerfully submit.

"RICHARD PETERS.

"Philadelphia, July 18th, 1808."

The facts as they appear in the record and documents referred to by the judge, in the above answer, were in substance as follows:

Gideon Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla 119] *Rumsdale and David Clark, citizens and inhabitants of the state of Connecticut, were, during the revolutionary war, captured by the British and carried to Jamaica, where they were put on board the sloop Active to assist as mariners in navigating the sloop to New York, then in possession of the British, with a cargo of supplies for the fleets and armies of Great Britain. During which voyage, about the 6th of September, 1778, they rose upon the master and crew of the sloop, confined them to the cabin, took the command of the vessel and steered for Egg Harbor, in the state of New Jersey. On the 8th of September, when in sight of that harbor they were pursued, and forcibly taken possession of by Captain Thomas Houston, commander of the armed brig Convention, belonging to the state of Pennsylvania, and, on the 15th of September, brought into the port of Philadelphia; when Houston libeled the vessel as prize to the Convention. A claim was interposed by Captain James Josiah, master of the American privateer Le Gerard, who claimed a share of the capture as having been in sight and by agreement cruising in concert with the Convention. A claim was also interposed by Olmstead and others for the whole vessel and cargo, as being their exclusive prize. The state Court of Admiralty, however, adjudged them only one-fourth part, and decreed the residue to be divided between the state and the owners of the privateer, and the officers and crews of the Convention and the Le Gerard. From this sentence Olmstead and others appealed to the Court of Commissioners of Appeals in prize causes for the United States of America, where, on the 15th of December, 1778, the sentence of the state court was reversed, and it was ordered and adjudged that the vessel and cargo should be condemned as lawful prize for the use of the appellants, Olmstead and others, and that the marshal should sell the same, and pay the net proceeds to them or their agent or attorney. Upon receipt of a copy of this sentence, the Court of Admiralty made the following order:

*"Thomas Houston, Esq. et al., appellees, ads. "Gideon Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale, and David Clark, appellants, claimants of the sloop Active and her cargo. [120 "In the Court of Admiralty, for the state of Pennsylvania.

"The court, taking into consideration the decree of the Court of Appeals in this cause, reversing the judgment or sentence of this court in the same cause, and further decreeing a condemnation of the sloop Active, her tackle, apparel, furniture and cargo, as prize, &c., and that process of this court should issue for the sale of the said sloop, her cargo, &c., and for the distribution of the moneys arising from the said sale after deducting costs to the claimants above named, their agent or attorney; after mature consideration are of opinion, that although the Court of Appeals have full authority to alter or set aside the decree of a judge of this court, yet that the finding of the jury in the cause does establish the facts in the cause without re-examination or appeal. And therefore the verdict of the jury still standing, and being in full force, this court cannot issue any process, or proceed in any manner whatsoever contradictory to the finding of the said jury. And therefore doth now decree, order and adjudge, that the marshal of this court be commanded to sell at public vendue at the highest price that can be gotten for the same, the said sloop or vessel called the Active, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods, wares and merchandises laden and found on board her at the time of her capture, &c., and after deducting the costs and charges of the trial, condemnation and sale thereof, out of the moneys arising from the said sale, that he bring the residue thereof into court, there to remain ready to abide the further order of this court therein. "GEORGE ROSS.

*The finding of the jury, alluded to [121 in the above order, was in these words:

"In the cause wherein Thomas Houston is libellant, and Olmstead and others first claimants, and James Josiah second claimant, we find as follows:

1-4th of the net proceeds of the sloop Active and her cargo to the first claimants.

3-4ths of the net proceeds of said sloop and her cargo to the libellant and to the second claimants, as per agreement between them.

"Nov. 4th, 1778."

The warrant which Judge Ross directed to be issued to the marshal to make sale of the vessel and cargo, in pursuance of the above order, and which was accordingly issued on the 28th of December, 1778, after reciting the proceedings in this court, and in the Court of Appeals, proceeds as follows: "This court therefore taking into consideration the premises, and being of opinion that consistent with the laws of this state it cannot carry into execution the whole of the said sentence of the honorable the Court of Appeals aforesaid: yet willing, so far as the said sentence appears legal, to carry it into effect, and to prevent, as far as possible, any injuries or losses which the parties to this cause, or either of them, may be liable to by the vessel and cargo continuing in their present situation, do therefore hereby command you forthwith to sell," &c., "and, after deducting the costs and charges, to bring the residue of the said moneys into court ready to abide the further order of this court." This warrant was made returnable at a court of admiralty, to be holden at the judge's chambers on the 7th of January, 1779.

Copies of the above order and warrant being produced, on the same 28th of December, 1778, before the Court of Appeals, it was moved, on 122] the *part of the appellants, Olmstead and others, that process might issue to the marshal of the admiralty of Pennsylvania, commanding him to execute the decree of the Court of Appeals; and after argument the case was postponed for further argument until Monday, 4th of January, 1779, at 5 o'clock P.M. On which day at 8 o'clock A. M. the Court of Appeals being again convened at the pressing instance and request of the claimants Olmstead and others, it was moved and suggested by their advocates that notwithstanding the decree of the Court of Appeals, which had been transmitted to the Court of Admiralty, the judge of that court had appointed the hour of nine on that morning for the marshal to pay into court the money arising from the sale of the sloop Active and cargo, which suggestion was supported by the oath of the registrar of the admiralty; whereupon it was prayed that an injunction might issue from the Court of Appeals directed to the marshal of the Court of Admiralty, commanding him to keep the money in his hands until the further order of the Court of Appeals; which injunction was accordingly granted, reciting the sentence of the Court of Admiralty and its reversal, and the decree by the Court of Appeals; the refusal of the judge of the Court of Admiralty to cause that decree to be executed; and the motion to the Court of Appeals for a writ to the marshal commanding him to execute the same; the continuance of that motion to the 4th of January, 1779, at 5 o'clock P. M. and the appointment of the hour of 9 o'clock A. M. of the same day, by the special order of the judge of the Court of Admiralty, for the marshal to pay the money into that court, whereby the effect of the writ payed for, if the court should grant it, would be eluded.

This injunction was served upon the marshal before he paid the money into the Court of Admiralty; but he disregarded it, and paid the money over to the judge, who gave a receipt for it.

"Whereupon the Court (of Appeals) declared and ordered to be entered on record, that as the judge and marshal of the Court of Admiralty of the state *of Pennsylvania had absolute- [123 ly and respectively refused obedience to the decree and writ regularly made in and issued from this court, to which they and each of them were and was bound to pay obedience, this court being unwilling to enter upon any proceedings for contempt, lest consequences might ensue at this juncture dangerous to the public peace of the United States, will not proceed further in this affair, nor hear any appeal, until the authority of this court be so settled as to give full efficacy to their decrees and process.

"Ordered that the register do prepare a state of the proceedings had upon the decree of this court, in the case of the sloop Active, in order that the commissioners may lay the same before Congress."

Upon the writ issued by the judge commanding the marshal to sell the vessel and cargo, and bring the proceeds into court to abide its further order, the marshal, on the 4th of January, 1779, returned, that in obedience to that writ he had deposited in the Court of Admiralty 47,981*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*, Pennsylvania currency, on account of the cargo of the prize sloop Active; but that the sloop remained yet unsold.

The money was loaned to the United States, and the loan-office certificates brought into court and deposited in the hands of the judge, who, on the 1st of May, 1779, delivered to David Rittenhouse, treasurer of the state of Pennsylvania, fifty of the certificates, amounting to 11,496*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, "being the share or dividend of the state in right of the brig Convention in and out of the prize sloop Active, according to the verdict of the jury on the trial of the said sloop Active in the Admiralty Court of that state;" at the same time taking a bond of indemnity from Mr. Rittenhouse, by the name of "David Rittenhouse, of the city of Philadelphia, Gent.," the condition of which was that "Whereas the said George Ross hath this day paid to the said David Rittenhouse, treasurer of the state of Pennsylvania, for the use of the said state, the sum," &c. Now, "if he, the said David Rittenhouse, shall make repayment *and [124 restitution of the said sum of 11,496*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* unto the said George Ross, his executors or administrators, in case he, the said George Ross, shall hereafter by due course of law be compelled to pay the same according to the decree of the Court of Appeals in the case of the said sloop Active; and if he, the said David Rittenhouse, shall and do in all things well and truly save harmless and indemnified at all times hereafter the said George Ross, his heirs, executors and administrators, and his and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels of and from all damages, actions and demands which may arise or happen, for or on account of his having paid the money aforesaid, then the above obligation to be void, or else to be and remain in full force and virtue."

The certificates were afterwards funded in the name of David Rittenhouse, and among his papers was found a list of the old loan-office certificates, and of the new funded stock, at the foot of which was written, in the handwriting of Mr. Rittenhouse, the following memorandum:

"Note.—The above certificates will be the property of the state of Pennsylvania, when the state releases me from the bond I gave in 1778, to indemnify George Ross, Esq., judge of the admiralty, for paying the fifty original certificates into the state treasury as the state's share of the prize."

In the year 1801, the legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act requiring the treasurer to call upon the executrixes of Mr. Rittenhouse for the certificates of stock, and to give them a bond of indemnity, but they refused to deliver them up, being advised that they would not be safe in so doing.

On the 4th of January, 1803, the judge of the District Court for the District of Pennsylvania, pronounced the following final decree in the cause:

"This is the long-depending case of the sloop Active and cargo. It comes before me by libel 125] *filed against the executors of the late Mr. Rittenhouse, who received from George Ross, Esq., then judge of the state Court of Admiralty, the sums mentioned in the libel, which were invested in the certificates of stock as stated therein. Mr. Rittenhouse, on receiving these certificates, which were proceeds of the sales of the said sloop and cargo, gave a bond of indemnity to Mr. Ross, which is now offered, when payment of these proceeds is made, to be delivered up. The suit is instituted for the purpose of carrying into effect a decree of the Court of Appeals established under the old confederation, a copy whereof appears among the exhibits. In the answer it is alleged that the moneys were received for the state of Pennsylvania. In the replication this is denied. In a memorandum made by Mr. Rittenhouse, at the foot of the account exhibited, it appears that he intended to pay over these proceeds to the state, when indemnified. No such payment ever has been made, and the certificates and moneys are yet in the hands of the respondents.

"It appears to me that Mr. Rittenhouse considered himself, as I conceive he was, a stakeholder, liable to pay over the deposit to those lawfully entitled thereto. His executors conceive themselves in the same predicament, and have declined paying over the certificates and interest. No counsel have appeared, and requested to be heard on the part of the respondents, and I am left to judge from the libel, answer, replication and exhibits which contain the state of the facts. If I should be thought mistaken in the opinion I form on the subject, there is time and opportunity to appeal to a superior tribunal.

"I throw out of the case all circumstances not immediately within my present view of the duty I have to perform. I have nothing to do with the original question, that has been decided by the Court of Appeals; nor does it appear to me essential for me to determine with what intentions Mr. Rittenhouse received the 126] certificates. The fact of the *certificates and interest being now in the hands of the respondents is granted by them in their answer. It has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States that this court has power to effectuate the decrees of the late Court of Appeals in prize causes, and this court has, on several occasions, practiced agreeably to that decision. There is no doubt in my mind (the authorities in the books being clear on this point) that the process and jurisdiction of this court will reach and extend over the proceeds of all ships, goods and articles taken as lawful prize, found within the district, and legally proceeded against therein. These proceeds are under the same legal disposition, and subject to the same responsibility, under whatever shape they may appear, as the original thing from which they were produced. It is conceded that the certificates and moneys in question are proceeds of the sloop and cargo in the libel mentioned. These were decreed to the libellants by the judgment of the late Court of Appeals. I am, therefore, of opinion, and accordingly decree, and finally adjudge and determine, that the certificates be transferred and delivered, and the interest moneys paid over by the respondents to the libellants, in execution of the judgment and decree of the Court of Appeals, as stated in the proceedings in this cause, with costs. I make it, however, a condition that the bond of indemnity be cancelled or delivered to the respondents, on their compliance with this decree.

"RICHARD PETERS.

"January 14, 1803."

No further proceedings in this cause were had in the District Court until the 18th of May, 1807, when, on motion of Mr. Lewis, in behalf of the libellants, Olmstead and others, the respondents were ruled to show cause by the next Friday why the decree pronounced in this cause should not be carried into execution; and the bond of indemnity referred to in the decree was filed in court ready to be delivered *up, or cancelled, on compliance with [127 the decree by the respondents.

On the 29th of May, 1807, to which day the rule had been enlarged, the respondents appeared and suggested to the court,

That after making the decree in this case, to wit, on the second day of April, A. D. 1803, the general assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania passed an act, which was then approved by the governor of the said commonwealth, in the following words: "An act relating to the claim of this commonwealth against Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters, surviving executrixes of David Rittenhouse, Esq., deceased."

Whereas, by an act of Congress for the erecting of tribunals competent to determine the propriety of captures during the late war between Great Britain and her then colonies, passed the 25th day of November, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, it is enacted, in the fourth section thereof, as follows, viz.: "That it be and is hereby recommended to the several legislatures in the United Colonies, as soon as possible, to erect courts of justice, or give jurisdiction to the courts now in being for the purpose of determining concerning the captures to be made as aforesaid, and to provide that all trials in such case be had by a jury, under such qualifications as to the respective legislatures shall seem expedient;" and in the sixth section thereof as follows, viz.: "That in all cases an appeal shall be allowed to the Congress, or to such person or persons as they shall appoint for the trial of appeals."

And whereas, by an act of the general assembly of Pennsylvania, passed the 9th of September, 1778, entitled, "An act for establishing a court of admiralty," appeals were allowed from the said court in all cases, unless from the determination or finding of the facts by a jury, which was, under the provisions of that law, to be without re-examination 128] *or appeal: And whereas, by a resolution of Congress of the 15th of January, 1780, it was, among other things, declared: "That trials in the Court of Appeals shall be according to the law of nations, and not by jury."

And whereas, the British sloop Active, having been captured as prize on the high seas, in the month of September, 1778, and brought into the port of Philadelphia, and there libeled in the Court of Admiralty of the said State, held before George Ross, Esq., the then judge of the said court, on the 18th day of the said month of September: And whereas, the libellants then and there against the said sloop Active, Gideon Urmstead or Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale and David Clark, who claimed the whole vessel and cargo as their exclusive prize; Thomas Houston, master of the brig Convention, a vessel of war belonging to Pennsylvania, who claimed a moiety of the said prize for the state of Pennsylvania, himself, and his crew; and James Josiah, master of the sloop Gerard, private vessel of war, who claimed one-fourth part of the said prize for himself, his owners, and crew: And whereas, all the facts respecting the said capture being submitted to the said Court of Admiralty, and a jury then and there returned, empannelled, and sworn, a general verdict was brought in by the said jury, which was confirmed by the court, whereby Gideon Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale, and David Clark, became entitled to one-fourth of the said prize; Thomas Houston, for himself and crew, became entitled to another fourth; the state of Pennsylvania, as owner of the vessel of war, the Convention, to another fourth; and James Josiah, himself and owners and crew of the sloop Gerard, became entitled to the remaining one-fourth part of the said prize: And whereas, the said Gideon Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale, and David Clark, being dissatisfied with the verdict and sentence aforesaid, did appeal from the said Court of Admiralty of Pennsylvania unto the Court or Committee of Appeals, appointed as aforesaid 129] under the *authority of Congress, notwithstanding the recommendation of Congress aforesaid of the 25th day of November, 1775, for the appointment of courts of admiralty in each of the then United Colonies, did expressly provide that all trials respectiug capture should be had by a jury, and under such qualifications as to the respective legislatures should seem expedient, and notwithstanding the Court of Appeals did decide not by a jury, but by the usage of nations, and notwithstanding the law for establishing the Court of Admiralty of Pennsylvania did expressly take away the right of appeal where the facts were found aud determined by the intervention of a jury, and notwithstanding the state was authorized at the time to make such qualification or provision, taking away the right of appeal in jury cases, by virtue of the recommendation of Congress aforesaid, which allowed and recommended the said courts of admiralty to be established with a jury, under such qualifications as to the respective legislatures should seem expedient: And whereas, the said Court of Appeals of the United States, on the 15th day of December, 1778, did reverse the sentence of the Court of Admiralty aforesaid, and did decree the whole of the said prize to the appellants: And whereas, the judge of the Court of Admiralty, to wit., George Ross aforesaid, did refuse obedience to the decree of reversal, and did direct Matthew Clarkson, then marshal of the said court, to pay part of the proceeds of the said prize, to the amount of 11,496*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, Pennsylvania curreney, for the use of the state of Pennsylvania, into the treasury of the state of Pennsylvania, whereof David Rittenhouse was then treasurer, taking a bond of indemnity from the said David Rittenhouse, as treasurer as aforesaid, to save him, the said George Ross, his executors, and ministrators, &c., harmless from the consequences of such payment, which bond is dated the 1st day of May, 1779:

And whereas, the said George Ross dying, suit was brought against his executors in the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster county, by and on the part of the appellants before named for the money whereunto they pretended *title by virtue of the decree aforesaid [130 of the Court of Appeals reversing the sentence of the Court of Admiralty, whereof the said George Ross had been judge: And whereas, it does not appear that the said David Rittenhouse had any notice or information, or was in any legal way apprized of, or made a party to, the said suit in the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster county, either in his personal capacity, or as treasurer of the state of Pennsylvania, so that judgment was obtained by default against the executors of the said George Ross without any knowledge of the said David Rittenhouse, or his being able to take any measures on behalf of himself or the state of Pennsylvania to prevent the same: And whereas, in consequence of the judgment so obtained in the said Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster county, against the executors of the said George Ross, the said executors brought suit against the said David Rittenhouse, which, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, in the term of April of the same year, was heard and determined in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, (on a case stated for the opinion of the court, after verdict taken for the plaintiff, subject to that opinion,) by Thomas M'Kean, Chief Justice, and others, the judges of the said court, who, among other things thereunto relating, did decree and determine that the reversal, as before mentioned, had and made in the Court of Appeals, was contrary to the provisions of the act of Congress recommending the establishment of courts of admiralty, and of the general assembly of the state of Pennsylvania, in their act for the establishment of the said court, and was extrajudicial, erroneous and void, and that the Court of Common Pleas of the county of Lancaster was incompetent to carry into effect the decree of the Court of Appeals, and that the judge of the Court of Admiralty aforesaid, George Ross, was not liable to an action in a court of law for distributing money according to his decree, as judge of the said court: And whereas, at the second session of the third Congress of the United States, held at the city of Philadelphia, 131] in the month of *December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, it was proposed, as an amendment to the constitution of the United States, that the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit, in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state, which, having been adopted by the requisite number of states, as appears by the communication to Congress of the then President, John Adams, to this purpose, of January the eighth, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, did become a part of the constitution of the United States:

And whereas, on the twenty-seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and two, the said Gideon Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale and David Clark, by their attorney, William Lewis, Esq., did file a bill in the District Court of the United States, at Philadelphia, for the District of Pennsylvania, before Richard Peters, judge of the said court, against Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters, surviving executrixes of David Rittenhouse aforesaid, deceased, for the recovery of the moneys, with interest, so paid into the hands of the said David Rittenhouse by Matthew Clarkson, marshal of the Admiralty Court aforesaid, as proceeds of the prize, the brig Active so captured as aforesaid, and by the said David Rittenhouse and his executrixes aforesaid formerly and still retained: And whereas, in the answer of the said Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters to the bill aforesaid, it sufficiently and substantially appears, that the said money was originally received by the said David Rittenhouse, and was by him detained, as treasurer of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, which commonwealth was, and still is, interested in, and a claimant of, the same, under the decree of the said George Ross, as judge of the Court of Admiralty in manner as herein before stated: And whereas, the said Richard Peters, judge of the said District Court, on the bill, answer and replication so filed by and between the said Gideon Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale and David Clark, of the one part, against Elizabeth 132] *Serjeant and Esther Waters, executrixes as aforesaid, did, on the fourteenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and three, proceed to decree as follows, viz.: "This is the long-depending case of the sloop Active and cargo," &c. All which legal proceedings herein before stated, will more fully and at large appear on reference to the records of the respective courts wherein the same were had:

Therefore it hath become necessary for the general assembly of Pennsylvania, as guardians of the rights and interests of this commonwealth, and to prevent any future infringements on the same, to declare, that the jurisdiction entertained by the court or committee of appeals, over the decree of George Ross, as judge of the Court of Admiralty of Pennsylvania, in the suit where the claimants of the brig Active, as prize, were the libellants, as herein before stated, was illegally usurped and exercised, in contradiction to the just rights of Pennsylvania, and the proper jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty established as aforesaid, under the authority of this state, and that the reversal of the decree of the said George Ross, in that suit, was null and void; that the jurisdiction entertained by Richard Peters, judge of the District Court aforesaid, in the suit of Gideon Olmstead, Artimus White, Aquilla Rumsdale and David Clark against Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters, surviving executrixes of David Rittenhouse, deceased, was illegally usurped and exercised; that the rights of this commonwealth, as a claimant, and as the party substantially interested in the said suit, though apparent on the face of the proceedings, were unfairly passed over and set aside; that the said David Rittenhouse was not and ought not to have been considered in the light of a mere stakeholder, but as the treasurer and agent of this commonwealth, and that the jurisdiction and decree of the said Richard Peters hereon were entertained and made in manifest opposition to, and violation of, the last amendment of the constitution of the United States herein before stated, and ought not to be supported or obeyed. Therefore,

*Sect. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate [133 and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that the Governor of this commonwealth be authorized, and he is hereby authorized and required, to direct the Attorney General of this commonwealth to apply without delay to Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters, executrixes as aforesaid, and require them forthwith to pay into the treasury of this commonwealth, the moneys by them admitted to have been received in respect of the premises, in their answer to the bill so as aforesaid filed against them, in the District Court of Pennsylvania, before Richard Peters, judge of the said court, without regard to the decree of the said Richard Peters herein, and in default thereof by the said Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters, to direct the said Attorney General to bring suit in the name of the commonwealth, in the proper court of this commonwealth, against the said Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters, for the moneys aforesaid, and proceed as speedily as the course of legal proceedings will permit, to enforce the recovery and payment thereof into the treasury of this commonwealth.

Sect. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the governor of this commonwealth be authorized and required, and he is hereby authorized and required, to protect the just rights of the state, in respect of the premises, by any further means and measures that he may deem necessary for the purpose, and also to protect the persons and properties of the said Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters from any process whatever issued out of any federal court in consequence of their obedience to the requisition, so as aforesaid directed to be made to them by the Attorney General of this commonwealth, and in the name of this commonwealth to give to the said Elizabeth Serjeant and Esther Waters a sufficient instrument of indemnification, in case of their payment of the moneys aforesaid, in compliance with this act, without suit brought 134*] *against them on the part of this commonwealth for the recovery of the same.

SIMON SNYDER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ROBERT WHITEHILL,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved, April 2, 1803.

THOMAS M'KEAN, Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

That they, the defendants, being required by proper authority to pay into the treasury of the said commonwealth the moneys admitted to have been received as executrixes of David Rittenhouse, Esq., in manner aforesaid, did, on the 19th day of July, 1803, transfer to the treasurer of the commonwealth the certificates of stock above mentioned, and on the 29th of July, 1803, pay into the treasury of the commonwealth the moneys by them received as aforesaid, in obedience to the said act of the general assembly, and to the requisition made under it.

The defendants respectfully further suggest, that the said certificates and money were received by their said testator, as the treasurer and officer of the said commonwealth, as appears by the bond of the said David Rittenhouse, given on the receipt thereof, filed in this court by the libellants, the 22d of May inst.; and that the same came to their hands, as his representatives, after such receipt: And, it being expressly insisted by the said act of the general assembly that the said commonwealth had and has a right to the said certificates and money, and these defendants having, as aforesaid, obeyed the requisition of the said act, these defendants suggest that the said decree of this honorable court ought not to be executed, nor any process issued thereupon against them.

135*] *The defendants respectfully further suggest that the said decrec of this honorable court was pronounced, so far as respects the claims, rights and interests of the said commonwealth of Pennsylvania, ex parte, and without jurisdiction,

John Serjeant, attorney for defendants.

After this suggestion, nothing appears to have been done until the application to this court at February term, 1808, when the motion was made for a rule on the judge to show cause why a mandamus should not issuc commanding him to issuc an attachment, or other proper process, to enforce obedience to his sentence, as before mentioned.

At this term, Rodney (Attorney General), Lewis, and F. S. Key, of counsel for Olmstead and others, submitted the return of the mandamus to the consideration of the court without argument.

With great attention, and with serious concern, the court has considered the return made by the judge for the District of Pennsylvania to the mandamus directing him to execute the sentence pronounced by him in the case of Gideon Olmstead and others v. Rittenhouse's Executrixes, or to show cause for not so doing. The cause shown is an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, passed subsequent to the rendition of his sentence. This act authorizes and requires the governor to demand, for the use of the state of Pennsylvania, the money which had been decreed to Gideon Olmstead and others; and which was in the hands of the executrixes of David Rittenhouse; and, in defanlt of payment, to direct the Attorney General to institute a suit for the recovery thereof. This act further authorizes and requires the governor to use any further means he *may think necessary [136 for the protection of what it denominates "the just rights of the state," and also to protect the persons and properties of the said executrixes of David Rittenhouse, deceased, against any process whatever, issued out of any federal court in consequence of their obedience to the requisition of the said act.

If the legislatures of the several states may, at will, annul the judgments of the courts of the United States, and destroy the rights acquired under those judgments, the constitution itself becomes a solemn mockery, and the nation is deprived of the means of enforcing its laws by the instrumentality of its own tribunals. So fatal a result must be deprecated by all; and the people of Pennsylvania, not less than the citizens of every other state, must feel a deep interest in resisting principles so destructive of the Union, and in averting consequences so fatal to themselves.

The act in question does not, in terms, assert the universal right of the state to interpose in every case whatever; but assigns, as a motive for its interposition in this particular case, that the sentence, the execution of which it prohibits, was rendered in a cause over which the federal courts have no jurisdiction.

If the ultimate right to determine the jurisdiction of the courts of the Union is placed by the constitution in the several state legislatures, then this act concludes the subject; but if that power necessarily resides in the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation, then the jurisdiction of the District Court of Pennsylvania, over the case in which that jurisdiction was exercised, ought to be most deliberately examined; and the act of Pennsylvania, with whatever respect it may be considered, cannot be permitted to prejudice the question.

In the early part of the war between the United States and Great Britain, Gideon Olmstead and *others, citizens of Connecti- [137 cut, who say they had been carried to Jamaica as prisoners, were employed as part of the crew of the sloop Active, bound from Jamaica to New York, and laden with a cargo for the use of the British army in that place. On the voyage they seized the vessel, confined the captain, and sailed for Egg Harbor. In sight of that place, the Active was captured by the Convention, an armed ship belonging to the state of Pennsylvania, brought into port, libeled and condemned as prize to the captors. From this sentence Gideon Olmstead and others, who claimed the vessel and cargo, appealed to the Court of Appeals established by Congress, by which tribunal the sentence of condemnation was reversed, the Active and her cargo condemned as prize to the claimants, and process was directed to issuc out of the Court of Admiralty, commanding the marshal of that court to sell the said vessel and cargo, and to pay the net proceeds to the claimants.

The mandate of the appellate court was produced in the inferior court, the judge of which admitted the general jurisdiction of the court established by Congress, as an appellate court, but denied its power to control the verdict of a jury which had been rendered in favor of the captors, the officers and crew of the Convention; and therefore refused obedience to the mandate: but directed the marshal to make the sale, and, after deducting charges, to bring the residue of the money into court, subject to its future order.

The claimants then applied to the judges of appeals for an injunction to prohibit the marshal from paying the money, arising from the sales, into the Court of Admiralty; which was awarded, and served upon him: in contempt of which, on the 4th of January, 1778, he paid the money to the judge, who acknowledged the receipt thereof at the foot of the marshal's return.

On the 1st of May, 1779, George Ross, the 138] judge *of the Court of Admiralty, delivered to David Rittenhouse, who was then treasurer of the state of Pennsylvania, the sum of 11,496*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, in loan-office certificates; which was the proportion of the prize money to which that state would have been entitled, had the sentence of the Court of Admiralty remained in force. On the same day, David Rittenhouse executed a bond of indemnity to George Ross, in which, after reciting that the money was paid to him for the use of the state of Pennsylvania, he binds himself to repay the same, should the said George Ross be thereafter compelled, by due course of law, to pay that sum according to the decree of the Court of Appeals.

These loan-office certificates were in the name of Matthew Clarkson, who was marshal of the Court of Admiralty, and were dated the 6th of November, 1778. Indents were issued on them to David Rittenhouse, and the whole principal and interest were afterwards funded by him, in his own name, under the act of Congress making provision for the debt of the United States.

Among the papers of David Rittenhouse was a memorandum, made by himself at the foot of a list of the certificates mentioned above, in these words: "Note. The above certificates will be the property of the state of Pennsylvania, when the state releases me from the bond I gave in 1778, to indemnify George Ross, Esq., judge of the admiralty, for paying the 50 original certificates into the treasury, as the state's share of the prize."

The state did not release David Rittenhouse from the bond mentioned in this memorandum. These certificates remained in the private possession of David Rittenhouse, who drew the interest on them during his life, and after his death they remained in possession of his representatives; against whom the libel in this case was filed, for the purpose of carrying into execution the decree of the Court of Appeals.

139*] *While this suit was depending, the state of Pennsylvania forbore to assert its title, and, in January, 1803, the court decreed in favor of the libellants; soon after which, the legislature passed the act which has been stated.

It is contended that the federal courts were deprived of jurisdiction, in this cause, by that amendment of the constitution which exempts states from being sued in those courts by individuals. This amendment declares, "that the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit, in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state."

The right of a state to assert, as plaintiff, any interest it may have in a subject, which forms the matter of controversy between individuals, in one of the courts of the United States, is not affected by this amendment; nor can it be so construed as to oust the court of its jurisdiction, should such claim be suggested. The amendment simply provides, that no suit shall be commenced or prosecuted against a state. The state cannot be made a defendant to a suit brought by an individual; but it remains the duty of the courts of the United States to decide all cases brought before them by citizens of one state against citizens of a different state, where a state is not necessarily a defendant. In this case, the suit was not instituted against the state or its treasurer, but against the executrixes of David Rittenhouse, for the proceeds of a vessel condemned in the court of admiralty, which were admitted to be in their possession. If these proceeds had been the actual property of Pennsylvania, however wrongfully acquired, the disclosure of that fact would have presented a case on which it is unnecessary to give an opinion; but it certainly can never be alleged that a mere suggestion of title in a state to property, in possession of an individual, must arrest the proceedings of the court, and prevent their *looking into the suggestion, and ex- [140 amining the validity of the title.

If the suggestion in this case be examined, it is deemed perfectly clear that no title whatever to the certificates in question was vested in the state of Pennsylvania.

By the highest judicial authority of the nation it has been long since decided, that the Court of Appeals erected by Congress had full authority to revise and correct the sentences of the courts of admiralty of the several states, in prize causes. That question, therefore, is at rest. Consequently, the decision of the Court of Appeals in this case annulled the sentence of the Court of Admiralty, and extinguished the interest of the state of Pennsylvania in the Active and her cargo, which was acquired by that sentence. The full right to that property was immediately vested in the claimants, who might rightfully pursue it, into whosesoever hands it might come. These certificates, in the hands, first, of Matthew Clarkson, the marshal, and afterwards of George Ross, the judge of the Court of Admiralty, were the absolute property of the claimants. Nor did they change their character on coming into the possession of David Rittenhouse.

Although Mr. Rittenhouse was treasurer of the state of Pennsylvania, and the bond of indemnity which he executed states the money to have been paid to him for the use of the state of Pennsylvania, it is apparent that he held them in his own right, until he should be completely indemnified by the state. The evidence to this point is conclusive. The original certificates do not appear to have been deposited in the state treasury, to have been designated in any manner as the property of the state, or to have been delivered over to the successor of David Rittenhouse. They remained in his possession. The indents, issued upon them for interest, were drawn by David Rittenhouse, and preserved with the original certificates. When 141*] funded as *part of the debt of the United States, they were funded by David Rittenhouse, and the interest was drawn by him. The note made by himself at the foot of the list, which he preserved, as explanatory of the whole transaction, demonstrates that he held the certificates as security against the bond he had executed to George Ross; and that bond was obligatory, not on the state of Pennsylvania, but on David Rittenhouse, in his private capacity.

These circumstances demonstrate, beyond the possibility of doubt, that the property which represented the Active and her cargo, was in possession, not of the state of Pennsylvania, but of David Rittenhouse as an individual; after whose death it passed, like other property, to his representatives.

Since, then, the state of Pennsylvania had neither possession of, nor right to, the property on which the sentence of the District Court was pronounced, and since the suit was neither commenced nor prosecuted against that state, there remains no pretext for the allegation that the case is within that amendment of the constitution which has been cited; and, consequently, the state of Pennsylvania can possess no constitutional right to resist the legal process which may be directed in this cause.

It will be readily conceived that the order which this court is enjoined to make by the high obligations of duty and of law, is not made without extreme regret at the necessity which has induced the application. But it is a solemn duty, and therefore must be performed. A peremptory mandamus must be awarded.

142*] *VIOLETT v. PATTON.

To constitute a consideration it is not necessary that a benefit should accrue to the promisor. It is sufficient that something valuable flows from the promisee, and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction.

A blank indorsement upon a blank piece of paper with intent to give a person credit, is in effect a letter of credit. And if a promissory note be afterwards written on the paper, the indorser cannot object that the note was written after the indorsement.

The English statute of frauds requires that the agreement should be in writing; the statute of Virginia requires only the promise to be in writing.

Before resort can be had to the indorser of a promissory note in Virginia, the maker must be sued, if solvent; but his insolvency renders a suit against him unnecessary.

It is a question to be left to the jury whether a suit against the maker would have produced the money.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, to reverse a judgment in an action of assumpsit, brought by Patton, as indorsee of a promissory note, against Violett, the indorser. The note was made by Brooke, payable, in 30 days, at the bank of Alexandria, to the order of Violett, and by him indorsed to Patton.

The declaration had two counts. The first was upon the indorsement, and stated the making of the note by Brooke, for value received; the assignment by indorsement to Patton (but did not state that the assignment was for value received), by means whereof, and of the statute of Virginia, Patton had a right to demand and receive the money from Brooke; the demand of payment from Brooke; his refusal and insolvency at the time of demand; and notice thereof to Violett, whereby he became liable, and in consideration thereof promised to pay, &c.

The other count was for money had and received.

At the trial of the general issue, the defendant below took two bills of exceptions.

That if the jury should be satisfied by the evidence that the defendant indorsed the note with intent to give a credit for the amount thereof to Brooke with the plaintiff, and that the body of the note was filled up by the plaintiff before it was signed by Brooke, and that the plaintiff, upon the faith of the note so drawn and indorsed, gave credit to Brooke to the amount thereof; the circumstance *of [143 such indorsement being made before the body of the note was filled up by the plaintiff and signed by Brooke, is no bar to the plaintiff's recovery in this action; although the jury should be satisfied that no other value was received by the defendant for his indorsement than the credit thus given by the plaintiff to Brooke. And further, that the indorsement by the defendant with the intent aforesaid, if proved, authorized Brooke to make the note to the plaintiff in the form and manner in which it appears upon the face of it to be made; and that the circumstance that the body of the note was in the handwriting of the plaintiff, was wholly immaterial to the present issue.

The second bill of exceptions stated, that the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that Brooke, at the time the note became payable, or at any time previous to the commencement of this action, had property sufficient to pay the debt claimed by the plaintiff, and that both he and the plaintiff lived in the town of Alexandria at the time the note became due, and that the plaintiff brought no suit against Brooke to recover the amount of the note, but suffered him to leave the District of Columbia, without suing him: or if the jury should be satisfied that the plaintiff and Brooke have, since the note became due, both lived in the county of Fairfax, in Virginia, and have continued to reside there until the bringing of the present suit, and that the plaintiff has not brought suit against Brooke in Virginia, then the defendant is not liable in this action. But the court refused to give those instructions as prayed.

E. J. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

1. The indorsement, being on a blank piece of paper, and delivered with intent to give credit to Brooke, but without an express authority to him to fill up the paper with a promissory note, did not authorize him so to fill it up. But if Brooke was so authorized, Patton was not. There does not appear *to [144 have been any communication between Patton and Violett upon the subject.

The cases of Russel and Langstaffe (Doug., 514), and Collins v. Emett (1 H., Bla., 313), do not apply; because in those cases it appears that the body of the note was filled up by the person authorized, and who was to use it for his benefit; and because the principles of those cases are not drawn from the common law, but from the custom of merchants, which is not applicable to promissory notes in Virginia, which are there placed upon the same footing as bonds, and subject only to the same common law principles.

2. There was no consideration from Patton to Violett. The defendant in error must show a good and valuable consideration. (Chitty, 9; 4 Mod., 242; 1 Strange. 674; Buller, 274; 2 Bl. Com., 445; 1 Fonb., Eq., 331, 332, 335, 336; 7 Term Rep., 350, Rann v. Hughes.)

A consideration which will support an assumpsit must be either a benefit to the defendant or a prejudice to the plaintiff; but here Violett received no benefit, and Patton no prejudice.

It does not appear that Patton gave a credit solely in consequence of Violett's indorsement. On the contrary, there was no communication between them, so that there was no undertaking on the part of Violett to Patton, except what the law implies from the indorsement; and that implication is founded upon a presumption that the indorser received value, and can be extended no farther than the value received.

It does not appear that Patton would not have credited Brooke without Violett's indorsement.

3. The indorsement, being in blank, was not a writing signed by him; and the undertaking being to pay the debt of another, is void by the statute of frauds of Virginia.

145*] *At common law the holder of the paper had no right to fill up the indorsement so as to make it a promise in writing. Such a right in mercantile cases is founded only on the custom of merchants. The undertaking in writing must set out the precise terms of the promise, as well as the consideration. (Prec., Ch., 560; Strange, 426; 1 Atk., 13; 5 East, 10, Wain v. Warlters.) Brooke was clearly liable for this debt. And it is laid down as a principle, that if he for whose use the goods are furnished be liable at all, the promise of a third person must be in writing, or it is void. (Roberts, 209.) But if this is a parol promise, it must be made to appear that the credit was given to Violett alone. (1 H., Bla., 120; 2 Term Rep., 80.)

4. Violett is not liable, if Brooke, at the time the note became due, and at the time the suit was brought, had property sufficient to pay the amount of the note, and Patton did not at any time bring suit against Brooke.

In Mackie v. Davis (2 Wash., 219), it is decided that the holder of a bond must use due diligence for the recovery of the money. In Lee v. Love (1 Call, 497), the assignee of a note must sue the maker before he can resort to the indorser.

The case of Fenwick v. Barkesdale, decided in the Court of Appeals in Virginia, in October, 1803, affirms the general doctrine laid down in Mackie v. Davis, and shows that a suit is necessary, and is the only kind of diligence which is meant.

It also proves that it is not sufficient to show that the maker of the note was not able to pay all his debts; but the plaintiff must go further and show that he was not able to pay the particular debt due to him by the note.

The oath which is taken under the insolvent law of Virginia, shows what is meant by the term insolvent. *He must swear that [146 he is not worth 30 dollars, exclusive of his wearing apparel.

The insolvency of the drawee of a bill is no excuse for neglect to give notice of its dishonor. (Chitty, 88; Doug., 497, 515.)

Swann, contra.

The case of Russell and Langstaffe (Doug., 514), is clear as to the authority given by an indorsement on a blank piece of paper.

It is a letter of credit. The defendant has given the bearer of it authority to use it, and cannot deny the authority when it is executed. This is a mercantile transaction depending upon good faith, in which the want of consideration can never be alleged. (3 Burr., 1663, Philans & Rose v. Van Mierop & Hopkins.) It is a promise in writing, which is sufficient to take it out of the Virginia statute of frauds. The defendant cannot be permitted to say that the indorsement was blank, and the plaintiff had no authority to fill it up, unless he can show that the confidence he placed in Brooke and the plaintiff has been abused.

If the maker of a note be insolvent when the note becomes due, it is not necessary that the holder should bring suit against him. Brooke might have had property enough to pay this note, and yet be insolvent: And it does not follow because he might have paid this note, that he would have paid it if suit had been brought, or that he could have been compelled to pay it.

Youngs, in reply.

No action can be sustained upon the indorsement of the note. The act of assembly respecting promissory notes gives no action against the indorser. It only gives the assignee a right to recover in his own name against the maker. The action *against the indor- [147 ser is only at common law, upon the ground that the consideration paid for the note has failed. The legislature of Virginia did not mean to extend the liability of the indorser farther than that. They had the statute of Anne before them, but they did not choose to adopt it; they preferred to place notes in the class with bonds rather than with bills of exchange. The indorser is liable only upon the principle of money had and received to the plaintiff's use. (1 Cranch, 298, Manderville v. Riddle; 2 Wash., 219, 221, Mackie v. Davis; 2 Wash., 148, Norton v. Rose.) If there be no consideration, if the defendant has never received value for the note, he is not liable upon any of the grounds stated in those cases. Between immediate parties the want of consideration is always a good defense, even in England. (Kyd, 276.)

In an action against a surety for money had and received, you cannot recover if the money were received by the principal, although the surety join in giving a receipt for it. (2 Term Rep., 366, Straton v. Rastall.)

In a written agreement to pay the debt of another, the consideration must be stated as well as the promise. (5 East, 10, Wain v. Warlters.)

MARSHALL, Ch. J. Do you mean to state that if A writes a letter to B stating that if B will let C have goods, A will pay for them if C does not, A would not be bound?

Youngs. Probably in that case it would be considered that the letter did state the consideration.

In the case of Clark v. Russel (3 Dal., 415), it was decided by this court that the whole agreement must be in writing, and that nothing can be supplied by parol. It must be a complete agreement, or it will not support an action at law. And upon the count for money had and received, you must prove a considera- [148] tion in money actually received by *the defendant, and can then recover only the amount of that consideration. Suppose a note indorsed for accommodation at the bank, and the bank refuse to discount it. If the indorsee puts it in circulation can the holder recover upon it against the indorser?

If the promise be in writing, there must still be a consideration, and you can recover only to the extent of that consideration. (7 Term Rep., 350, Rann v. Hughes.)

MARSHALL, Ch. J. The question seems to be whether the declaration must not state the consideration?

WASHINGTON, J. In Mackie v. Davis there was a special consideration.

LIVINGSTON, J. The case of a promissory note is the only case where you need not state a consideration in your declaration.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. My impression is very strong that in Virginia there has been a general practice to consider an indorser as liable upon an implied promise; and to declare upon it without averring a consideration.

Youngs. If there must be a consideration to support the assumpsit, it must be averred in the declaration. (Simms v. Cook, 2 Call; Winston v. Francisco, 2 Wash., 187; Taliaferro v. Robb, 2 Call, 258.)

February 23. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This case comes on upon two exceptions; one to the opinion of the Circuit Court given to the jury, and the other to the refusal of that [149] court to give an *opinion which was prayed by the counsel for the defendant below.

The declaration contains two counts. One upon the indorsement of a promissory note, and the other for money had and received to the plaintiff's use. The question arising on the first bill of exceptions is, whether the court erred in directing the jury respecting the liability of the defendant below, on the indorsement which was the foundation of the action.

The indorsement was made before the note was written; and it appeared that the body of the note was filled up by Patton. The opinion of the court was, that, if the jury should be satisfied, from the testimony, that Violett indorsed this paper for the purpose of giving Brooke a credit with Patton, and that, upon the faith of the note so drawn and indorsed, Patton did credit Brooke to the amount thereof, the circumstances, that the note was made subsequent to the indorsement, without any consideration from Brooke to Violett, and was filled up by the plaintiff, did not bar the action; and, further, that the said Brooke was to be considered as authorized by the said Violett to make the note to Patton.

This opinion is said to be erroneous; because,

1. The indorsement was made without consideration.

2. It was made on a blank paper.

3. There was no memorandum of the agreement in writing.

In support of the first point, the counsel for the plaintiff in error have cited several cases, intending to prove that an indorsement made without consideration, though it transfers the paper to the indorsee, creates no liability in the indorser; and that *a promise in writ- [150 ing, made without consideration, is void.

So far as respects the immediate parties having knowledge of the fact, and so far as relates to an indorsement under the statute of Virginia, this is correct; but the real question in the cause is, does the testimony prove a sufficient consideration for the promise created by the indorsement? This is not intended to comprehend any writing on which an action of debt is given.

To constitute a consideration it is not absolutely necessary that a benefit should accrue to the person making the promise. It is sufficient that something valuable flows from the person to whom it is made; and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction. In the common case of a letter of credit given by A to B, the person who, on the faith of that letter, trusts B, is admitted to have his remedy against A, although no benefit accrued to A as the consideration of his promise. So in the present case, Patton trusted Brooke on the credit of Violett's name, and Violett wrote his name for the purpose of giving Brooke that credit with Patton. It was, in effect, and in intention, a letter of credit. The case shows that this was both the intention and the effect of Violett's giving his name to Brooke. In conscience, and in substance, then, it is a letter of credit, upon which the money, it was intended to secure, was advanced; and although in point of form the transaction takes the shape, and was intended to take the shape, of an indorsement, yet, so far as respects consideration, the indorsement has the full operation of an undertaking in the form of a letter of credit.

It is common in Virginia for two persons to join in a promissory note, the one being the principal and the other the security. Although the whole benefit is received by the principal, this contract has never been considered as a nudum pactum with regard to the security. So far as respects consideration, no *dif- [151 ference is preceived in the cases. Violett has signed his name upon this paper for the purpose of giving Brooke a credit with Patton, and his signature has obtained that credit. The consideration is precisely the same, whether his name be on the back or the face of the paper.

2. The second objection is, that the indorsement preceded the making of the note.

This objection certainly comes with a very bad grace from the mouth of Violett. He indorsed the paper with the intent that the promissory note should be written on the other side; and that he should be considered as the indorser of that note. It was the shape he intended to give the transaction; and he is now concluded from saying or proving that it was not filled up when he indorsed it. It would be to protect himself from the effect of his promise, by alleging a fraudulent combination between himself and another to obtain money for that other from a third person. The case of Russel and Langstaffe, reported in Douglass, is conclusive on this point.

3. The third objection is, that there was no memorandum of the agreement in writing.

The argument on this point is founded on the idea that the statute of frauds in Virginia is copied literally from the statute of Charles II. This is not the fact. The first section of the act of Virginia differs from the 4th sec. of the statute of Charles II. in one essential respect. The statute of England enacts that no action shall be brought, in the cases specified, "unless the agreement on which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing," &c. The Virginia act enacts that no action shall be brought in the specified cases, "unless the promise or agreement on which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing," &c. The reasoning of the judges, in the cases in which they have decided that the 152*] consideration ought to be *in writing, turns upon the word agreement, of which the consideration forms an integral part. This reasoning does not apply to the act of Virginia, in which the word "promise" is introduced.

It was thought proper to notice this difference between the act of parliament and the act of Virginia, although the opinion of the court is not determined by it. In this case the assignment does express a consideration. It is made for value received.

It is unnecessary to decide in this case, whether the declaration ought to have alleged that the indorsement was made on consideration. With that question the jury had no concern, and the direction of the court was not affected by it. There being no demurrer, it could only occur in arrest of judgment. But on a motion in arrest of judgment, the defendant below could not have availed himself of this error, if it be one, because there are two counts in the declaration, one of which is unquestionably good, and the court cannot preceive on which the verdict was rendered. By the act of jeofails in Virginia, there is no error if any one count will support the judgment.

The second exception is to the refusal of the Circuit Court to give the opinion prayed for by the counsel for the defendant below.

When the error alleged is, not that the court has misdirected the jury, but that the court has refused to give a particular opinion, the opinion demanded must be so perfectly stated, that it becomes the duty of the court to give it as stated.

In this case, the opinion required by the counsel consists of two parts. The first is to instruct the jury "that if they shall be satisfied, from the evidence, that Richard Brooke, the maker of the note in this case, had, at the time the note became due, or at any time previous to the commencement of this suit against the de- 153*] fendant, property sufficient to pay *the debt claimed," &c., and the plaintiff brought no suit, then this action is not maintainable.

This court conceives that the Circuit Court ought not to have given this opinion. Had Richard Brooke possessed property before the making of the note, and not afterwards, the opinion, in the terms in which it was required, would have been a direction to find their verdict for the defendant. So if Richard Brooke had been in possession of property for a single day, and had the next day become insolvent, the court was asked to say that, in such a case, the indorser could only be made liable by suit against the maker. Such a direction, in the opinion of this court, would have been improper.

The second branch of the opinion the Circuit Court was required to give, is in these words: "Or if the jury shall be satisfied that the said plaintiff and the said Brooke have, since the said note became due, both lived in the county of Fairfax, in Virginia, and have continued to reside in the county of Fairfax until the beginning of the present suit, and the plaintiff hath not brought suit against the said Brooke in Virginia, then the defendant is not liable in this action."

If the plaintiff had sued Brooke elsewhere than in Virginia, or if Brooke had become insolvent previous to the making of the note, and had continued to be so, the opinion of the court, if given as prayed, would have been, that, still, a suit against the maker of the note was necessary to give a right of action against the indorser.

This is not understood to be the law of Virginia. It is understood to be the law, that the maker of the note must be sued, if he is solvent, but his insolvency dispenses with the necessity of suing him. It is not known that any decision of the state courts requires that this insolvency should be proved by taking the oath of an insolvent debtor, nor is it believed that this is the only admissible testimony of *the [154 fact of insolvency. Other testimony may be admitted. It would therefore have been proper to leave it to the jury to determine whether it was, at any time, in the power of the plaintiff to have made the money due on this note, or any part of it, from the maker by suit; and their verdict ought to have been regulated by the testimony in this respect.

This opinion was not required.

This court is of opinion that there is no error, and that the judgment is to be affirmed with costs.

PIERCE v. TURNER.

The act of assembly of Virginia, which makes unrecorded deeds void as to creditors, and subsequent purchasers, means creditors of, and subsequent purchasers from, the grantor.

A marriage settlement, conveying the wife's land and slaves to trustees, by a deed, to which the husband was a party, although not recorded, protects the property from the creditors of the husband.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of debt brought by Pierce against Rebecca Turner, charging her as executrix in her own wrong of her late husband, Charles Turner, deceased.

Upon the issue of never executrix, the jury found a special verdict, stating in substance the following case:

On the 14th of February, 1798, the defendant, by the name of Rebecca Kenner, being a feme sole, and seized and possessed, in her own right, of certain land and slaves, conveyed the same by deed, in consideration of an intended marriage between herself and Charles Turner, to trustees, to be held in trust for the use of herself until the marriage should be solemnized, and from and after the solemnization thereof to the use of herself and the said Charles Turner, and the longest liver of them, and from and after their deaths, to the use of her heirs. The deed purports to be an indenture tripartite, in which Charles Turner is named as the second party, and as such he duly executes the 155] deed; *he does not, however, make any settlement of his own property upon his intended wife, but appears to be made a party merely for the purpose of testifying his privity and consent.

About four months after the execution of the deed, two of the three subscribing witnesses proved the execution before the county court of Fairfax, where all the parties inhabited. The probate was duly certified by the clerk under direction of the court. But the deed purporting to be a conveyance of land as well as slaves, and one of the subscribing witnesses, soon after the execution of it, having left the United States, and never having returned, the deed was not fully admitted to record, but remained in the clerk's office under the certificate of probate before stated, until the 1st of September, 1807, when the County Court, upon proof of the absence of the third subscribing witness, and of his handwriting, admitted the deed to record; all which is certified by the recording clerk, and found by the special verdict.

Soon after the execution of the deed, and in the same month, (February, 1798,) the contemplated marriage took place; whereupon the trustees put Turner into possession of the land and slaves, and he continued possessed of the same, with the knowledge and approbation of the trustees, till his death, which happened some time in the month of December, 1802, less than five years from the time of his marriage, and of his first coming into possession of the property.

Turner and his wife resided in Alexandria from the time of their marriage till the autumn of 1801, when they removed into the county of Northumberland, in the state of Virginia, taking the slaves with them by consent of the trustees; they continued to reside there, upon the land in the deed mentioned, on which the slaves were kept, till his death, in December, 1802. Upon his death she remained in possession both of the land and slaves, claiming exclusive property in the same, and to 156] *hold possession of the same with the privity and approbation of the trustees, whose privity and approbation are expressly found. In the autumn of 1803, the defendant removed back to Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, and brought with her a part of the slaves, (of value sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's debt,) and has ever since resided in Alexandria, and there used the slaves so brought with her.

Three months after Turner's death, and seven months before the defendant removed from Northumberland back to Alexandria, the County Court of Northumberland, finding that no person would apply for administration of the intestate's estate, committed the administration to the sheriff of the county, under a particular statute of Virginia. The sheriff returned an inventory of assets appraised at 4,631 dollars and 72 cents, which was distributed in due proportions among the creditors, under the especial direction of the court. But the plaintiff put in no claim, and, not being on the list of creditors reported to the court, received no part of the sum so distributed. None of the slaves conveyed by the said deed were meddled with in the course of the sheriff's administration, nor included in the inventory and appraisement, although they were all then in the county, and some of them have continued in the county ever since Turner's death. It is found that Turner died insolvent, unless the said slaves are charged with his debts.

By the 4th section of the act of assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act for regulating conveyances," it is enacted, "that all conveyances of lands," "and all deeds of settlement upon marriage wherein either lands, slaves, money or other personal thing shall be settled," "and all deeds of trusts and mortgages whatsoever," "shall be void as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, unless they shall be acknowledged, or proved and recorded according to the directions of this act; but the same, as between the parties and their heirs, shall nevertheless be valid and binding.

*The deed in question never was [157 proved or acknowledged and recorded according to the directions of the act; and the question was, whether it was void as to the creditors of the husband, so as to charge the widow as his executrix in her own wrong.

The opinion of the court below was, that the deed was good and effectual to prevent the property vesting in the husband by virtue of the marriage, and consequently was never liable for his debts. That at the time of the marriage no legal estate in the slaves was vested in the wife, and therefore nothing was transferred to the husband by the marriage.

E. J. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

By marriage all the personal estate of the wife becomes the absolute property of the husband. The operation of this principle can only be prevented by pursuing strictly the mode pointed out by law. This deed wants those legal solemnities which the law requires to make it valid against creditors. The plaintiff is a creditor; the deed is, therefore, not valid against him. The word creditor, in the act of assembly, means not only the creditors of the grantor, but the creditors of every person whose debts could have been legally satisfied out of the property, if such deed had not been made. If the word is to have the limited construction contended for on the other side, and the deed be void only as to her creditors, and as to subsequent purchasers from her, the statute becomes nugatory; because after marriage she has no creditors, and cannot sell and convey. Her creditors have become his creditors; her debts have become his debts. If the deed be void as to her creditors, it must be void as to his creditors. If she can neither sell nor have creditors, the act must apply to his creditors, or it will be idle and unavailing.

If the husband had sold these slaves to persons ignorant of the deed, the sale would have 158] been valid. *If he had been trusted upon the faith of this property, which he had in his possession, and which was supposed to have come by his wife, such creditors, who were ignorant of the deed, would have a right to payment out of this property. If they could not, the possession of the slaves would have been a fraud upon such creditors.

It is true, in the present case, the debt was contracted before the marriage, but that cannot alter the principle of law. If the deed be void as to any of his creditors, it is void as to all.

The term creditors is general, and literally comprehends creditors of the husband, as well as creditors of the wife. Where the words of a statute are plain, the court cannot indulge any latitude of construction, but must pursue the words. (3 Call, 106; 2 Call, 183, Eppes v. Randolph.)

If the property was liable for the husband's debts, it was assets, and her appropriating it to her own use, makes her an executrix in her own wrong (Toller, 17); although she did it claiming them as her own, and under a void deed (2 Vin. Abr., 211; 2 Term Rep., 588, Edwards v. Mercer; Cro. Jac., 270, Hawes v. Loring; 2 Bac. Abr., 338; 5 Co., 34, a.); even if there be a rightful administrator. But the possession taken by the sheriff of Northumberland county was not an administration. (2 Term Rep., 97.)

If this deed be valid against creditors, no marriage settlement need be recorded. It renders unnecessary all the precaution which the legislature so anxiously took to prevent this kind of fraud and imposition.

C. Simms, P. B. Key and Jones, contra.

.The act for regulating conveyances, as it relates to creditors and their debtors, was intended to protect the former against secret deeds and conveyances made by the latter; it never was 159] intended to *injure the rights of third persons, who do not claim under the debtor.

Lord Mansfield, in the case of Cadogan v. Kennett (Cowp., 434), speaking of the statute of 13 Eliz., c. 5, which relates to frauds against creditors, says, that "such a construction is not to be given in support of creditors as will make third persons sufferers."

If there is any difficulty in the construction of this act it arises from the generality of the expression, "creditors and subsequent purchasers."

The first section of the act declares, that uo conveyance shall be good against any creditor or purchaser, for valuable consideration, not having notice thereof, unless it be acknowlcdged or proved by three witnesses, &c.

What purchaser is intended by this act? Unquestionably a purchaser from the person who made the first deed. The effect or operation of the act is to give validity to the second deed duly proved and recorded iu preference to a prior deed, not duly proved and recorded; and not to invalidate the first deed, in favor of a purchaser for a valuable consideration from a person other than the maker of the first deed.

To illustrate the subject; suppose A, the rightful owner of property, makes a conveyance of it to B, which is not recorded. C, who sets up a claim to the property, sells and conveys it to D, for a valuable consideration, and the deed is duly recorded; would the deed from A to B be considered as void against D, who does not claim under A? Certainly not. Then the subsequent purchaser must claim under the person who made the first deed, or the first deed cannot be considered void as to him. So the general term "creditors," used in the act must, for the like reason, be understood to mean the creditors of the grantor or bargainor *in the first deed, and none but such [160 creditors can set aside the deed.

If A, by deed conveys property to B, and the deed is not recorded according to the act, C, the heir of A, contracts debts. The creditors of C would have no lien or claim on the property conveyed by A to B, nor would it be liable in any manner to C's debts; yet, but for the deed, the land would have descended to C. The right which creditors have to the property of their debtor is derivitive. If he never had a right to the property, they can have none. Charles Turner never had any right to this property, unless under the deed.

Rebecca Kenner, before the marriage, was the sole and absolute owner of it, and was fully competent to dispose of it as she thought proper.

She did dispose of it by a deed to trustees, which she was competent to make, which was completely binding upon her, and which devested from her all legal title and claim to the property. At the time of the marriage she had no legal estate in her which could, by operation of law, be transferred to her husband by the marriage. As he was a party to the deed, and thereby assented to it, he was bouud by it, and could never set it aside. Between all the parties to the deed it was as valid and binding as if it had been duly acknowledged and recorded. The creditors of Charles Turner can claim nothing which he could not claim. If the marriage did not transfer the property to him, they cannot claim it at law. What never was his cannot be theirs.

If the property never was his, so as to be assets, the defendant can never be charged as executrix in her own wrong for taking possession of it.

But even if this property should finally be adjudged to be assets, yet we contend she is not liable as executrix de son tort. If she took possession of the slaves on a fair claim of property, believing herself *lawfully [161 entitled to them, it cannot amount to such a tortious act as will charge her as executrix de son tort. (Bro., Abr., Administrator, pl. 36; Executor, pl. 162; Fitz., Abr., Executor, pl. 65; Roll., Abr., Executor, pl. 417; 11 Vin., Abr., Executor, C. a. and B. a. pl. 5; 2 Lcon. 226; Com., Dig., Administrator, C. 2; Freem., 13. pl. 12; Dyer, 166, Stokes v. Porter.)

The deed was good at law between the parties, and by the assent of her trustees she had a legal right to the possession; and wherever a person comes lawfully into the possession of the goods he can never be charged as executor de son tort. The rightful executor could never claim these slaves as assets, because the deed was good between the parties, and he would be estopped by the sealing and delivery of the deed by Charles Turner, his testator.

If the creditors of the husband have any remedy, it must be in equity; where it is a well settled principle that if the representatives of the husband are obliged to resort to equity to get possession of the wife's estate, they shall first make her an adequate settlement. She is considered as a fair creditor to that extent. (1 Fonbl., c. 2, § 6, p. 87, note k; 10 Ves. Jun., 360, Rider v. Kidder; 1 P. Wms. 382, Jacobson v. Williams.) And so far from setting aside such a deed as this, a court of equity will enforce a mere agreement for a settlement even in opposition to creditors.

If this were a contest between the creditors of the wife, and the creditors of the husband, the contest must be decided in favor of the former. "Though the husband by the marriage adopts the wife and her circumstances together, and is liable to her then debts, yet he is liable to them only during the coverture, unless the creditor recover judgment against him in the life-time of the wife; nor can a court of equity make him liable in respect of the fortune which he may have had with her." (1 Fonb., 91, c. 2, § 6; 1 P., Wms., 461, Earl of Thom- 162*] ond v. Earl of Suffolk;* 3 P., Wms., 410, Heard v. Stamford; Forrester, 173.) Her debts do not by the marriage become absolutely his debts. Her creditors do not lose their right of action against her; but after his death may pursue their remedy against her and her separate estate.

The terms debtor and creditor are correlative. The creditor meant by the statute must mean the creditor of that debtor whose deed is to be set aside.

This deed was not void ab initio as to any creditor of either of the parties. For eight months it was valid as to all creditors; and is still valid as to all the parties.

Here is no fraud, either legal or moral, as to the creditors of the husband. The consideration of marriage is a fair, a valuable, and a highly favored consideration, and has always prevailed, both at law and in equity, even against creditors.

The plaintiff's counsel, however, set up the marriage itself to defeat the deed made in consideration of that marriage.

The case of Edwards v. Mercer (2 Term., Rep., 588), was a case of fraud. It was void ab initio; not by reason of the omission to record it.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., mentioned the case of Anderson v. Anderson (2 Call, 204), where it seems to have been decided that the word creditor, in the act, included creditors of the husband as well as creditors of the wife.

Jones. That was not the case of a conveyance, but of a contract before marriage without the intervention of a trustee. This contract did not, and could not, prevent the legal operation of the marriage which transferred everything to the husband. The wife was possessed of the legal estate at the time of the mar-163*] riage. But in the present case the *deed was good, and no legal estate remained in Rebecca Kenner, at the time of her marriage.

Swann, in reply.

The words of the act are, that the deed shall be void as to "all creditors and subsequent purchasers" unless, &c. The plaintiff being a creditor, it is void as to him. By the marriage the property, as to the plaintiff's claim, vested in Charles Turner, in the same manner as if Rebecca Kenner had transferred it to him by deed duly acknowledged and recorded. He received possession of them, and from that possession acquired credit with the plaintiff and others. If this property should not be rendered liable to his debts, the object of the law will be frustrated.

To restrict the term creditors to the creditors of the grantor is neither consistent with the letter nor the spirit of the law.

If this construction be correct, the creditors of a subsequent purchaser are not entitled to the benefit of this act. If the property should pass through the hands of six purchasers, would not the creditors of the last purchaser be entitled to seize it? And shall the vendor set up a secret deed, and claim it, because the creditor is not his creditor? How would this differ from the case of a creditor of the first purchaser? The claim of such a creditor would be good against the secret deed of the vendor.

The marriage being a purchase, the creditor stands upon the same ground.

The creditors of the vendor and purchaser have a right to consider the deed as null.

If the vendor retains possession of the property, and appears to be the owner, the creditor may seize it notwithstanding a secret unrecorded deed.

So if a purchaser has obtained a deed for it, and *is the apparent owner of it, the [164 creditor of the purchaser may seize it notwithstanding a secret unrecorded deed.

Unless the act of assembly has this operation, it has none, and no marriage settlement will be recorded in future.

The derivative title may be better than the original; as in the case of a purchaser without notice from a purchaser with notice.

Charles Turner had notice, but if he had sold to a purchaser who had not notice, this purchaser must have held the property against this unrecorded deed. (Sugden's Law of Vendors, 448; 2 Vern., 384; Amb., 313; 2 Atk., 242.)

The deed was void ab initio as to creditors, as soon as the time for recording had elapsed.

March 13. WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

This is an action brought by a creditor of Charles Turner, against Rebecca Turner, who is charged as his executrix; and the questions submitted to the consideration of the court are, 1st. Whether the slaves, mentioned in the deed of the 14th of February, 1798, are to be taken as assets belonging to the estate of Charles Turner; and if so, then, 2d. Whether Mrs. Turner can, under the circumstances of this case, be properly charged as an executrix of her own wrong? If the first question be determined in favor of the defendant in error, it will become unnecessary to consider the second; as it does not appear that Mrs. Turner intermeddled in any manner with the estate of her deceased husband, unless these slaves did, in point of law, constitute a part of that estate.

*The first question depends upon the [165
construction which the court may give to the 4th

section of the statute of Virginia, passed on the 13th of December, 1792, entitled "An act for regulating conveyances," which declares that all conveyances of land, marriage settlements of lands, slaves, or other personal property, deeds of trust and mortgages thereafter made should be void as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, unless the same were acknowledged or proved, and recorded within the time prescribed by the statute; but that the same as between the parties and their heirs should nevertheless be valid and binding.

The deed from Rebecca Kenner, the defendant in error, previous to her intermarriage with Charles Turner, by which the slaves in question were settled on the said Charles Turner and herself, during their lives, and the life of the longest liver of them, with remainder to the heirs of the said Rebecca, not having been proved and recorded within the time prescribed by law, it is contended by the plaintiff in error that the same became void as to the creditors of Charles Turner, whose rights remained unimpaired by that deed, in the same manner as if it had never been made; in which case, it is not denied that an absolute estate would have vested in the husband, on his marriage.

This argument proceeds upon the ground, that by the words "all creditors and subsequent purchasers," is meant as well the creditors of the grantee and subsequent purchasers from him, as those who might derive title under the grantor. Although the words are certainly broad enough to comprehend the whole, it is believed by a majority of the court that the construction should be such as to limit the application of them to the creditors of, and subsequent purchasers from, the grantor. In no case but one, where a title can be set up for the grantee paramount the deed, can it ever be the interest of a creditor of the grantee to insist upon such a construction as is contended for in this; for as he must derive his title under the 166] *deed, if it be void as to him, it is impossible for him to found a claim upon it in right of the grantee, whose only title is under the deed. It would be strange that a deed should be binding upon the grantee and his heirs, and yet void as to persons claiming under him, for a valuable consideration; and yet such would be the consequence, if the words "all creditors and subsequent purchasers" should be understood to apply to persons claiming under the grantee as well as those claiming under the grantor. Indeed it would seem repugnant and absurd to apply the same expressions to persons, who, if they claim at all, must claim under the deed, and also to those who claim against the deed; in the latter case, the invalidity of the deed is consistent with the claim, in the former it is destructive of it.

It may be said, however, that these observations are inapplicable to this particular case, because the creditors of the husband do not claim under but against the deed; and, in this respect, stand upon the same ground as the creditors of the grantor. But if in every other case which can be stated, the invalidity of the deed is applicable to the creditors of the grantor, or those claiming under him, and to none other, by what rule of construction can the same words have a more extended meaning, so as to be applied to persons who claim in right of a party to the same deed other than the grantor? If the deed in question had granted to Charles Turner an estate in fee as to the land, and for life in respect to the slaves, would it have been void as to simple contract creditors, who could go only against the personal estate, and good as to specialty creditors, who might subject the real assets? and yet, if the deed be void at all, as to the creditors of the husband, it must be so throughout; in which case it might well be doubted whether the land could be made liable to the payment of the husband's debts; or, to present the question in a less doubtful shade, would the deed be considered void as to a purchaser, from the husband, of the slaves, and good as to a purchaser of the land? Let the true interpretation of the words "all *creditors and subsequent [167 purchasers" be once ascertained, and every difficulty in the case is at an end. If they are construed to mean the creditors of the grantor, or subsequent purchasers from him, then, the deed being good between all the parties to it, no estate vested in Charles Turner but such as the deed itself passed to him. The title of his creditors being clearly derivative, if he had no title under the deed, (and being himself bound by it, he could have none which was inconsistent with it), then his creditors could have none. But if he had a title incompatible with that granted by the deed, then he was not bound by the deed; contrary to the statute which declares that he was bound. If his creditors have any such title, it cannot be derived from him, when, in point of law, he had none in himself; and, independent of his title, it is impossible to show any in them. If a subsequent purchaser, with notice of a prior unrecorded deed, could not prevail against the title of the first purchaser, and most unquestionably he could not, how much stronger is the case when such subsequent purchaser is even a party to the first deed, and claims an interest under it? To say in this case, that, upon the marriage of Charles Turner, or at any time afterwards, the law cast upon him an estate in the property conveyed by this deed, of which he had notice, and to which he was a party, inconsistent with the estate conveyed to him by that deed, (and this must be said, if his creditors can claim such estate in his right), is, in the opinion of a majority of the court, repugnant to the plain meaning and spirit of the law under consideration.

That creditors of the husband, or purchasers from him, may be injured by the construction which this court feels itself compelled to give to this law, need not be denied; but it is not for this tribunal to afford them relief. It might, perhaps, be well if the law were so amended as to render deeds made in contemplation of marriage void in express terms, as to the creditors of the husband, or purchasers from him, in case the same should not be recorded within the time prescribed by law.

*The court has felt some difficulty [168 in consequence of a decision of the Court of Appeals in the case of Anderson v. Anderson; but it is believed that the judgment in that case was perfectly correct, let the particular point which occurs in this cause be settled one way or the other. In that case, the contract was not only executory and rendered void, at law, by the subsequent intermarriage of the parties to the contract, but it was, at the time when the slaves were taken in execution, perfectly contingent whether the wife could ever claim any interest in them, in opposition to persons deriving title under the husband. For if the husband should have survived the wife, or if they should have had issue, the absolute legal estate of the husband, gained by the intermarriage, would have remained unaffected by the deed. There was, therefore, no reason why the creditors of the husband should be prevented from receiving satisfaction of their debts out of his legal estate in the slaves, because it was subject to an equitable contingent interest in the wife, which might never become effectual. A court of equity might well say to her, as you have no remedy, at law, for a breach of the contract by the husband, in consequence of not having interposed trustees to protect your rights, and have omitted to record the deed by which creditors and subsequent purchasers might be defrauded, we will not now decree you a specific performance against creditors who have law and equity on their side.

Decree affirmed.

JOHNSON, J. I am unfortunate enough to dissent from my brethren in this case. I think the creditors of Turner entitled to recover, and entitled to recover in this form of action.

I will not contest the general principle, that the creditors, to whose benefit this act must be understood to operate, are the creditors of that party only from whom the estate moves. But this case presents an exception to the general 169] rule; and the reasoning, *from which the general conclusion results, will be found inapplicable to the case of husband and wife, with regard to the personal estate of the latter.

The words of the act are admitted to be sufficiently comprehensive to include the creditors of both: the general rule is, that the letter must prevail; and it is only when an adherence to the letter will involve a court in absurdity, or inextricable difficulty, that the spirit is resorted to as a restriction upon the literal meaning. But the construction which I give to this act removes repugnance and absurdity, and produces a concordance between the letter and the spirit, which appears to my mind conclusive upon its correctness.

What was the object of the legislature? It was to protect the community from that false credit which men acquire in society, from the possession of or supposed interest in property; to place within their reach the means of avoiding those frauds which may be practiced upon them, by the possessor of property, when an estate or interest in it exists, in fact, in some other person.

The argument in favor of the defendant is, that the creditors of the grantee can derive no benefit from a deed which the act declares void, and which, consequently, could vest no interest in their debtor. Through him they must claim, and no other estate but that which existed in him, ought to be subjected to their debts.

I will not pass an opinion upon the correctness of an argument which, in the case where possession follows the alienation, may make the act productive of the very fraud which it was intended to obviate. My opinion is founded upon a ground which is unaffected by the conclusion upon this point, or rather in perfect coincidence with that conclusion. I deduce my conclusion from the consideration that the claim of Turner's creditors is not derived through the *deed, but is, in fact, in direct hostility [170 with its operation. The effect of the marriage, in transferring the property to the husband, is the foundation of their claim; and the deed executed on the intermarriage of the defendant with Charles Turner, constitutes the subject of the defense against their claim. The creditors, in order to maintain their action, prove, first, the property in the wife before marriage, then her intermarriage with their debtor. These facts, in operation of law, upon her personal property, sustain their right of recovery. But, in opposition to their claim, the wife endeavors to avail herself of this deed; and this question is brought up on an exception taken by the creditors to its legal validity. The ground of their objection is, that it wants that evidence of authenticity, which the law requires, to make it, as to them, a valid instrument. No doubt is entertained with regard to the invalidity of this instrument, as to one description of creditors; but it is contended, on behalf of the defendant, that no other creditors can avail themselves of that objection, except the creditors of the wife before marriage. There appears to me to be no reason for the distinction in the case of husband and wife. Her creditors before marriage become his during coverture; she can contract no debts to which she can be made personally liable; her personal property becomes his by the act of intermarriage, and he acquires all the credit in society, resulting from the acquisition and possession of that property. It is not upon a deed, which this act declares void, that the creditors found their claim, but upon an act in pais, the operation of which is an immediate transfer of property, unless that effect be prevented by the legal execution of some instrument of writing. If such an instrument, executed before marriage, be not recorded within eight months, it loses all legal validity as to creditors, and it is the same as if no such instrument had ever been executed. The recording, as to them, is as necessary as the sealing and delivery is between the parties.

*The consistency of this opinion with [171 the argument that the creditors of the grantee can derive no interest under a deed which, as to them, is declared void, will appear from distinctly reflecting on the necessary consequence of such an admission in this case. Declare the deed void, and what is the consequence? It no longer affects the property of the wife, so as to produce a state of things different from that which would exist if it had never been created; and the operation of the deed was not to vest an interest or estate in Charles Turner, but to prevent any estate from vesting in him by the ordinary effect of marriage. Remove the preventing cause, and the property becomes, unquestionably, subject to the husband's debts.

Two objections to this opinion have been urged, on which it may be proper to make some remarks. The first that I shall notice is, how the same deed can be valid as between the parties, so as really to prevent any transfer of property to the husband, and yet, through him, creditors may derive such an interest as to subject it to the payment of his debts. If this argument proves anything, it proves too much. A moment's reflection will show, that it is as applicable to the case of the grantor as of the grantee; for, after the execution of the deed, the grantor has, in fact, and in the acknowledgment of the act, no more interest in the property than the grantee had before its execution, or upon its becoming void for want of recording. But every apparent absurdity may be reconciled thus. Legal claims must be supported by legal proof. The abstract rights of parties become immaterial, if not susceptible of substantiation by evidence. In a question, then, between the direct representatives of the husband and wife, the deed is a valid instrument, and may be received as duly authenticated written evidence, to support a right derived under it. But, between the one party and the creditor of the other, the law declares it wholly inefficacious, for want of a ceremony which is made essential to its authenticity. The most ordinary deed 172] cannot be *received in evidence until proved according to the rules of evidence; and the operation of individual acts, in producing transfers of property, must ever be subject to such modifications as may be made by positive law.

The other difficulty arises from the consideration how this deed can be valid against all persons (which it confessedly is) during eight months, and then cease to operate as to creditors. To this it may be answered, that this objection, as well as the preceding, is equally applicable to the case of the creditor both of alienor and alienee; and, if valid at all, might defeat the operation of this act altogether. But, as a provision of positive law, such considerations are not to defeat it. Possibly some inconvenience may result from holding property in this suspended situation; but the duration of the inconvenience is not long, nor the contingency far remote. Nor is an analogous state of things unknown to the common or civil lawyer; executory devises, contingent remainders, and shifting uses, produce a similar uncertainty and suspension of right. During the eight months which are given for recording a deed, the interests of parties must have vested only sub modo, or subject to the contingency of recording it within the legal time: and no doubt a court of equity would interpose its authority, during that period, to adjust the rights of parties. Nor will this objection at all affect the opinion which I entertain respecting the rights of the plaintiff; for, although the deed certainly did hold the personal property of the wife in a suspended state, during the eight months, so that the creditors could not in that time, have taken it under execution, yet, after the expiration of that period, the deed lost its protecting effect, and that property then became subject to their debts.

These views of the subject appeared to me to solve every difficulty, and lead to a conclusion upon the second point made in the argument; viz., whether the defendant may be charged as executrix de son tort. The case of Harding & Mercer comes *fully up to the present, and it will be found of necessity, in order to give effect to this act, that this remedy should be countenanced. The hardships of it would, no doubt, be remedied by a court of equity, in cases free from collusion or moral fraud, so as to prevent the defendant from being charged to an amount greater than the value of the goods which actually came to her hands. But the necessity of sanctioning this mode of pursuing property, circumstanced as in this case, will appear from the impossibility of a creditor's getting at it in any other manner, at law. Should the creditor himself administer, he can never recover it, because, as the legal representative of the husband, the deed would be valid against him without being recorded. Should any other person administer, he could never be charged with the value of assets, which, for the same reason, could never come to his hands. So that both precedent and principle concur in supporting the correctness of permitting him to resort to the present remedy.

KEMPE'S LESSEE v. KENNEDY et al

The inferior Court of Common Pleas for the county of Hunterdon, in the state of New Jersey, in May, 1779, had a general jurisdiction in all cases of inquisition for treason, and its judgment, although erroneous, was not void, inasmuch as the court had jurisdiction of the cause.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of New Jersey, in an action of ejectment brought by John Den, lessee of Grace Kempe, a British subject, against R. Kennedy and M. Cowell, citizens of the state of New Jersey, for land in that state.

Upon the trial of the cause upon the general issue, a bill of exceptions was taken by the plaintiff, which presents the following case:

Grace Coxe, the lessor of the plaintiff, being seized in fee of the land in question, before the year 1772 intermarried with John Tabor Kempe, who died in August 1792. They resided in New York before and during the war with Great Britain, and went to Great Britain when New York was evacuated *by the British army. [*174 Grace Kempe, since the death of her husband, has continued to reside, and now resides, in Great Britain, where he died; having been in possession of the land in right of his wife, on the first of March, 1776, and until the same was seized by the authority of the state of New Jersey.

The defendants relied upon several acts of the legislature of New Jersey; an inquisition taken under the authority of those acts; a judgment of the inferior Court of Common Pleas for the county of Hunterdon, in May, 1779, upon that inquisition, confiscating the estate; a judgment of the inferior Court of Common Pleas for the county of Sussex; an execution upon that judgment; and a deed from Joseph Gaston, an agent for the state of New Jersey, to the defendant Kennedy, whose tenant the other defendant was; and proved, that he had always been in possession under that deed from the day of its date to the day of trial.

Upon this case the plaintiff prayed the court to instruct the jury that they ought to find a verdict for him; which the court refused, and directed the jury that they ought to find a verdict for the defendants; to which refusal and direction the plaintiff excepted, and brought his writ of error.

R. Stockton, for plaintiff in error.

This case turns on the validity of the forfeiture and confiscation under the acts of the state of New Jersey.

The great objection is, that Mrs. Kempe was not an object of those laws.

The whole question depends upon the act of the 11th of December, 1778, entitled "An act for forfeiting to, and vesting in, the state of New Jersey, the real estates of certain fugitives and offenders, and for directing the mode of determining and satisfying the lawful debts and 175] demands which may *be due from, or made against, such fugitives and offenders, and for other purposes therein mentioned;" by the 3d section of which it is enacted, "that each and every person, not an inhabitant of this state, but of some of the other United States, and seized or possessed of, interested in, or entitled unto, any estate, real or personal, within this state, who hath, since the 19th day of April, 1775, aided or assisted, or doth now, or hereafter may, aid or assist the enemies of this state, or of the United States, by joining their armies within this state, or elsewhere, or who already hath, or hereafter shall have, voluntarily gone to, taken refuge or continued with, or endeavored to continue with, the enemy aforesaid, and aid them by counsel, or otherwise, shall be, and is hereby declared to be, guilty of high treason against this state; and on conviction thereof by inquisition found, and final judgment entered thereon in favor of the state, in manner hereinafter declared, such conviction shall amount to a full and absolute forfeiture of such offender's estate, both real and personal whatsoever, within this state, to and for the use of the same. Provided always, that such conviction shall not in any instance extend to affect the person of any such offender, but shall operate against his or her estate only."

Mrs. Kempe does not come within any of the descriptions of offenders in this section.

The inquisition charges, that Kempe and wife are offenders against the act of 11th of December, 1778, in this, "that the said John Tabor Kempe and Grace his wife, did go to the enemy, and took refuge with them some time in April, 1776, and still remain with them," "against the form of their allegiance to this estate."

The truth of the fact is, that they did not go to the enemy, but remained at their own homes, and the enemy came to them.

176*] *But take the fact as charged; she and her husband, i. e., she in company with her husband; and legally, by the command and control of her husband, in April, 1776, went to the British and remained with them.

This is a joint charge for a joint act of the husband and wife; and is in the technical language always used when the wife is charged with concurring in the act of the husband.

Here, then, is a feme covert charged under this section for accompanying her baron in April, 1776, before any government was established, before any law defining treason, and even before New Jersey had formed her constitution, and before any prohibition of the act done by her. She simply remained with her husband, without affording any aid to the enemy.

Such a person is not within the purview of this section, and therefore, though the forfeiture perhaps operated on the interest of the husband, it did not reach the estate of the wife.

We contend,

1. That this section does not extend to femes covert acting with, and therefore by presumption of law under control of, their husbands.

And, 2. That if it did extend to any feme covert, yet it did not extend to one who only went and remained; she must have aided and assisted.

1. No feme covert is within the act. It is confined to those who voluntarily go and remain. It supposes a free will, a volition, an election to go or stay; but a feme covert in the presence of her baron, has no will; and on the subject of residence, she can have no will different from his. She is bound by law to live with him if he requires it. This would be the case at all times, even after *the [177 passing of these laws; for as freedom of will is of the essence of all crimes, a woman cannot commit a crime of this sort, not even this species of treason, by obeying her husband.

But when this fact was done there was neither government nor law to offend against. The only law which existed placed her under the dominion of her husband. He had the right to command, and the power to compel her to go and remain with him, and she had neither right to refuse nor power to resist.

But if these laws had then existed, she could not be charged for any breach of them in company with her husband. (1 Hawk., 3, § 9; 1 Hale, 47.) Receiving her husband, knowing him to be a traitor, is not treason.

The facts of her coverture, and going and remaining with her husband, appear upon the face of the inquisition itself, and clearly show that she could not have been an offender against the act, and therefore that her estate was not forfeited.

Nor can the legislature be presumed to have intended to include persons in her situation; for that would have been cruel. They did not mean to legislate against the most important duties of social and domestic life, to cut asunder the bands of matrimonial union, to compel a wife to abandon her husband or forfeit her estate.

Mrs. Kempe, not having the capacity voluntarily to commit the offense, was not an object of the law, and, consequently, the justice who took the inquisition had not jurisdiction as it regarded her. The inquisition itself does not charge the act to be done by her voluntarily; and this being essential to the offense, ought to have been directly charged. No implication is sufficient. (2 Hawk., 354, § 110.) Penal laws are to be construed strictly, especially as to the description of the offender; and general words *ought to be so restrained as not to in- [178 clude innocent persons if they can be otherwise satisfied.

The person who is the proper object of the act must be an inhabitant of some state other than New Jersey. A feme covert cannot properly be called an inhabitant of a state. The husband is the inhabitant. By the constitution of New Jersey, all inhabitants are entitled to vote; but it has never been supposed that a feme covert was a legal voter. Single women have been allowed to vote, because the law supposes them to have wills of their own.

The word "her" in the last clause of the section may be satisfied by restricting its sense to single women.

If this act be not limited to those acting sui juris, it may as well comprehend infants at the breast as femes covert.

In the case of Martin v. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, (1 Williams's Mass., Rep.,390,) it was decided that a feme covert did not forfeit her lands by joining the enemy with her husband; and the reasoning of the judges in that case applies with equal force to this.

2. If the provisions of this act extend to any feme covert, yet they do not extend to one in the situation of Mrs. Kempe; for by the very words of the act, she must not only have "voluntarily gone to, taken refuge, or continued with, or endeavored to continue with, the enemy," but she must also have "aided them by counsel or otherwise."

The inquisition does not find that she aided them in any manner. The species of treason intended to be described was that of adhering to the enemies of the country, giving them aid and comfort, as defined by the statute of Edw. III.

It is clear then that Mrs. Kempe was not an 179*] offender *against that law, and consequently her estate not forfeitable under it.

But an important point still remains to be decided, viz., what is to be the consequence of this improper construction? are the proceedings merely erroneous, or are they void? are they good until reversed, or a nullity ab initio? If merely erroneous and good until reversed, the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed. But if the proceedings are void ab initio, there has been no judgment, and, consequently, no forfeiture.

This point must be determined by the known principles of the common law. These were ingrafted into the constitution of New Jersey, and have never been impaired by the legislature, so far as they apply to the ordinary administration of justice.

The tribunal erected to execute these laws was an inferior tribunal, proceeding, by force of particular statutes, out of the course of the common law; it was a jurisdiction limited by the statute, both as to the nature of the offense and the description of persons over whom it should have cognizance. Everything ought to have been stated in the proceedings which was necessary to give the court jurisdiction, and to justify the judgment of forfeiture. If the jurisdiction does not appear upon the face of the proceedings, the presumption of law is, that the court had not jurisdiction, and so the cause coram non judice. In which case no valid judgment could be rendered.

The proceedings were instituted before a justice of peace upon the information of certain commissioners. The justice issued his warrant to a constable to summon a jury, who take the inquest and return it to the justice, who returns it to the inferior Court of Common Pleas, all of whom are to procced according to certain forms prescribed by the statute. The inferior Court of Common Pleas has no criminal jurisdiction but what is given by these very statutes relative to treason. And if the pro- 180*] ceedings in this *case do not show it to be a case within those statutes, the presumption of law is that the case was not within the cognizance of the court.

But the law itself is founded in manifest injustice. It is clearly ex post facto. It makes that act a crime which was innocent when committed; not only innocent when committed, but at that time there was neither constitution nor government to sin against.

There is no presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of the court of limited jurisdiction. (2 Wils., 382, 383; 6 Mod., 224; 9 Mod., 95.)

This is a case of conviction under a penal statute; and there is, in point of principle, no difference between this and a conviction before a single magistrate. The cases on this subject fully apply. (4 Burr., 2279, Rex v. Corden; 1 Burr., 148,153, Rex v. Jarvis; 6 Term Rep., 583; 4 Burr., 2244; Cowp., 26, 29; 2 Wils., 382; 2 Inst., 231; 12 Mod., 355; 1 Lev., 160.)

The 11th section of the act of December 11, 1778, will be relied on as barring the plaintiff's claim to the land, and compelling her to resort to the treasury for indemnification.

But that section both in words and spirit is applicable only to proceedings and judgments having legal entity and existence, not to proceedings void for want of jurisdiction. It speaks of proceedings by virtue of which any such sale shall be made. The sale referred to is a sale in pursuance of, and warranted by, the acts.

The words "shall hereafter be reversed or made void," refer to some measure afterwards to be resorted to, to accomplish the reversal of existing judgments or proceedings, for error, or irregularity. The term "erroneous" being the appropriate word to describe errors apparent on the record, and *"void," to describe [181 irregularities. The case of Parsons v. Loyd (3 Wils.,344), shows that irregular proceedings are called void proceedings. The legislature meant to encourage sales by protecting the purchaser in all cases where the offender was a proper object of the laws. It was foreseen that writs of error or certiorari might be brought to reverse those judgments; and that applications might be made to the courts of common pleas to vacate the proceedings for irregularities committed by the justice, or constable, or jury, or the court itself. It interposed this section, but it never meant to give sanction to a proceeding entirely coram non judice.

Lewis, contra.

The bill of exceptions prays the opinion of the court upon the whole case. Upon such a prayer the facts ought to be as fully stated as in a special verdict. It presents no question of law. It does not appear that Grace Kempe ever was seized in fee. But if she was, the estate was devested out of her, and vested in the state of New Jersey.

The proceedings were all perfectly regular, and correspondent with the law.

But even if they were not, the 11th section of the law prevents such error from affecting the title of a bona fide purchaser. It declares "That if any process or proceedings, by virtue of which any such sale may be made as aforesaid, shall hereafter be reversed, or made void, for error, or any other cause whatsoever, such reversal shall not affect, or injure, or be in force, or in any wise operate against any bona fide purchaser under this act, but against the state only; and in every such case the plaintiff in error, or person injured by the sale of any estate, shall apply to the legislature to be indem-nified out of the public treasury, to the amount of the purchase money received for such estate."

The title under the sale is good even if the 182] person *whose lands were so condemned and sold were dead at the time of the judgment. Even an innocent third person, whose lands may have been condemned and sold, can never disturb the title of the purchaser; his only remedy is against the state by petition to the legislature.

If the judgment be erroneous, still it is valid until it is reversed; and if reversed, the only remedy is against the state.

It is objected, that the law is ex post facto, and contrary to natural justice. Admit it to be so, yet there was nothing to prevent New Jersey from passing such a law. She was sovereign and independent, and had the power to make what laws she pleased. There was nothing in her constitution to prevent it.

A wife may commit treason in company with her husband. The only exception in cases of treason is, that the wife is not guilty of treason in receiving her husband knowing him to be a traitor.

It is objected that a wife living with her husband cannot be an inhabitant: but there is nothing inconsistent in the idea. The husband and wife are both inhabitants; and it is evident that the legislature meant to include them, because they speak of "his or her estate." And the word "her" comprehends femes covert as well as femes sole.

The inquisition does not state it to be a joint offense. If she would avail herself of the objections, she ought to have appeared and traversed the inquisition.

Martin's case, in Massachusetts, was a mere question of escheat. It was a civil case, and it was clear that no woman was comprehended within the terms of the law. The question altogether depended upon the words and intention of the statute of Massachusetts, and not at 183] all upon the *question whether a woman could commit treason in company with her husband.

The Court of Common Pleas of New Jersey is not limited as to subject matter in common pleas. It is a court of record, and a writ of error lies to its judgment. The cases respecting limited jurisdictions do not apply. It is true that it has not a general criminal jurisdiction, but in these cases of confiscation it had an unlimited and exclusive jurisdiction. The legislature of New Jersey had a right to alter the law which required that the jurisdiction should appear upon the face of the inquisition.

If the inquisition be upon a matter within their jurisdiction, it is unimportant whether the offense be defectively set forth.

The defect in setting forth the offense does not affect the jurisdiction of the court.

If the word "voluntarily" ought to have been inserted in the inquisition, it is only error of judgment in the court; but it does not deprive the court of its jurisdiction.

Stockton, in reply.

There is no well-founded objection to the bill of exceptions; the form of which is warranted, as well by the books as by the practice of New Jersey. It contains the evidence on both sides, and the point of the charge of the court to the jury, which in such a case, is all that is necessary to bring the whole case fairly before this court.

The neglect of Mrs. Kempe to traverse the inquisition cannot injure her, if the court had no jurisdiction. A person not an object of that law was under no obligation to take notice of the proceeding.

*The estates of third persons, whose [184 lands by mistake were sold, were not forfeited, nor their rights affected. All the sections of the act, which create forfeitures, relate only to the estate of the offender.

The 11th section of the act applies only to cases in which the court having jurisdiction has proceeded wrongfully, whereby their proceedings might be reversed for error, or declared void for irregularity; not to cases where the court, under color of the law, proceeded against persons not within it.

February 20. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In this case two points are made by the plaintiff in error.

1. That the judgment rendered by the Court of Common Pleas, which is supposed to bar the plaintiff's title, is clearly erroneous.

2. That it is an absolute nullity, and is to be entirely disregarded in this suit.

However clear the opinion of the court may be, on the first point, in favor of the plaintiff, it will avail her nothing unless she succeeds upon the second. Without repeating, therefore, those arguments which have been so well urged at the bar, to show that the inquisition in this case did not warrant the judgment which was rendered on it, the court will proceed to inquire whether that judgment, while unreversed, does not bar the plaintiff's title.

The law respecting the proceedings of inferior courts, according to the sense of that term as employed in the English books, has been correctly laid down. The only question is, was the court, in *which this [185 judgment was rendered, "an inferor court," in that sense of the term?

All courts from which an appeal lies are inferior courts in relation to the appellate court before which their judgment may be carried; but they are not therefore inferior courts in the technical sense of those words. They apply to courts of a special and limited jurisdiction, which are erected on such principles that their judgments, taken alone, are entirely disregarded, and the proceedings must show their jurisdiction. The courts of the United States are all of limited jurisdiction, and their proceedings are erroneous, if the jurisdiction be not shown upon them. Judgments rendered in such cases may certainly be reversed, but this court is not prepared to say that they are absolute nullities, which may be totally disregarded.

In considering this question, therefore, the constitution and powers of the court, in which this judgment was rendered, must be inspected.

It is understood to be a court of record possessing, in civil cases, a general jurisdiction to any amount, with the exception of suits for real property.

In treason, its jurisdiction is over all who can commit the offense.

The act of the 4th of October, 1776, defines the crime, and that of the 20th of September, 1777, prescribes the punishment. The act of the 18th of April, 1778, describes the mode of trial, and the tribunal by which final judgment shall be rendered. That tribunal is the inferior Court of Common Pleas in each county. Every case of treason, which could arise under the former statutes, is to be finally decided in this court. With respect to treason, then, it is a court of general jurisdiction, so far as respects the property of the accused.

186*] *The act of the 11th December, 1778, extends the crime of treason to acts not previously comprehended within the law, but makes no alteration in the tribunal before which this offense is to be tried, and by which final judgment is to be rendered.

This act cannot, it is conceived, be fairly construed to convert the Court of Common Pleas into a court of limited jurisdiction, in cases of treason. It remains the only court capable of trying the offenses described by the laws which have been mentioned, and it has jurisdiction over all offenses committed under them.

In the particular case of Grace Kempe, the inquest is found in the form prescribed by law, and by persons authorized to find it. The court was constituted according to law; and, if an offense, punishable by the law, had been in fact committed, the accused was amenable to its jurisdiction, so far as respected her property in the state of New Jersey. The question whether this offense was or was not committed, that is, whether the inquest which is substituted for a verdict on an indictment, did or did not show that the offeuse had been committed, was a question which the court was competent to decide. The judgment it gave was erroneous, but it is a judgment, and, until reversed, cannot be disregarded.

This case differs from the case from third Institute in this. In that case the court was composed of special commissioners authorized to proceed, not in all cases of treason, but in those cases only in which an indictment had been taken before fifteen commissioners. Their error was not in rendering judgment againt a person who was not proved by the indictment to have committed the crime, but who, if guilty, they had no power to try. The proceedings there were clearly coram non judice.

It is unnecessary to notice the eleventh sec-

187*] tion of *the act, since, without resorting to it, this court is of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court. It is affirmed, with costs.

v.

JAMES YOUNG.

The court is not bound to give an opinion to the jury as to the meaning, or construction, of a written deposition read in evidence in the cause.

It is no ground of reversal that the court below refused a new trial which had been moved for on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sittiug at Alexandria, in an action of covenant, brought by the defendant in error upon a policy of insurance under the corporate seal of the plaintiffs in error.

The point in issue, in the court below, was, whether the insured, on the 11th of December, 1800, when he wrote his order for insurance, had notice of a storm which happened at Jamaica, on thc 2d of November, 1800.

Part of the evidence offered to the jury was the deposition of David Young, a witness examined on behalf of the plaintiffs in error. Upon his cross-examination by the defeudant in error, at the time of the taking of the deposition, he was asked this question, viz., "On what day in December did you inform the plaintiff that there had been a gale of wind in Jamaica? To which it was stated in the deposition that he answered, "that on the 13th of December, 1800, he had informed the plaintiff (below) that there had been a strong northern in Jamaica; the circumstance which induced him to mention this, was in consequence of a very heavy gale having happened the day before, and the brig Mary, being then in Hampton Roads, which produced this remark, that he had a blowing voyage out, being compelled to throw over his guns, and that the aforesaid northern had happened when he was in St. Anne's."

After the jury had retired to consider of their *verdict, they sent a writteu paper to the [188 judges, requesting to be instructed by the court, whether the above answer of David Young would admit of any other reasouable or legal constrnction, than that the 13th of December, 1800, was the first information given by him to the plaintiff below of the storm of the 2d of November.

But the court refused to give any opinion to the jury upon the coustruction of the answer of David Young, unless with the assent of both parties; and the counsel for the plaintiffs in error refused to assent, and took a bill of exceptions to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury, without the consent of both parties.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant in error; and before judgment, the plaintiffs in error moved the court for a new trial, upon the grouud that the verdict was contrary to evidence.

The court having refused to grant a new trial, the counsel for the plaintiffs in error tendered a bill of exceptions, containing what they supposed to be a correct statement of all the evidence offered on the trial, consisting of depositions and other papers, together with viva voce testimony, the substance of which they stated they had taken from their notes. But the court refused to seal the bill of exceptions uuless the counsel for the plaintiff below would agree to a statemeut of the evidence, the court not being satisfied that the bill of exceptions statcd all the evidence offered at the trial. To this refusal of the court to seal the bill of exceptions, the counsel for the plaintiffs in error tendered another bill of exceptions, which the judges sealed.

C. Lee and E. J. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the court was bound to give an opinion to the jury, upon the meaning of the witness's answer, and ought to have instructed the 189] jury *that the answer did not necessarily import that the 13th of December, 1800, was the first time that the witness mentioned to the defendant in error the storm of the 2d of November; and that if he had given him the information before that day, his answer was so vague that he could not have been convicted of perjury.

2. That the court below ought to have signed the bill of exceptions to their refusal to grant a new trial.

3. That the court ought to have granted a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to evidence; and,

4. That this court, if they believe the evidence is substantially stated in the rejected bill of exceptions, ought to order a new trial.

To support these points, they cited Co., Litt., 226, b; 295, b; 155, b; Harg. note; 1 Wash., 389; 2 Wash., 275; 9 Co., 12. b; 13, a; 3 Cranch, 298; 3 N. Y. Term Rep., 49; 2 N. Y. Term Rep., 330; Bac. Swann, contra.

A deposition is merely parol testimony, and the jury is the proper tribunal to judge of the meaning of a witness.

If the witness was not sufficiently explicit, the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, who were present at the examination, ought to have made the witness explain himself more fully. (2 Term Rep., 760, Lloyd v. Maund.)

The refusal to grant a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was against evidence, is not error.

A motion for a new trial on that ground is in 190] the *nature of a writ of error coram vobis for error in fact.

C. Lee and E. J. Lee, in reply.

In the case of Lloyd v. Maund, the court was not called upon to say what was the construction of the letter.

This court is a substitute for the Court of Appeals of Virginia, as to the cases from Alexandria, and ought to decide as that court would decide in Virginia. By the practice of that state, it is error to refuse a new trial, if a new trial ought to have been granted. The refusal is a part of the proceedings, and appears upon the record.

In the case of Clarke v. Russel, (3 Dal., 415,) the court undertook to construe and expound a letter.

LIVINGSTON, J. Can this court reverse for error in fact? Suppose we should be of opinion that the court below ought to have granted a new trial, is it not an error in fact?

I have another doubt. Whether it be the ground of a writ of error, if a judge gives or refuses to give an opinion on matter of fact.

A written contract, a bond, note, &c., whatever is the act of the party, is a subject for the construction of the court; but this is not the act of the party, but a mere deposition.

If the court can give the construction of depositions, they may as well try the whole cause when all the evidence consists of depositions.

February 28. CUSHING, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This court is of opinion that the inferior court *was not bound to give a construction [191 of the answer of Captain David Young to the second interrogatory of the plaintiff below, as requested by the jury; and that it would be improper in this court to determine whether the inferior court ought or ought not to have granted the motion of the defendants below for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence.

The judgment below is to be affirmed with costs.

JOHNSON, J. "My object in expressing my opinion in this case, is to avoid having an ambiguous decision hereafter imputed to me, or an opinion which I would not wish to be understood to have given.

"I decide against the appellant on the first point, because an examination of a witness, taken under commission, cannot possibly be considered written evidence, as the counsel have contended it is; nor is the meaning of a witness, words for the court to determine; but strictly within the province of the jury.

"I decide against the appellant on the second ground, because I am of opinion that no appeal lies to this court from the decision of a circuit court on a motion for a new trial."

BODLEY AND OTHERS v. TAYLOR.

In Kentucky, it is a good ground of equitable jurisdiction, that the defendant has obtained a prior patent for land to which the complainant had the better right under the statute respecting lands; and in exercising that jurisdiction the court will decide in conformity with the settled principles of a court of chancery.

Entries of land in Kentucky must have that reasonable certainty which would enable a subsequent locator, by the exercise of a due degree of judgment and diligence, to locate his own lands on the adjacent residuum.

If the entry be placed on a road at a certain distance from a given point by which the road passes, the distance is to be computed by the meanders of the road and not by a straight line.

If the entry be of a settlement and pre-emption to a tract of land lying on the east side of a road, the 400 acres allowed for the settlement right must be surveyed entirely on the east side of the road, and in the form of a square.

The call for the settlement right is sufficiently certain, but the call for the pre-emption right is too vague and must be rejected.

A defendant in equity who has obtained a patent for land not included in his entry, but covered by the complainants' entry, will be decreed to convey it to the complainants, but the complainants will not be required to convey to the defendant the land which they have obtained a patent for, which was covered by the defendant's entry, but which, by mistake, he omitted to survey.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States, for the District of Kentucky, in a suit in chancery.

Thomas Bodley, James Hughes, Robert Poague and Robert Campbell, citizens of Kentucky, brought their bill in chancery against John Taylor, a citizen of Virginia, in the state court for the District of Washington, from whence it was afterwards, by consent, removed into the federal court for the District of Kentucky.

The bill states that on the 17th of October, 1783, Henry Crutcher and John Tibbs made the following entry with the county surveyor, viz.: "Henry Crutcher and John Tibbs enter ten thousand acres of land on a treasury warrant No. 18,747, as tenants in common; beginning at a large black ash and small buckeye marked thus (I. T.) on the side of a buffalo road leading from the lower Blue Licks a north-east course, and about seven miles north-east by east from said Blue Licks, a corner of an entry of twenty thousand acres made in the name of John Tibbs, John Clarke, John Sharpe, David Blanchard and Alexander M'Clain, running thence with the said Tibbs & Co.'s line 192] due east sixteen *hundred poles, thence south one thousand poles, thence west sixteen hundred poles, thence north one thousand poles to the beginning for quantity." That the same having been surveyed, Crutcher assigned his half to Robert Rutherford, to whom and Willoughby Tibbs (the heir of John Tibbs), a patent was afterwards granted. Tibbs sold his right to Peyton, who sold a moiety thereof to Magill. Rutherford, Peyton and Magill, sold and conveyed the whole for a valuable consideration to the plaintiffs, by deed dated February 15, 1799.

That the defendant Taylor having, on the 22d of May, 1780, made the following entry with the county surveyor, viz.: "John Taylor enters three thousand acres of land upon a treasury warrant adjoining John Walden, on the north side of Johnson's Fork of Licking, on the east and south-east sides, running up and down said creek, and north for quantity, to include an improvement made by Jacob Drennon and Simon Butler," has caused the same to be surveyed expressly contrary to location, and so as to interfere with your orator's claim aforesaid; and having obtained a patent older than that obtained by the said Rutherford and Tibbs, notwithstanding he knows his claim is surveyed contrary to location, and although requested, he refuses to convey to the plaintiffs. The prayer of the bill was, that the defendant should convey to the plaintiffs so much of the land included in the defendant's patent as interfered with the plaintiffs' patent; and for general relief.

The defendant by his answer denied the jurisdiction of the court, as a court of equity, because the plaintiffs stated in their bill no equitable ground of relief. He avers his ignorance of the plaintiffs' title, and that he did not know until within a few days then past, the mode in which his own location or survey was made. That he had employed one Ambrose Walden to cause them to be located. He denies all fraud in making his survey. He avers that he was a bona fide purchaser for a full and 193]*valuable consideration, prior to the title claimed by the plaintiffs. That no caveat was entered against his survey. That he regularly obtained his patent. That a considerable part of his land has been cleared and settled. That 20 years have elapsed since the entry. That the land-marks and geographical objects which were at that time visible, have been changed, altered or destroyed by time.

He contends that if he has surveyed and obtained a grant for lands not described in his entry, and which he had no right to survey, he ought not to be compelled to convey them to the plaintiffs, unless they will convey to him what he had a right to survey, and which they have surveyed, and for which they have obtained a patent. That the plaintiffs' entries cover almost all the lands which the defendant could have surveyed under his entry. That by the plaintiffs' delay the defendant had lost the power to locate his warrants elsewhere, if they are improperly located, which he denies.

He states that his entry was dependant on John Walden's, which depended upon Ambrose Walden's, which depended upon Jacob Johnson's. That Jacob Johnson's was first surveyed by the surveyor who surveyed the entries of the Waldens, and of the defendant. That although Jacob Johnson's survey was afterwards suppressed, yet that did not alter the actual location of the two Waldens and of the defendant. That his survey is correctly made according to the laws of Virginia when it was made, and while Kentucky was a part of Virginia, and that by the same laws, and the compact between Virginia and Kentucky, at the time of separation, his prior patent, founded upon a prior equity, and obtained without fraud, cannot be vacated.

A survey and connected plat was made under an order of the court, and according to the directions of each party.

A jury came, according to the custom of Kentucky *in chancery suits, and being [194 sworn to inquire of such facts as should be submitted to them, found the following facts, viz.: That the place designated on the connected plat by the letter A is the place called for as the beginning corner of John Tibbs & Co.'s entry of 20,000 acres, dated July 31, 1783, on the buffalo road leading from the lower Blue Licks to Limestone, which corner is also the beginning of an entry of 10,000 acres, made the 17th of October, 1783, in the names of Henry Crutcher and John Tibbs, under which the complainants claim; copies of which entries are annexed to their verdict.

The following facts were agreed by the parties, viz.:

2. That the entry of 20,000 acres in the name of John Tibbs and others, and a survey made thereon, for 16,000 acres on the 8th of June, 1796, were assigned to the complainant Bodley, who obtained a patent therefor in his own name dated 21st of April, 1798, and afterwards conveyed one undivided moiety thereof to the complainant Hughes, by deed duly recorded.

3. That the entry of 10,000 acres was made on the 17th of October, 1783, in the name of Henry Crutcher and John Tibbs, surveyed 14th March, 1784, registered 31st December, 1784, and patented in the names of Robert Rutherford, assignee of Henry Crutcher, and Willoughby Tibbs, heir at law of John Tibbs, deceased, 26th August, 1790, was purchased by Bodley 26th September, 1798, and conveyed to all the complainants jointly by deed duly recorded, dated the 15th of February, 1799. That the defendant's survey of 3,000 acres was made on the 1st of September, 1785, registered the 1st of November, 1785, and a patent obtained therefor dated 21st of November, 1786.

4. That the grants issued by the register of the Virginia land-office do not bear regular dates agreeably to the times the surveys were 195] returned, but in *many instances the elder patent has issued on surveys returned several months after surveys on interfering claims were registered.

5. That the surveys of Jacob Johnson's settlement and pre-emption, as stated to have been surveyed in the defendant's first fact, (hereafter stated,) were made by the direction of Simon Kenton, his agent, who was also locator of the claims which call to adjoin the said Johnson's surveys, and were never admitted to record.

6. That Ambrose Walden's survey was made on the 29th of November, 1785, John Walden's the 27th of December, 1785, and Jacob Johnson's settlement and pre-emption, as represented on the connected plat by lines thus, (000,) was made on the 9th of April, 1789, registered and patents issued thereon to John Reed and Arthur Fox, assignee of Johnson, dated the 20th of February, 1793.

7. That more than one entry and survey has been made on almost all the good land in the state of Kentucky.

8. That the several claims, water-courses, improvements, objects and distances laid down on the connected plat, reported by the surveyor, are truly laid down and reported.

FACTS FOR THE DEFENDANT.

1. That the settlement and pre-emption of Peter Johnson, heir at law of Jacob Johnson, after being entered with the surveyor, were actually run out and surveyed as designated on the connected plat by the letters and figures M. N. 2 & 3, that the said surveys were made by a surveyor legally qualified to make the same, prior to the dates of the surveys made for Ambrose Walden, John Walden, and the defendant.

2. That the land surveyed for the said Peter 196] *Johnson, upon the said right of pre-emption, there are now 300 acres of cleared land, upon the said survey of Ambrose Walden 200 acres, upon John Walden's 400, and upon the defendant's 300 acres of cleared land.

3. That on the 22d of May, 1780, the land on which the entries of Johnson, Ambrose Walden, John Walden, and the defendant, were made, was uncultivated, and the country for fifty or sixty miles on all sides without an inhabitant, except Indians, by whom it was much infested, and only occasionally visited by hunters and land-jobbers.

4. That on the 22d of May, 1780, and prior thereto, there were many cabins, marked trees, hunting camps and improvements then plain and notorious on Johnson's Fork, and the other branches of Licking, of which there remain now no traces, and which are now wholly incapable of proof as to what was their exact position.

5. That since that time a great change has taken place in the appearance of the country generally round, and at the place where the defendant's entry lies. That the country is now thickly settled, and in high cultivation. That great changes have taken place in the names of streams, roads and other objects, and that few of those who frequented that part of this country in the year 1780, are now alive.

6. That the complainants, Bodley and Hughes, assignees of Tibbs & Co., are the proprietors of the 16,000 adjoining the 10,000 acres in the bill mentioned.

7. That the cabin represented on the connected plat as Jacob Drennon's is the improvement called for in his certificate for a pre-emption, which was claimed for him before the commissioners by Simon Kenton, who also located the complainants' claim of 3,000 acres.

*8. That the place designated on the [197 plat, on the south side of Johnson's Fork as a cabin, represents a cabin built prior to the first of May, 1780, by Simon Kenton, otherwise called Simon Butler and Jacob Drennon.

It was also agreed between the parties that on and before the 21st of February, 1780, the lower Blue Licks were generally and notoriously known by the appellations "the Blue Licks," and "the lower Blue Licks," and that the road on which the complainants claim their beginning was then generally and notoriously known by the name of the upper road.

That the three buffalo roads laid down upon the connected plat, in February, 1780, and before, led from the lower Blue Licks as represented.

That upon any reasonable plan of surveying the defendant's entry of 3,000 acres, it would be covered by the younger entries of 10,000, and 16,000 acres, the property of the plaintiffs, and would include land of equal or better quality than that which it now covers.

That the land in dispute is of more value than 2,000 dollars.

The following are the entries made by the parties respectively, viz.:

"January 7th, 1780.

"Peter Johnson, heir at law of Jacob Johnson, deceased, this day claimed a settlement and pre-emption to a tract of land in the District of Kentucky, lying on the east side of the buffalo road leading from the Blue Licks to Limestone, nine miles from the lick on the upper road, by the said decedent's raising a crop of corn in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six; satisfactory proof being made to the court, they are of opinion that the said Peter Johnson, &c., has a *right [198 to a settlement of four hundred acres of land, to include the above locations, and the pre-emption of one thousand acres adjoining; and that a certificate issue accordingly."

"February 21st, 1780.

"Peter Johnson, heir, &c., enters 400 acres in Kentucky, by virtue of a certificate, &c., lying on the east side of the buffalo road leading from the Blue Lick to Limestone, nine miles from the lick on the upper road."

"May 22d, 1780.

"Ambrose Walden enters 1,333 acres upon a treasury warrant on the east side of Jacob Johnson's settlement and pre-emption on the waters of Johnson's Fork a branch of Licking, to include two cabins on the north side of said Fork, built by Simon Butler, and to run eastwardly for quantity."

"May 22d, 1780.

"John Walden enters 1,666 2-3 acres upon a treasury warrant, joining the above entry on the south and south-east, to include three cabins built by Simon Kenton, running east and south-east for quantity."

"May 22d, 1780.

"John Taylor enters 3,000 acres upon a treasury warrant joining John Walden on the north side of Johnson's Fork of Licking, on the east and south-east side running up and down the said creek and north for quantity, to include an improvement made by Jacob Drennon and Simon Butler."

The court below then proceeded to pass the following interlocutory decree:

"It is decreed and ordered that Duvall 199] Payne, of *Mason county, do go on the land in controversy and survey the claim of the complainants, agreeable to their entries. Then survey the settlement entry of Peter Johnson, heir of Jacob, to begin at a point nine miles below the lower Blue Licks on the buffalo road as it meanders leading to the mouth of Limestone; thence east so far that a line north two hundred and fifty-three poles will give 400 acres on the east side of the road. That he then run out the pre-emption of Johnson in a square to the cardinal points, to lay around the settlement, and give an equal proportion of land on the south and east which is to direct the lines on the north and west.

"That he survey Ambrose Walden's entry on the east of Johnson's pre-emption, then John Walden's in equal proportions on the south and east of Ambrose, and the defendant's on the south and east of John Walden, in equal proportion.

"That he then ascertain the interference between the claims of the complainants and defendant, which lie without the limits of the defendant's entry as it is now directed to be surveyed; and within the lines of the complainant's entry, mark the lines and make corners to this interference when ascertained, and make report to the next court."

After this interlocutory decree, and before the surveyor made his report, the following facts were agreed and admitted by the parties:

1. "That there is at the Blue Licks a salt spring on the south side of Licking, which is south 36 deg. west 82 poles, from another salt spring on the north side of Licking."

2. That there are at the Blue Licks about 500 acres of land trodden and licked away by the resort of buffaloes and other wild beasts.

3. That the connected plat in this cause, and the survey executed in pursuance of the inter- 200] locutory *decree, are made out by superficial, that is surface mensuration, and the distance from the Blue Licks to the respective beginnings of the parties' entries, ascertained in the same way.

Afterwards the surveyor made his report, with a plat stating that he had made the survey according to the decree, and found "that part of the defendant's survey which is included within his survey when laid down agreeable to the decree, and is also within the complainants' survey, to be 1,076 acres," "and that part of the defendant's survey which is included in the complainants' entry when laid down agreeable to decree, and will not be in the defendant's survey when made agreeable to the decree, is in two tracts, one containing 2,034 acres and 24 poles," "the other containing 182 1-2 acres."

Whereupon the court decreed and ordered that the defendant should, before the 1st of December then next, convey to the complainants by deed, with warranty against himself and those claiming under him, the two tracts not within his survey as laid down by the order of the court, and which were within the complainants' survey, amounting to 2,216 1-2 acres; and should pay the costs of suit.

Each party brought his writ of error.

The cause was argued at February term, 1806, by the defendant Taylor, and P. B. Key, for the original defendant, and by the complainant Hughes, for the original complainants; and again at February term, 1807, by H. Clay and P. B. Key, for the original defendant, and by Hughes and H. Marshall, for the original complainants; and again at this term by Pope, for the original complainants, and P. B. Key, for the defendant.

Argument for Taylor, the original defendant.

The bill discloses no facts which give an equitable jurisdiction to the court. It simply charges that *the defendant (Taylor) [201 has surveyed contrary to his entry. It charges no fraud, it alleges nothing to show that a caveat would not have given a full, plain, and adequate remedy; and it shows no sufficient reason why the remedy by caveat was not pursued.

Virginia borrowed the term patent, or grant, from the English law, where it means a mode of conveyance by the sovereign power. The land law of Virginia considers it as the consummation of title, and directs the register to indorse thereon "that the grantor hath title."

By the compact between Virginia and the inhabitants of Kentucky, in 1789, when Kentucky was erected into an independent State, it is declared (in § 7), "that all private rights and interests of lands derived from the laws of Virginia, prior to such separation, shall remain valid, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in this State." If, therefore, the court had equitable jurisdiction in this case, it must have been bestowed by the English or Virginian precedents, and not by the practice in Kentucky since that compact. Kentucky could not, by law, affect those rights and interests, and, a fortiori, they could not be affected by the practice of her courts.

English precedents are therefore admitted to apply; and it is also admitted "that where a caveat was entered, or directed to be entered, and a hearing prevented by fraud or accident," the chancery in Virginia exercises jurisdiction; but it is denied that either in England or Virginia it has ever taken jurisdiction over the simple legality of the title; that it has ever constituted itself into a court of errors to examine whether surveys correspond with entries; or attempted to perpetuate questions in chancery intended by law to be laid at rest by the rapid remedy of a caveat. The cases of White and Jones (1 Wash., 116), and Burnsides and Reid (2 Wash., 48), *will confirm this [202 doctrine, that fraud destroys, but the absence of it saves, a patent.

In the allegata, a survey "contrary to location" is made the only basis of jurisdiction. In the probata, the only auxiliary ground which appears, is a certificate of a practice by a register of Virginia, given by a register in Kentucky, "that a registry is kept of the returns of surveys, but that patents do not issue according to their priority."

Neither such a registry nor such an order in issuing patents are required by law. An act of the register, not required by law, cannot affect the title, and cannot be a ground of jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction rests, therefore, on the single allegation "that the defendant's survey was made contrary to his location."

The question then is, who has the legal title?

As subordinate to this question, it is contended,

1. That the defendant's entry is legal.

This is admitted both by the bill and the answer; 1. By charging the survey to have been made contrary to location; and, 2. By ordering a survey to be made agreeable thereto in the court's opinion. But the legality of the defendant's entry is proved, for the purpose of contrasting it with the illegality of that of the complainants.

The specialty of entries or locations, required by the land law, consisted of geographical objects, and not of geometrical protraction. The geography ought to be natural, and not artificial; because it was to convey information to those about to locate, upon reading the previous locations at the surveyor's office. It was a previous knowledge of the face of the country to which these locations were to convey a notice.

203*] No previous knowledge of chopping *a tree at the time of location could exist. Therefore, a nail driven into a tree, or letters marked on it, could be no notice to locators' reading an account of it at the office, however well informed of the geography of the country. The law did not intend to force them to delay locations, at the risk of losing the land, to go in search of such artificial geography.

A settlement is the only species of artificial geography recognized by the law. This being a previous mark in the face of the country, was a notice addressed to a previous knowledge of it. Still, rights founded upon this artificial geography were to be established by the law, within a very short period, to obstruct the inconveniences which might result from making even this very visible, artificial geography the basis of notice.

Johnson's settlement was recognized and established within the limited period. This settlement, although it was artificial geography, yet it was a more notorious and visible object than the two letters cut on a tree. It was a geographical object recognized by law; but the letters were not. Johnson's entry calls for several geographical objects, "the upper road," "leading to Limestone," "on its east side."

The entries of the Waldens, and of the defendant, by linking themselves to Johnson's, obtained all its specification. If Johnson's was good, the others needed no further precision.

Yet Ambrose Walden's specifies "Johnson's Fork," and "two cabins." J. Walden's calls for three cabins.

That of the defendant specifies "Johnson's Fork," and "a cabin," the site of which is agreed to have been at the place marked on the plat; but which is not on his land as surveyed by the order of the court.

204*] *If these entries were good at the time they were made, they never can be adjudged bad afterwards. Time, by defacing the natural geography, and destroying the witnesses to prove it, cannot destroy an entry originally good. We cannot now be obliged to test, by artificial geography, the validity of a survey made according to the natural geography as it existed at the time it was made.

The presumption, arising from a patent, certainly is, that the survey was made according to the entry; and that presumption ought not to be contradicted by less evidence than was in existence at the time the survey was made. At the time Johnson's survey was made, his settlement was in existence. Its actual site cannot now be proved; it is no longer visible. Is not the patent, then, conclusive evidence that his survey was according to his entry?

The caveat process is a positive provision against the effects of time. If a caveat could be instituted many years after a patent, after many years' possession, after 1,200 acres had been cleared, 20 years after the entry, 15 after the survey, a new moulded geographical face, and a generation of witnesses dead, it would subject the goodness of entries, intended to be permanent, to unceasing fluctuation. It would be to make titles bad in proportion to the length of possession under those titles.

What is this suit but an attempt to evade the limitation which the law has wisely prescribed for the process of caveat? Of what use is a limitation of caveats at law, if caveats in chancery are to be unlimited? Had a caveat been prosecuted in proper time, the actual site of Johnson's plantation and corn field would have been ascertained; and would have controlled the distance of nine miles. But now they make the nine miles control the actual settlement, and attempt, by course and distance, and geometrical potraction, to destroy a survey made originally by geographical objects. If the distance would not then have controlled the actual site, it cannot now. What was law then, must be the law now.

*The onus probandi lies on the com- [205 plainants. They have alleged that the defendant's survey was contrary to his location. In order to support this allegation they must first prove where his entry was, and in order to do that, they must show where was Johnson's actual settlement. They must do it absolutely and not hypothetically. The law does not allow that to be a settlement which is to be found only by course and distance.

A presumption of weight enforces the reasonableness of requiring of those who would avail themselves of a geographical object, proof of its site, when they used that site to show in themselves a title to property long held by others. It is, that a survey, made when the site of the object was visible, is more likely to correspond with it, than one made after it is lost. The less probability ought not to overthrow the greater. The first presumption is supported by strong circumstances in addition to the visibility of Johnson's settlement. Why did the defendant take worse land, as it is agreed he did, if he ought to have taken better? Because he was controlled and limited to it by Johnson's real settlement. This construction of his entry, contemporaneous with the existence of the real settlement, contrary to his own interest, strongly enforces the reasonableness of adhering to the law by requiring from those who assail an old title, and long possession, proof more than presumptive.

The presumption arising from the exact admeasurement to fix a site for Johnson, is extremely weak. In claiming his pre-emption, did Johnson measure? or did he compute? The country was then unpopulated, and infested by Indians. If he measured, from whence did he begin? The lick consisted of several salt springs, and 500 acres of land were licked and trodden away. Did he pursue the meanders of the road, or proceed in a straight line? By following a conjecture, subject to all those casualties, to fix the site of Johnson, the place may be mistaken. By this mistake the 206] title obtained when that site was *not matter of conjecture, may be defeated, although the survey may have been made according to the entry.

An old title ought not in this manner to be destroyed by a new speculation, nor the rules of evidence relaxed to defeat a long possession.

Old titles and possession are never overturned, but saved by presumptions. In this case the title is supported by other presumptions arising from the facts stated in the record. The entries called for cabins and other geographical objects, disclosing an intimate knowledge of the country. Kenton, the locator, possessed this knowledge, and directed the surveys whilst the corn field and domicile of Johnson must have been visible. Which is most probable, that Keutou knew where Johnson's actual settlement was, and that he surveyed accordingly? or that Johnson's settlement was the place found by the geometrical conjecture, and that Kenton surveyed contrary to the known location?

But we contend that the defendant's survey does not want the aid of presumption.

The subject of entries and surveys are so connected, that they must be blended in the argument:

It must be understood what a location is, before it can be known whether a survey conforms to it.

By the third section of the land law "the party shall direct the location so specially and precisely as that others may be enabled with certainty to locate other warrants on the adjacent residuum." The land law of Virginia consists of two acts of assembly. Each uses the term location; the first explains what is meant by the term in the second. An actual settler was entitled to 400 acres to be surveyed "including the settlement." A settlement is described by the law to consist in "raising a crop of corn," &c. A settlement then was a visible, geograph-207] ical object, which fixed *the location of the 400 acres. The actual settler had also a right of pre-emption to 1,000 acres to be surveyed "adjoining the land allowed for settlement." In the mode of surveying Johnson's right, according to the decree of the court below, there is no proof that the actual settlement is included.

Some latitude is left to the party in surveying his settlement right, under the law.

By appointing judges to decide upon these settlements and pre-emption locations; to keep a record of the "quantities and locations" which they allowed; to give a certificate describing "the particular location;" and to furnish the register and surveyor "with a schedule of such certificates," it is demonstrated that the legislature considered their judgments to be locations; and that these locations were unalterable. They were the acts of judges, not of parties. Johnson's location is a judicial act, and a judicial exposition of the law. Johnson could not alter it. The certificate is directed to be delivered to a surveyor, and upon his receiving it, not a new location, but an entry is allowed "in such way, and upon such terms, as are therein prescribed."

If the court below has such a latitude as to exclude Johnson's settlement from his survey, had not he some latitude to survey so as to include it? The factitious settlement assumed by the court was included in Johnson's first and second surveys, but not in the third made by order of the court.

To affect this a process occurs, under the decree, of a novel kind.

It is assumed that a nine-mile point, measured straight, or crooked, is Johnson's settlement. The certificate is construed to mean that not an acre of Johnson's 1,400 shall approach nearer the licks than nine miles, and his plantation or settlement is placed, in the face of the law, and of probability, on an edge of a large tract. By what authority *could the court do [208 this? The only condition of the law is, that the settlement right (i. e. the 400 acres) should include the settlement or improvement; and that the pre-emption right (i. e. the 1,000 acres) should adjoin the settlement right. With this restriction only, and that respecting the shape of surveys (viz., that their breadth should be at least one-third of their length), Johnson had a latitude to survey it as he pleased. How can the court, at this distance of time, deprive him of that right long after he had exercised it.

But after having once exercised it he could not alter it. Can the court now do that for him which he could not have done for himself? and thereby overturn titles dependent upon his location?

In fact, this restriction is only extracted from an incorrect construction of Johnson's certificate.

This certificate consists of two parts; the claim and the judgment.

The court of commissioners received the claims verbally, and the clerk stated them in his own language. Johnson's claim was a settlement right, and to obtain it, he had only to prove where his settlement lay, that the commissioners might describe it, and notify the register and surveyor. The settlement being ascertained, the law locates the land by the references "include" and "adjoin." All beyond, ascertaining the situation of the settlement, was surplusage and idle.

This was a settlement right, and not a village right. This is evident from the certificate itself.

1. Because it mentions the date of the settlement, 1776, and adds the words, "before the 1st of January, 1778."

2. It uses the words of the law, applicable to a settlement right, viz., "to include the settlement;" *whereas the terms of the law [209 relative to village rights are, "adjacent or convenient to the village."

3. No village is mentioned.

4. It mentions raising a crop of corn, which was the proper foundation of a settlement right.

But the decree of the court below turns on the word "lying" in the certificate; whether it means a settlement "lying" or a settlement right "lying" on the east side of the road. Whether Johnson, in using that expression, meant to apply it to the settlement which was the foundation of his claim, or to the thing claimed in consequence of that settlement.

It refers, says the decree, not to the settlement, but to the 400 acre settlement right, and to the 1,000 acre pre-emption.

If the whole 1,400 acres could be made the object of reference to the word "lying," then by declaring that no part of them should approach nearer to some arbitrary point of the 500 acre lick than nine measured miles, Johnson is thrown entirely to the east of the supposed settlement, and the chief part of his the Waldens', and the defendant's patents transposed to the complainants' 16,000 acre entry.

But if the word "lying" refers to "the settlement," then it is obvious that Johnson's survey No. 2 includes the assumed point of settlement with far greater coincidence with the Kentucky precedents; and the survey No. 1, with more still than the survey No. 3, which shoots out an irregular proboscis from the settlement right, to get at the settlement point.

By these precedents, the settlement is placed in the centre of the settlement right, and the settlement right in the center of the pre-emption [*210] right, *surveying from the settlement itself to the cardinal points for quantity.

The law, by saying that the pre-emption right shall adjoin, not the settlement itself, but the settlement right, countenances the idea that it could not adjoin the actual settlement, because that had been included in the settlement right. But the survey No. 3 makes the pre-emption adjoin the settlement itself.

The decree goes upon the idea that the certificate locates the 400 acre settlement right, and the 1,000 acre pre-emption right on a certain point, on the east side of a road, nine miles from the licks.

But a settlement right is not even mentioned or alluded to in the whole certificate, whose only object was to establish the fact that a settlement actually had been made at a certain place, and the number of acres which the settler claimed, or which the commissioners allowed in consequence of such settlement. The right was a legal consequence of establishing the settlement, and could not be located but by locating the site of the settlement. When that site was established, the law located the right.

Some stress is laid upon the words "to include the above location." If the "above location" was a location of the whole right, how could the right include the location? This would be to say that a thing may include itself. The thing enclosed must be less than the thing enclosing. Hence it results that the "above location" was not a location of the settlement right but of the settlement only.

By allowing the 400 acre tract to include the located settlement on a geographical point located or situated nine miles from the licks, on the east side of the road, and the 1,000 acre tract adjoining the 400 acre tract, and including it, the law is followed correctly, and exactly fulfilled.

*To comply with the idea of the de- [*211
cree, great bodies of land must be compressed into a particle at the end of the nine-mile line, and then be expanded for surface. If the decree had suffered it to expand equally in every direction from that point, the defendant's title would have been safe. What reason was there to limit this expansion to one particular direction? If the given distance must be violated to gain the required surface, why not expand toward the licks, as well as from them?

But Johnson's second survey has been perfected by acquiescence. There was no complaint, no caveat. Suppose the defendant had surveyed upon the ideal basis of Johnson assumed by the court below, and that universal acquiescence had perfected his title in another place; could he have held his land by a connection with no title of Johnson, whilst a perfect title existed at another place, with which, in his entry, he had connected himself?

If Johnson's and the Waldens' titles are good, the defendant's is good also. Those titles can never be affected by a suit in which they are not parties.

Johnson's entry is 25 years of age, his survey 16, his patent 12; neither has been questioned to this day, by caveat or suit.

But the continuity of the chain from Johnson to the defendant is said to be broken by the want of an "east side" on the buffalo-road, by the want of an "east side" to Johnson's first and second survey, and by want of an "east and south-east sides," by John Walden. There being no such "east sides," Johnson could not lie on the "east side" of the road. A. Walden could not lie on the "east side" of Johnson, nor the defendant on the east and south-east sides of John Walden. Accordingly the decree has provided in the survey No. 3, an "east side" for Johnson, by a north and south line for A. Walden to adjoin, and similar sides for J. Walden and the defendant, violating the positive provision of *law as to the [*212 length and breadth of surveys. But, in the language of these locations, "on the east side" means no more than that the lands are to lie eastward, or on the easterly side or part of. They do not necessarily suppose that the surveys must absolutely have an exact north and south line. It means aspect, one part of a body opposed to another part of the same body. In this sense every tract of land must have an east side.

As locators had a very considerable latitude in making their surveys; and as entries might join each other before any of them were actually surveyed, if the principles of the decree are just, and nothing but a north and south line will make an east side, it would put it in the power of the first locator to prevent the second locator from joining him at all, and of course to destroy the validity of his neighbor's entry. This could not be the intention of the law. Kenton used the term, "side" with a knowledge of this latitude. He therefore did not intend to use it in a sense which would destroy his locations. He used it merely to show the geographical relation of one entry to another.

Again; these entries call, not for surveys, but for each other. In John Walden's the words "joiuing the above entry" are expressly used. How can the east side of an entry be converted into a north and south line of a subsequent survey? The calls are to couple entries to entries; subsequent entries to previous entries, not previous entries to subsequent surveys.

It is by blending geometry and geography, in considering entries, that inaccurate constructions prevail; whereas the latter only is neeessary.

But the complainants' entry is bad in not giving any geographieal notiee. The letters I T eut in the bark of a tree do not constitute a geographieal objeet. A loeatiou was required not to enable a mau to fiud his own land, but 213] to enable others to avoid *it. Admit that the complainants can find their beginning, the letters I T, it does not affeet the question whether this artificial geography can be a good loeation. We may find what we hide, but what we ean hide is not a geographical feature in the faee of the couutry. An object taken as the basis of an eutry ought to be such as a person aequainted with the eountry might have known before the entry was made.

The defendant's entry had not been surveyed when the complainants' entry was made. It had not then mistaken its area, as the decree now contends. It was a good entry, as the decree admits. Being good, the title to the land it covered was vested in the defendant, not liable to be re-eutered, and not capable of being devested by a younger entry. The youuger eutry thefefore was void as to this vested title. Being void, it could only be made good by a survey aud patent. The elder entry, if originally void also, is made good by the same ueans.

If the defendant has no title, so far as his entry was void, the complainants can have uo title so far as theirs was void; or if subsequeut events could perfect theirs, the same events could perfect his.

If the complainauts have the eldest survey for the lands said by the decree to have been within the defeudant's entry, he has the eldest for those said to be withiu theirs.

The parallel in the cases is eomplete, but the decree has not seen it. It has giveu the complainauts the land they claim of the defendant, and also that which the defendant has a right to claim upon the same prineiples.

Is an entry, a survey, or a patent, the basis of a title? The incipient and the final step, the entry and the patent, are for the defendant.

The complainants have the eldest survey as to the 10,000 acre entry. But neither the sur-214] vey nor its registry eau *give priority of title. The incipient and the final act being iu favor of the defendant, equity will not deprive a fair purchaser of the advantage, in order to do him wrong.

The law directs an indorsation on the patent "that the patentee has title." The decree declares "that his title shall depend on parol testimony for 10, 15, or 20 years.

How far courts of equity are bouud by the positive law, is still a question. Whether, with the eourts of Virginia, they will stop at the case of fraud or aceident having prevented the institution of a caveat, followed speedily by an application to equity for relief, or whether they will examine, during 20, 30, or 100 years, every circumstance eapable of being examined by caveats, is to be the precedent.

The law and equity of the case are so intimately blended that in discussing the one mueh of the other has beeu anticipated.

Two grounds of equity are set up by the complainants.

1. An irregularity in the defendant's survey. They make no objection to his entry, aud by charging the survey with non-eonformity, they admit that the eutry may be conformed to: they prctend also to show in what manner.

2. That one of their surveys was first made, returned and registered.

The defendaut on his side claims equity too:

1. From length of time. Though courts of equity are not bound by acts of limitation, in some cases, they are in others. There must be some ingredient to take a ease out of an act of limitation, *after it has fallen within [215 it. The caveat process is an act of limitation.

Even in cases most deemed by equity to fall under the strict letter of laws of limitation. eourts of equity, in eomputing a reasouable length of time, will respect such laws as legislative computations founded in reason.

Written testimouy is supposed, by the laws of Virginia, to be a reasonable objeet of confidenee, until twenty years have expired. Precedents in ehaneery have diminished this term to eighteen. Oral testimony maintaius its credibility in some cases for five years, in others for a shorter term, and in contests capable of beiug tried by caveat, for six months ouly. This computation is made upon the particular eircumstances inimieal to such testimony in every case. These circumstanees induced the legislature, in cases of caveat, to refuse credibility to oral testimony for more than six months. But the complainauts demand it for twenty years.

2. The defendant elaims equity from the surveyor's negligence, in not having surveyed with the regularity required by law.

The law is imperative that he should give uotices.

Exeept for this breach of duty in the officer, the defendant would have surveyed and pateuted before the complainants entered. And a survey and patent eould not have been destroyed by a subsequent entry.

Equity eonsiders that as done which ought to have been done. The negleet of the surveyor was a real injury to the defendant, out of which grew not a real iujury, but the semblance of au injury to the complainants. It the first negleet had not happened, the case of the complainants would have been just as it now is. If by that negleet they had obtained an unjust advantage over the defendant, even *a caveat, or at least a suit in ehancery, [216 would have relieved him. Can they be injured by not obtaining from this neglect, that which both law and justice would have taken from them? The defendant has in fact the eldest equity as well as the eldest patent.

3. The third ground of the defendant's cquity is, that the complainants have gotten better land belonging, as they say, to the defendant, and, therefore, have suffered no injury; that they are bound by their acquiescence; and that it would be unjust to make an exchange now, as it would deprive the defendant of his old patent, and, possibly, involve him in more litigation.

The following cases were cited in behalf of the original defendant, viz.:

On the question upon the construction of the entries:

Hughes's Rep., 110, 124, Kenny v. Whitledge; Hughes's Rep., 14, 15, Pawling v. Mereweather; MS. Johnson v. Naul; MS. Jones v. Craig; Hughes's Rep., Jackson & Owens v. Whitaker and Wife, and Ward v. Kenton & Fox; MS. Speed v. Lewis; MS. Drake v. Rumney; Hughes's Rep., Ramsay & Logie v. Drake; Bryant v. Owens & Wallace; Sneed's Rep., 9, Wilson v. Speed; Id. 396, Frazier v. Steele.

And upon the question of jurisdiction: (Hughes's Rep., 2, 181; 1 Wash., 116; 2 Wash., 48.)

Argument for the original complainants.

All the good lands in Kentucky are subject to at least two contending entries. In this case Taylor had the first entry, but Bodley had the first survey.

As to the question of jurisdiction, it has been long settled as a good ground of equity 217] that the defendant *had obtained a legal title to which the plaintiff had a prior or better equity; and a court of law could not sustain an equitable against a legal title.

If the plaintiff shows an equitable title, the defendant must not only show his legal title, but he must support it by an equity equal at least to that of the plaintiff; for in equity the legal estate stands for nothing. (Sneed's Rep., 43, 46, 47; Quarles v. Brown; Consella v. Briscow; Swearingen v. Briscow; 1 Wash., 230; Hughes's Rep., 53, Fry v. Ezra; Id., 88, 92, Smith v. Evans; Id. 110, Greenup v. Coburn; Sneed's Rep., 32, South v. Bowles; Id., 52, Bradford v. Allen; Id., 130, Bruce v. ———.)

Taylor might have had a remedy by caveat if he would. But the remedy by caveat is only a concurrent remedy. It is not a remedy which can apply to all cases. A man may not know of a survey in time to enter his caveat.

The neglect of the process by caveat is no bar to relief in equity. (Harwood v. Gibbons, MS.; Myers v. Speed, Hughes's Rep., 97; Kenton v. M'Connell, Hughes's Rep., 140; Picket v. Bib, MS.)

If the court has jurisdiction, the next question is, whether the complainants' entry is legal and sufficiently certain.

Two questions arise respecting every entry: 1. Is it sufficiently specific? 2. Is the same land surveyed which is described in the entry?

It is sufficiently specific if the land can be found by a reasonable search. At the time of the complainants' entry, nothing was more notorious in Kentucky than a lick and a buffalo road. There is a difference where a distance is mentioned only to lead you to a part of the country where you will find a specific object 218] which is described as the beginning *of a tract; and where the beginning is at the end of a particular line.

There must always be a general description, and a particular description.

It was not necessary that the marked trees should be notorious. You would be led to them by a reference to notorious objects, the Blue Licks, and the buffalo road. (Greenup v. Coburn, Hughes's Rep., 104; Carter v. ———, Hughes's Rep., 182; Johnson v. Brown, Hughes's Rep., 60; Sneed's Rep., 105.)

If the complainants' entry be sufficiently certain, the next question is as to that of the defendant.

The defendant's entry depends upon John Walden's, which depends upon Ambrose Walden's, which depends upon Peter Johnson's. If Peter Johnson's be uncertain, the rest are uncertain.

Peter Johnson's 400 acres, being his settlement right, were to lie on the east side of the upper buffalo road, and nine miles from the licks.

The beginning of the tract was to be nine miles from the lick, not the middle of the tract. The question then is, how is the survey to be made? Are you to follow the meanders of the road to ascertain the nine miles, or to take a point nine miles distant from the lick on a straight line? Are you to follow the road in running the lines of the survey? It would be impossible to be accurate as to the meanders of the road. The buffaloes make generally a number of paths not parallel to each other, sometimes approaching and again diverging, sometimes occupying a broad space which is all called the road; and they often meander so much, that after traveling nine miles you may not be a mile distant from the place of beginning. A distance upon a water-course is always measured in a straight line, without regard to the meanders of the *stream. [219 So we say it ought to be understood when speaking of a buffalo road.

The whole of Peter Johnson's 1,400 acres were to lie on the east side of the road; but the claimant below has placed part of it on the west side.

The proper mode of surveying Peter Johnson's claim is to begin at the end of nine miles upon a straight line, and so make the whole survey on the east side of the road in the form of a square, making the general course of the road the base line of the survey.

But Ambrose Walden's land could not be bounded by a mere right of pre-emption, which was undefined, unlocated, and might never be carried into effect. It was a mere possibility. There must be an entry of a pre-emption before it can be considered as located, and until it be located it cannot be surveyed. (Porter v. Gass, Sneed's Rep.) The case of Kenny v. Whitledge applies only to village rights. (Patrick v. Woods, Hughes's Rep.; Sneed's Rep., 330, 336, 270.)

If it could not adjoin the pre-emption right, neither could it adjoin the settlement right, because the call was to join the 1,400 acre tract claimed by Peter Johnson, and not his 400 acre tract.

The defendant has lost his right to the land contained in his entry, by making his survey contrary to his location. When the survey is made, although erroneously, it is an execution of the warrant, and puts an end to the entry as such. The warrant, as well as the entry, is functus officio.

In these cases a court of chancery does not act upon equitable principles only, but is merely to decide which party has the legal right to the patent. It is only a chancery form of deciding a legal right. The court cannot require the complainants to give up to the defendant 220] the land which the defendant *might have surveyed under his entry, but which he failed to survey in proper time. It is not true in principle that the defendant is entitled to get his land somewhere; he did not purchase with that understanding. The state did not so contract.

When a man surveys contrary to his location he loses his equity. These are statutory rights, and therefore to be decided strictly according to the statute. An entry is a legal right; it descends to heirs; it is subject to execution; it may be sold and transferred. These points have all been decided by the courts of Kentucky.

P. B. Key, in reply.

There cannot be two valid entries of the same land at the same time.

When a first entry is forfeited the land is again waste and unappropriated; and not till then can a second entry of the same land be valid. A second entry made while the first was valid is void.

If Taylor's entry was valid, it gave a legal right, descendible, &c. The land was no longer waste and unappropriated or vacant. The entry of the complainants, while Taylor's entry was in force, was a nullity, and gave them no right either at law or in equity.

February 27th, 1807. MARSHALL, Ch. J. The court has been able to form an opinion as to a part only of this case.

That the court as a court of chancery has jurisdiction of such cases, is a point established by a long course of practice in Virginia and in Kentucky; but in the exercise of that jurisdiction, it will proceed according to the principles of equity. In such case, a prior entry will be 221] considered as notice to him *who has the legal title, if such entry be sufficiently certain. And the legal title will be considered as holden for him who has the prior equity.

March 14th, 1809. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an appeal from a decree of the court for the District of Kentucky, by which Taylor was directed to convey to Bodley and others a part of a tract of land to which he held an elder patent, but to which Bodley and others claim the better right under a junior patent. The judge of the District Court having directed such part of the land held by Taylor to be conveyed to Bodley and others, as appeared by certain rules, which he has applied to the case, to be within their claim, and not within Taylor's location, and having dismissed their bill as to the residue, each party has appealed from his decree.

Previous to any discussion of the rights of the parties, it has become necessary to dispose of a preliminary question.

The defendant in the court below objects to the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and contends not only that the present case furnishes no ground of jurisdiction, upon general principles, but that the land law under which both titles originate, in giving a remedy by which rights under entries might be decided previous to the emanation of a patent, has prohibited an examination of the same question after a patent shall have issued.

Had this been a case of the first impression, some contrariety of opinion would perhaps have existed on this point. But it has been sufficiently shown that the practice of resorting to a court of chancery in order to set up an equitable against the legal title, received, in its origin, the sanction of the Court of *Appeals, [222 while Kentucky remained a part of Virginia, and has been so confirmed by an uninterrupted series of decisions as to be incorporated into their system, and to be taken into view in the consideration of every title to lands in that country. Such a principle cannot now be shaken.

But it is an inquiry of vast importance whether, in deciding claims of this description, a court of equity acts upon its known, established and general principles, or is merely substituted for a court of law, with power to decide questions respecting rights under the statute, as they existed previous to the consummation of those rights by patent.

It has been argued that the right acquired by an entry is a legal right, because it is given by a statute, that it is the statutory inception of a legal title which gives to the person making it a right, against every person not having a prior entry, to obtain a patent and to hold the land. The inference drawn from this is, that as the law affords no remedy against a person who has defeated this right by improperly obtaining a prior patent, a court of chancery, which can afford it, ought to consider itself as sitting in the character of a court of law, and ought to decide those questions as a court of law would decide them, if capable of looking beyond the patent.

This reasoning would perhaps be conclusive if a court of chancery was, by statute, substituted in the place of a court of law, with an express grant of jurisdiction in the case. But the jurisdiction exercised by a court of chancery is not granted by statute; it is assumed by itself: and what can justify that assumption but the opinion that cases of this description come within the sphere of its general action? In all cases in which a court of equity takes jurisdiction, it will exercise that jurisdiction upon its own principles. It is believed that no exception to this rule is to be found in the books, and the state of land titles in Kentucky is not believed to furnish one. The true ground of the jurisdiction *of a court of equity is, that an [223 entry is considered as a record of which a subsequent locator may have notice, and therefore must be presumed to have it; consequently, although he may obtain the first patent, he is liable, in equity, to the rules which apply to a subsequent purchaser with notice of a prior equitable right. This certainly brings the validity of the entries before the court, but it also brings with that question every other which defeats the equity of the plaintiff.

The court, therefore, will entertain jurisdiction of the cause, but will exercise that jurisdiction in conformity with the settled principles of a court of chancery. It will afford a remedy which a court of law cannot afford, but since that remedy is not given by statute, it will be applied by this court as the principles of equity require its application.

Neither is the compact between Virginia and Kentucky considered as affecting this case.

If the same measure of justice be meted to the citizens of each state, if laws be neither made nor expounded for the purpose of depriving those who are protected by that compact, of their rights, no violation of that compact is perceived.

The court will proceed, then, to inquire into the rights of the parties, and, in making this inquiry, will pay great respect to all those principles which appear to be well established in the state in which the lands in controversy lie.

Taylor holding the eldest patent, it is necessary that the complainants below should found their title on a good entry. The validity of their entry, therefore, is the first subject of examination.

It was made on the 17th of October, 1783, and is in these words: "Henry Crutcher and John Tibbs enter 10,000 acres of land on a treasury warrant, beginning at a large black ash and small buckeye marked thus, I T on the 224 side of a buffalo *road leading from the lower Blue Licks a N. E. course, and about seven miles N. E. by E. from the said Blue Licks," &c.

The only objection to this entry is, that the beginning is uncertain.

Were the validity of this objection to be admitted, it would shake almost every title in Kentucky. If it be recollected that almost every acre of good land in that state was located at a time when only a few individuals, collected in scattered forts or villages, encroached on the rights of the savages and wild beasts of the country, that neither these sparse settlers, nor those hardy adventurers who traveled thither in quest of lands, could venture out to explore the country, without exposing their lives to imminent hazard, that many of those who had thus explored the country, and who made locations, were unlettered men, not only incapable of expounding the laws, but some of them incapable of reading, it is not wonderful that the courts of Kentucky should have relaxed, in some degree, the rigor of the rule requiring an impracticable precision in making entries, should have laid hold of every circumstance which might afford that certainty which the law has required, and should be content with that reasonable certainty which would enable a subsequent locator, by the exercise of a due degree of judgment and diligence, to locate his own lands on the adjacent residuum.

The entry of Crutcher and Tibbs possesses this reasonable certainty.

The Blue Licks was a place of general notoriety, and there appears to have been no difficulty in ascertaining the point from which the mensuration should commence. There being only one of the three roads leading from that point, which ran nearly a N. E. course, no subsequent locator could doubt on which road this land was placed. The entry having called for vis- 225 ible objects on the road about *seven miles from the licks, those visible objects might be discovered without any extraordinary exertion; and if they could not be discovered, then that call, according to the course of decisions in Kentucky, would be discarded, and about seven miles would be considered as seven miles. But those objects remained, and it appears that no difficulty has arisen, or ought to arise, on this point. The jury have found it to be the beginning called for in the entry.

The entry, therefore, of Crutcher and Tibbs is sufficiently certain, and the court will proceed to examine the entry and survey of Taylor.

This entry being the last link of a chain commencing with Jacob Johnson, it is necessary to fix Jacob Johnson, in order to ascertain the position of Taylor.

Jacob Johnson's title is a settlement and pre-emption; a certificate for which was granted by the commissioners, on the 7th day of January, 1780, in the following terms:

Peter Johnson, heir at law of Jacob Johnson, deceased, this day claimed a settlement and pre-emption to a tract of land in the District of Kentucky, lying on the east side of the buffalo road leading from the Blue Licks to Limestone, nine miles from the lick on the upper road, by the said decedent's raising a crop of corn in the year 1776. Satisfactory proof being made to the court, they are of opinion that the said Peter Johnson, &c., has a right to a settlement of 400 acres of land to include the above location, and the pre-emption of 1,000 acres adjoining, and that a certificate issue accordingly.

On the 21st of February, 1780, this certificate, so far as respected the settlement of 400 acres, was entered with the surveyor.

It is the opinion of the court that the 400 acres *of land should lie entirely on the east [226 side of the road, that it should begin at the distance of nine miles, and that those miles should be computed not by a straight line, but according to the meanders of the road.

In this respect the court perceives a clear distinction between a call for one place by its distance from another, if the intermediate space be entirely woods, or if a stream, which cannot well be followed, passes from the one to the other, and where a road is called for, which conducts individuals from point to point. The distance of places from each other is not generally computed by a stream not navigable, but is always computed by a road which is traveled. It is, therefore, the opinion of the court that where, as in this case, there is no other call in the entry showing a contrary intent, and the entry is placed on a road at a certain distance from a given point by which the road passes, the distance is to be computed by the meanders of the road, and not by a straight line.

The beginning of Johnson's settlement being found, and its western side being placed along the road, the next inquiry is, in what manner the land is to be surveyed.

In order to give certainty to locations of this description, the courts of Kentucky have uniformly determined that they shall be understood as being made in a square. Johnson's line upon the road, therefore, must extend along the road until two lines at right angles from each end of this base shall, with a third line parallel to the general course of the road, include, in a figure which, if the road be reduced to a straight line, would make a square, the quantity of 400 acres on the east side of the road.

The next link in this chain of entries, on which the title of Taylor depends, is Ambrose Walden's.

On the 22d of May, 1780, Ambrose Walden entered *1,333 acres on the east side of [227 Jacob Johnson's settlement and pre-emption, on the waters of Johnson's Fork, a branch of Licking, to include two cabins on the north side of said fork, built by Simon Butler, and to run eastwardly for quantity.

The cabins, it is said, cannot be found; or, if found, cannot be distinguished. The waters of Johnson's Fork would be too vague, and, therefore, the validity of this entry must depend on the call for Johnson's settlement and pre-emption.

This is said to be insufficient, because the pre-emption had not, at that time, been located with the surveyor, and the certificate of the commissioners was no location. Johnson's pre-emption, therefore, had, on the 22d of May, 1780, no locality, a subsequent entry could not depend upon it; for it might be placed in any situation, or in any form, provided it be so placed as to adjoin his settlement in any point.

The argument with respect to the pre-emption appears to the court to be conclusive. This pre-emption right certainly had no locality on the 22d of May, 1780, and an entry made to depend entirely on it would have been too vague, too uncertain, to be maintained. But it does not follow that the entry of Ambrose Walden is void. He does not call singly for the pre-emption, he calls for "the east side of Johnson's settlement and pre-emption right;" and it seems to the court that a fair application of the principles which have governed in Kentucky in similar cases, will maintain this location.

The settlement was actually located; the pre-emption, at the time, had no other than a potential existence; and the uniform course of decisions appears to have been to discard one call which is either impossible or uncertain, and to support the entry, if there be other calls which are sufficiently certain. The decisions have gone so far as to dismiss a part of the description of a single call, if other terms of de-228*] scription *be sufficient to ascertain the thing called for. Now the call for the settlement right is valid and certain; and the court is not of opinion that this certainty is rendered uncertain by being united to the call for a pre-emption, which had no real existence.

The call appears to be substantially the same as if it had been for the land of Johnson. His settlement and pre-emption was perhaps the name which, in common parlance, designated this land even before the location of the pre-emption, because it was appendant to the settlement. It has been decided that a call for the land would be good, and the court thinks that decision applicable to this case.

Against this has been urged the doubt which a subsequent locator would have entertained at the time, whether Johnson might not have been permitted to locate his pre-emption on any land adjoining his settlement, and whether Walden's entry calling for that pre-emption might be decided to be good, and to be placed so as to bind upon it. This doubt, it is said, though now removed, then existed, and would have operated on the mind of the subsequent locator.

The force of this argument will not be denied. But it must also be admitted that it applies with equal strength to the course of artificial reasoning which has governed the decisions of the courts of Kentucky, and on which the titles of the people of that country depend. Subsequent locators must have doubted in what manner any of these questions would be decided. But having been decided, the certainty which they have introduced is carried back to the time when the location was made, and affirms that location.

It has also been said that it is uncertain which side of Johnson's settlement is the east side, and that, in point of fact, the upper side, or that furthest *from the Blue Licks, [229 faces the east more nearly than any other.

However this fact may be, the court is of opinion that the terms of Johnson's entry designate his east side. His settlement is to lie on the east side of the road. The road, then, in contemplation of the locator, forms the west side, and the side opposite the road must be the east side. The entry must have been so understood by all subsequent locators, and when they call for his east side, the intention to place themselves on the side opposite the road is sufficiently intelligible.

In this, as in other difficulties which occur in the course of the inquiry, it is material to observe that the bill does not charge Taylor's entry to be void for uncertainty. On the contrary it impliedly admits the certainty of his location, and charges that his survey does not conform to it. The real question, then, is not whether Taylor shall be surveyed at all, but where he shall be placed.

The entry of Ambrose Walden, then, will lie on the east side of Johnson's settlement, that is, on the side opposite the road; and, this point being established, the manner in which his land is to be surveyed is free from further doubt. It is to be laid off in a square, the center of the base line of which is to be the centre of the south-eastern line of Johnson's settlement.

The next entry to be considered is that of John Walden. He enters 1,666 2-3 acres joining Ambrose Walden, on the south and south-east, and to run east and south-east for quantity.

Although Ambrose Walden has no south side, yet it is sufficiently apparent that his south-west side was intended by the locator. The difficulty arises from the subsequent call of the entry to run east and south-east for quantity. A line drawn east from Ambrose Walden's south-western corner would pass *through the middle of his land, and a [230 line drawn south-east from the same corner would pass either through or so near his land as to make it almost impossible to suppose that the locator could have intended to make so long and narrow a triangle. The reasonable partiality of Kentucky for rectangular figures must, therefore, decide the shape of John Walden's land, and regulate the manner in which this call of his entry is to be understood. Ambrose Walden's north-western line must be extended to the south, and a line must be drawn due east from his eastern corner, so that a line parallel to his south-eastern line intersecting a line drawn south-east from the extremity of the north-western line of Ambrose Walden continued shall lay off 1,666 2-3 acres of land in equal quantities on the southern and south-eastern sides of Ambrose.

It is not to be disguised that there is much difficulty in placing John Walden, but the court can perceive no mode of placing him more conformable to the principles which prevail in Kentucky than that which it has adopted.

We are now brought to Taylor's entry.

On the 22d of May, 1780, John Taylor enters 3,000 acres adjoining John Walden on the north side of Johnson's Fork of Licking, on the east and south-east side, running up and down said creek, and north for quantity, to include an improvement made by Jacob Drennon and Simon Butler.

There is to John Walden's land no east side, nor any side so nearly east as the south-east side. The word side, being in the singular number, and the same side answering, better than any other, both parts of the description, the land must lie on the south-east side.

It is also thought to be the more reasonable construction of the entry that the words, on the north side of Johnson's Fork, refer to the 231] situation of *John Walden's land, not to the location of Taylor's. But this is probably not important in the case. Taylor is to lie on the south-east of Walden, to include an improvement made by Drennon and Butler, to run up and down the creek, and north for quantity.

With these calls, it would have been the opinion of the court that Taylor could not cross the creek, had not his entry called for an object on the south side of the creek. That object is the improvement made by Jacob Drennon and Simon Butler.

It has been said that the country was covered with cabins, and that therefore this call was no designation of the land that was located. This argument is correct so far as it is urged to prove that this would not be sufficient, as a general description, to enable subsequent locators to say in what part of the country this entry was made. Neither would the letters I T marked on a tree answer this purpose. But, when brought into the neighborhood by other parts of the description, these letters serve to ascertain the beginning of the entry under which the claim adversary to that of Taylor is supported. So Taylor informs subsequent locators of the neighborhood in which his land lies, by calling for the south-east side of John Walden's entry, on the north of Johnson's Fork, which is found by a reference to other entries which commence at a point of public notoriety. When brought to the south-east side of John Walden, he is near the cabin called for, and it does not appear that there was, in the neighborhood, any other cabin which this entry could possibly be understood to include. This part of the description, then, will carry Taylor to the south side of Johnson's Fork, and, if permitted to cross that fork, the favorite figure of the square must be resorted to. Against this it is said that, in such a case, the rule of Kentucky will carry him no further than barely to include the object of his call. But this rule cannot apply to this case, because it would give a survey the breadth of which would not be one-third of its length. 232] *It is impossible to look at the general plat returned in this case without feeling a conviction that the surveyor considered that fork which, in the plat, is termed Mud Lick Fork, as Johnson's Fork; and there is no testimony in the cause which shows that, when this location was made, that middle stream which runs through Taylor's survey was denominated Johnson's Fork. The finding of the jury, however, that the roads and water-courses are rightly laid down, must induce the opinion that this fact was proved to them.

In a case where the mistake is so obvious, the rule which, under circumstances so doubtful, relative to place, deprives the person, in surveying whose property the mistake has been made, of his legal title, appears to be a severe rule to be adopted in a court of equity. But such is the situation of land titles in Kentucky, that the rule must be inflexible.

Taylor, then, must adjoin John Walden on his south-east side, where that line crosses Johnson's Fork, if it does cross it, and if it does not, then at its south-eastern extremity, which will be nearest Johnson's Fork. If a square formed upon the whole line shall contain less than three thousand acres, then two lines are to be extended due north until, with a line running east and west, the quantity of three thousand acres shall be contained in the whole figure. If such a square shall contain more than three thousand acres, then it is to be laid off on so much of Walden's line as to contain the exact quantity.

This being the manner in which it appears to the court that Taylor's entry ought to be surveyed, it remains to inquire whether, under the principles which govern a court of equity in affording its aid to an equitable against a legal title, the complainants below ought to recover any, and, if any, what part of the lands surveyed by Taylor, and, if any, what terms are to be imposed upon them.

*The entry as well as patent of Taylor [233 is prior to that under which the complainants in the District Court assert their title. Of the entries made within their location, therefore, they had that implied notice which gives a court of equity jurisdiction of this cause. They cannot object to the operation of a principle which enables them to come into court. But, in addition to this principle, they must be considered as having notice, in fact, of these locations. The position of the entries of both plaintiffs and defendant is ascertained by calling for certain distances along the same road from the same object. Crutcher and Tibbs, therefore, when they made their location, knew well that they included the Waldens and Taylor, and that their entry could give them no pretensions to the lands previously entered by those persons. If, by any inadvertence, the Waldens and Taylor have surveyed land to which Crutcher and Tibbs were entitled, and have left to Crutcher and Tibbs land to which the Waldens and Taylor were entitled, it would seem to the court to furnish no equity to Crutcher and Tibbs against the legal title which is held by their adversaries, unless they will submit to the condition of restoring the lands they have gained by the inadvertence of which they complain.

The court does not liken this inadvertent survey of lands, not within the location, to withdrawing of the warrant and re-entering it in another place. The latter is the act of the mind intentionally abandoning an entry once made: the former is no act of the mind, and so far from evidencing an intention to abandon, discovers an intention to adhere to the appropriation once made. Although their legal effect may be the same, yet they are not the same with a person who has gained by the inadvertence, and applies to a court of equity to increase that gain.

Was this, then, a case of the first impression, the court would strongly incline to the opinion 234] *that Bodley and Hughes ought not to receive a conveyance for the lands within Taylor's survey, and not within his entry, but on the condition of their consenting to convey to him the lands they hold which were within his entry and are not included in his survey. But this is not a case of the first impression. The court is compelled to believe that the principle is really settled in a manner different from that which this court would deem correct. It is impossible to say how many titles might be shaken by shaking the principle. The very extraordinary state of land title in that country has compelled its judges, in a series of decisions, to rear up an artificial pile from which no piece can be taken, by hands not intimately acquainted with the building, without endangering the structure, and producing a mischief to those holding under it, the extent of which may not be perceived. The rule as adopted must be pursued.

Taylor, then, must be surveyed according to the principles laid down in this decree, and must convey to the plaintiffs below the lands lying within his patent and theirs, which were not within his entry.

TAYLOR AND QUARLES v. BROWN.

The first survey, under a military land warrant in Virginia, gives the prior equity. The survey is the act of appropriation.

The certificate of survey is sufficient evidence that the warrant was in the hands of the surveyor.

That clause of the land law of Virginia, which requires every survey to be recorded within two months after it is made, is merely directory to the surveyor; and his neglect to record it does not invalidate the survey.

It is not necessary that the deputy surveyor who made the survey, should make out the plat and certify it. It may be done from his notes, by the principal surveyor.

A subsequent locator of land in Virginia, without notice of the prior location, cannot protect himself by obtaining the elder patent.

A survey is not void because it includes more land than was directed to be surveyed by the warrant.

The patent relates to the inception of title; and therefore, in a court of equity, the person who has first appropriated the land has the best title, unless his equity is impaired by the circumstances of the case.

The locator of a warrant undertakes himself to find waste and unappropriated land, and his patent issues upon his own information to the government, and at his own risk. He cannot be considered as a purchaser without notice.

The equity of the prior locator extends to the surplus land surveyed, as well as to the quantity mentioned in the warrant.

ERROR to the District Court for the Kentucky District, in a suit in chancery, wherein Taylor and Quarles were complainants against Brown. The bill of the complainants was dismissed by the court below.

Both parties claimed under military warrants upon the King's proclamation, for services rendered prior to the year 1763.

The complainants claimed under a warrant in favor of Angus M'Donald, for 2,000 acres issued *the 5th of February, 1774. The defend- [235 ant claimed under a warrant in favor of Jethro Sumner, for 2,000 acres, issued the 3d of December, 1773. M'Donald's survey was made on the 7th of July, 1774. Sumner's was made on the 24th of June, 1775, and he obtained a patent on the 5th of January, 1780. The patent upon M'Donald's survey was not issued until the 10th of January, 1792; so that the complainants had a younger warrant and patent, but the elder survey. The defendant had the elder warrant and patent, but the younger survey. M'Donald's survey included 3,025 acres; Sumner's included, 2,576 acres. The quantity covered by both surveys was 1,080 acres, of which Taylor claimed 660, and Quarles, 200; it did not appear who claimed the other 220 acres, included in the interference.

M'Donald's survey was made by Hancock Taylor, an assistant surveyor of Fincastle county, where the lands lay, who, before his return to the office, was killed by the Indians on the last of July, 1774, but his field books and papers were preserved by his attendants, and delivered to the principal surveyor of the county, in September, 1774, who made out a plat therefrom.

The complainants' bill charges, that the survey of Sumner was fraudulently made, so as to interfere with M'Donald's. The answer denies the fraud; and there was no evidence of fraud, or even of notice on the part of Sumner.

* P. B. Key and Rowan, for the complainants, (the plaintiffs in error,) contended, that the survey made by Hancock Taylor, and the plat and certificate of survey made out by the principal surveyor, were a good execution of the warrant, and were a complete appropriation of the land surveyed, so as to give to M'Donald a prior title in equity; and that the subsequent patent related back to the survey, so as to give to the complainants a better title in equity than the defendants.

Pope* and Swann, contra, contended, [*236

1. That it did not appear that M'Donald's warrant ever was in the hands of the surveyor.

2. That the survey was not recorded within two months after it was made.

3. That the survey was not certified by Hancock Taylor, the assistant surveyor who made the survey.

4. That the complainants had a remedy by caveat; and having neglected to avail themselves of that remedy, they could not have relief in equity.

5. That the survey, both in law and equity, was void as to all but 2,000 acres.

6. That the complainants have no equity.

1. Upon the first point it was said that the warrant is the only authority for the officer to survey the land; and if he never had the warrant, the whole proceeding is void. It must be proved, therefore, that the officer had the warrant.

2. The act of 1778 (c. 14, § 6), requires that every survey shall be recorded by the surveyor, in a book kept by him for that purpose, within two months after the same shall be made. This was a condition precedent to the validity of the survey.

3. The survey was not certified by Hancock Taylor, the assistant surveyor who made the survey.

It is an incontrovertible position, that when the law entrusts an officer to do an act in pais, he is the only person who can certify the act done. A deputy surveyor, or a deputy sheriff does not derive his authority from the principal surveyor, or the high sheriff, but from the law. The principal has only the appointment of the 237] deputy; but his *authority to act as, and for the principal, is derived from the law. There can be no evidence of a survey, but the certificate of the officer who made it. If a man went to make a settlement, but should be killed on the way, it is true, the act of God prevented, but still it was no settlement.

4. The complainants had a remedy by caveat, when they might have established their title at law. Having lost this remedy by their own negligence, it is contrary to the principles of equity to aid them.

5. The survey was void as to the surplus, beyond the 2,000 acres authorized by the warrant. As to this surplus M'Donald was a mere volunteer; he paid no consideration; it was a fraud upon the state; and a mere survey, without the authority of a warrant, can give no title in equity. (Hughes's Rep., 21, 26, Dougherty v. Crow; Sneed's Kentucky Cases, 9, Ward v. Kenton; Sugd., 200, 201, 202; 1 Fonb., 348.)

6. The complainants have no equity. The defendant was a purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice of any title or claim by M'Donald. No fraud or notice is brought home to Sumner. He purchased the land fairly; he has paid for it and obtained the legal title; and he must hold it until some other person shows a better title in equity.

There is no evidence of notice, even if the depositions can be read which are sent up with the record; of which there is strong doubt; for the jury, according to the practice in Kentucky, has found all the facts in dispute between the parties.

Even if one of the depositions should contradict the answer, yet a court of equity will never decree against the defendant's answer, upon a single deposition, unless it be strongly corroborated by circumstances.

238*] *Livingston, J. Are those the depositions upon which the jury acted in finding the facts? If they are, I, for myself, should consider the finding conclusive; and that we could not look into the depositions.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. When the first case of a suit in chancery of this kind came before this court from Kentucky, the court was struck with the irregularity of the intervention of a jury to ascertain the facts in any other mode than by an issue directed by the court as a court of chancery; and as this court is only authorized to proceed in chancery cases according to the principles and usages of courts of equity, the court was disposed to disregard facts thus found.

The court felt no difficulty in looking into the depositions, but their doubt was, whether they should take into consideration the facts found. However, as such a practice was said to have been established in Kentucky, the court agreed to look into the facts found where they were not inconsistent with the depositions in the cause. I think the first case of this kind which came up from Kentucky was that of Taylor and Bodley.

If M'Donald ever had equity, he has forfeited it by his negligence. No step was taken to complete the title from 1774 to 1792, a period of eighteen years. (2 Wash., 106, Pickett v. Dowdall; 2 Wash., 121, Curry v. Burns; 1 Wash., 116, White v. Jones.)

The doctrine of relation applies only to the parties themselves, viz., to M'Donald and the commonwealth of Virginia. It does not apply where the rights of third persons are concerned. (Co. Litt., 190; Plowd., 188; 2 Vent., 200; 2 Wash., 113, 120, 121.)

Rowan, in reply.

1. It was not necessary that the warrant should *have been in the hands of the surveyor. [239 It was sufficient authority to him to survey the land if he knew that such a warrant existed. But if it were necessary that he should have had it in his hands, the presumption arising from his having made the survey is strong that he had the warrant, and is sufficient proof of that fact until the contrary be proved. The bill avers that the warrant was delivered to the surveyor. The answer does not deny it, and there is no evidence that it was not. It is a matter only between the complainants and the surveyor, and no other person can take advantage of it. It was no injury to the defendant.

2. The recording the survey within two months was a duty imposed by law upon the surveyor, and he was liable to a penalty if he neglected to do so; but his neglect could not invalidate the survey. It does not appear upon the record that the survey was not recorded within the two months. The presumption is, that the officer did his duty till the contrary appears. The act of 1748 requires the surveyor to return a list of his surveys to the college of William and Mary, who were entitled to certain fees upon every survey: It cannot be contended that the surveys were void if the list was not returned. There are a number of other things required of the surveyor by that act, yet it was never supposed that his neglect to do them would vacate his surveys. The recording was not intended as notice to others, because the surveyor was expressly forbidden by law to give a copy for twelve months. The only notice which the legislature intended should be given to subsequent purchasers during that period was the marking and bounding the land.

The survey is the appropriation. Sumner had all the notice which the legislature intended he should have. The depositions show that the land was actually marked and bounded; and that the marks and bounds were a matter of public notoriety.

*The act of recording was a duty [240 which the officer was bound to perform. The complainants could not compel him to perform it, and therefore they ought not to suffer if he neglected it. The issuing of the patent is strong evidence either that the survey was recorded in time, or that the want of such record did not invalidate the title. The register of the land office was the person best acquainted with all the prerequisites to a grant. After a lapse of thirty years, all these prerequisites are to be presumed until the contrary appears.

3. It was not necessary that the plat and certificate should be made out by the same officer who made the survey. Everything that is done by a deputy surveyor is supposed in law to be done by the principal, and when the principal himself undertakes to act, there can be no question. The principal is the only officer known to the law whose certificate can be respected. If the deputy acts, it is in the name of his principal. The making out of a plat and certificate from the field book is a mere mechanical operation. It may as well be done by another as by the officer who actually ran the lines.

4. The complainants were not bound to file their caveat. The delay is no argument against their claim. It appears from the record that the patent was made to the heirs or devisees of M'Donald. His death, and their minority, account for the apparent delay.

5. As to the surplus. There never has been a survey vacated in Kentucky because it contained more land than the warrant required. If the lines had comprehended less, the party must have been the loser. If they comprehend more, it does not vacate the survey. The case of Beckley v. Bryan (Sneed, 107), is decisive as to that point.

6. As to the equity of the case. It is not necessary now to inquire how the courts in Kentucky first obtained a chancery jurisdiction 241] in cases of this *kind. By a long course of practice, the question of interfering surveys, or entries, has been a question in equity. It is a mode of getting behind the patent. An elder patent is only considered as a means of protecting the prior equity. (Sneed, 231, 233, 248, 267, 283, 331.)

The survey of M'Dould was a prior appropriation of the land. It was no longer waste, vacant, or unappropriated land. It was not a subject for Sumner's warrant to operate upon. Lapse of time cannot enfeeble a claim. It either destroys it altogether, or it has no effect.

If the court would restrict M'Donald to his 2,000 acres, where shall they be laid off? The impossibility of locating them, so as to designate the surplus, is a sufficient reason for not adopting the principle.

March 1. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the title of both parties originates in surveys made by the surveyor of Fincastle county, previous to the passage of the land law of Virginia. Both surveys were made on military warrants issued under the proclamation of 1763. The survey under which the plaintiffs claim, being prior in point of time, they have the first equitable title, and must prevail, unless the objections made to that survey be valid, or unless their equity is defeated by the circumstances of the case.

Several objections have been made to the survey, each of which will be considered.

1. It is said that the warrant was not in possession of the principal surveyor when the survey was made.

242*] *The answer given to this objection is conclusive. The warrant is an authority to, and an injunction on, the surveyor to lay off 2,000 acres of vacant land which had not been surveyed by order of council, and patented subsequent to the proclamation. Whether acts under this authority are valid or void, if the authority itself be not in possession of the officer, is perfectly unimportant in this case; because the court considers the certificate of the surveyor as sufficient evidence that the warrant was in his possession, if, in point of law, it was necessary that it should be lodged in the office. That certificate is in the usual form, and states the survey to have been made by virtue of the governor's warrant, and agreeably to his majesty's royal proclamation.

2. The second objection is, that the survey does not appear to have been recorded within two months after it was made.

The opinion, that this omission on the part of the surveyor avoids the title which accrued under the survey, is founded on the 6th section of an act passed in the year 1748, entitled, "An act directing the duty of surveyors of land." In prescribing this duty the law, among other things, enjoins the surveyor "to enter, or cause to be entered, in a book well bound, to be ordered and provided by the court of his county, a true, correct and fair copy and plat of every survey by him made during his continuance in office, within two months after making the same."

This section is merely directory to the surveyor. It does not make the validity of the survey dependent on its being recorded, nor does it give the proprietor any right to control the conduct of the surveyor in this respect. His title, where it can commence without an entry, begins with the survey; and it would be unreasonable to deprive him of that title by the subsequent neglect of an officer, not appointed by himself, in not performing an act which the law does not pronounce necessary to his title, *the performance of which he has not [243 the means of coercing.

If the omission to record the survey in two months would avoid it, then the omission of any other act enjoined by the same section would equally avoid it. The surveyor is directed to see the land "plainly bounded by natural bounds, or marked trees." Has his conforming to this direction ever been inquired into, in a contest respecting the validity of a survey? Would any gentleman of the bar contend that the land was not plainly bounded, and that, for this reason, a survey actually made was void? He is, within five months, to deliver to his employer a plat and certificate. Suppose six months should elapse before he complies with this duty, is the survey void? He is to certify the true quantity of land contained in the survey. Would the gentlemen from Kentucky be willing to adopt it as a principle that every survey expressing a quantity more or less than the true quantity is absolutely void? He is to state the water-courses, and also the plantations next adjoining. Should any one of these be omitted, is the survey void? He is to return a list of surveys in the month of June annually to the clerk's office. Should he fail in this, are the surveys void? On these points it is impossible seriously to insist; and the court can perceive no distinction between them. They are all merely directory to the officer, and none of them affect a title which commenced before they are to be performed. He is subjected to a penalty for failing in any one of these duties, but his performing or omitting them is unimportant to the rights of those for whom surveys have been made.

3. The third objection is of more weight. It is, that the survey must be certified by the person who made it, and can be authenticated in no other manner.

That, in point of fact, this survey was certified as made, is not doubted. But it is said 244] that the *plat and certificate want those appropriate forms which alone the law will receive as evidence of their verity.

The survey was made by Hancock Taylor, assistant surveyor of Fincastle county, from whose field notes the plat and certificate were made out by his principal, who also signed them. Hancock Taylor was prevented from performing this duty by a mortal wound received from the Indians. It is understood to be usual for the assistant, where surveys are actually made by him, to sign the plat and certificate, which are also signed by his principal.

The 46th section of the act, "for settling the titles and bounds of lands, and for preventing unlawful hunting and ranging," enacts, "that every survey of lands intended to be patented shall be made and returned by a sworn surveyor duly commissioned for that purpose."

Let us inquire whether, under this section, the plat and certificate must be made out by the person who made the survey, and whether a survey actually made by an assistant must be platted and certified by him.

It may be of some importance, in the construction of this section, to inquire whether the return alluded to is to the office of the principal surveyor, or to the land-office, out of which the patent is to issue.

In construing this section, the accompanying sections afford us no aid. But the general object of the act, and the allusion to patenting which is made in the section, would lead to the opinion that returns to the land office were in contemplation of the legislature. If we examine the laws generally, we shall find that most usually the word "surveyor" is applied to the principal, and where the law alludes to the assistant, he is designated by the term "assistant surveyor." If the return directed by this section is to be made to the land-office, 245] for the purpose *of obtaining a patent, then the principal surveyor is the person who is to certify it, and a survey actually run by himself, or by his assistant, is to be considered, in law, as a survey made by himself. It is believed to be most usual for the plat and certificate returned to the land-office to be signed by the principal and by his assistant; but this section seems not to require both. The signature of the assistant is the justification to the principal for recording and certifying the survey, and is the best testimony that it has been made; but the law does not require, in terms, that where that best testimony is unattainable, no other shall be received. So far as the section which has been recited goes, the signature of the principal surveyor sufficiently authenticated this plat, and that a patent has issued upon it, is proof that such was the opinion entertained in the land-office. A patent certainly does not issue, of course, unless the papers on which it issues be regular. A plat not legally authenticated is no plat, and the register cannot justify issuing a patent on it.

This consideration certainly deserves some weight: but if the court inspect this section, it seems, in fair construction, to require only the signature of the principal surveyor, who, consequently, judges, in the first instance, of the testimony which will enable him to certify a survey. If the signature of the assistant can be dispensed with, then other testimony than his signature may authorize the principal to certify a survey; and if, in any possible case, other testimony can be deemed competent, it surely may in this.

If the return directed by this section be understood to be a return to the office of the principal surveyor, it is necessary to inquire what it is that the section exacts. It is, that the "survey shall be made and returned by a sworn surveyor," not that the plat shall be made out and certified to the principal by the assistant who run the lines. The courses and distances contained in the field book of the assistant, represent to the principal as correctly *and as intelligibly the survey actually [246 made, as the plat and certificate could do. From these data he is as capable of placing on his record book a correct plat, and of returning that plat to the land-office, as if the lines of the survey had been placed on paper by the assistant himself. It would seem reasonable, therefore, even on this construction of the section, in the actual case where death has disabled the assistant from platting his works, to consider the law as satisfied by the delivery of those works to the principal surveyor.

The "act directing the duty of surveyors of land" does not appear to this court to contain any provisions which are opposed to the construction here made of the preceding act of the same session. The 6th section of that act, which has been particularly referred to by counsel, prescribes the duty of surveyors, but contains no direction respecting the signature of plats and certificates, except this: "Every surveyor making a survey of land shall see the same plainly bounded by natural bounds, or marked trees, and within five months after survey, shall deliver to his employer a plat and certificate thereof."

It has never been understood that this plat and certificate may not be delivered by the principal; and other parts of this section show that the duties enjoined, are some of them to be performed by the principal. The section proceeds to say, "and shall also enter, or cause to be entered, in a book well bound, to be provided by the court of his county, a true, correct and fair copy and plat of every survey by him made." Now this book is the book of the principal. It is, of course, his duty to superintend the entries in it. They are to be "of the surveys by him made." The survey made by the assistant, is, then, to be entered by the principal as a survey by him made. He is also to return annually a list of the surveys by him made, to the county clerk's office. This return is made by the principal. Certainly the list must include all the surveys made by *his [247 assistants. They also are considered as made by him. Upon a view of the whole section, the court perceives nothing in it which renders it improper for the principal to plat and certify a survey made by his assistant whose field notes are returned complete to him, and who has been disabled by death from making the plat himself

This constrnction is very much strengthened by the terms of the act of 1779. That act declares "that all surveys of wastc and unappropriated land made upou any of the western waters before the 1st day of January, 1778," "by any county.surveyor, commissioned by the masters of William and Mary college, acting in couformity to the laws and rules of government then in force, and founded either upon charter," &c., "or upon any warrant from the governor for the time being, for military service, in virtue of a proclamation either from the King of Great Britain, or any former goveruor of Virginia, shall be aud are hereby declared good aud valid; bnt that all surveys of waste and unpatented lands made by any other person, or upon any other pretense whatsoever, shall be and are hereby declared null and void."

Notwithstanding this declaration, we fiud that patents have actually issued, uuder which both parties in this cause claim, on surveys made uot by the county surveyor in person, but by his assistant. It is perfectly well known that a great proportion of the surveys recognized by this act have been really executed by assistant surveyors. Upon what principle of construction are they brought within the act? Clearly upon this. The law so far as respects the validity of the survey, considers the act of the depnty as the act of his principal. A snrvey made by an assistant is, in law language, made by the principal. And if this idea be taken up on so material a clause as that which confirms or invalidates every survey previously made, and which is expressed in terms much more explicit and decisive than any of the 248] clauses in the precediug acts, must *not the idea be carried throughont? Must not the survey, in all cases, be considered in a legal point of view as made by the principal through the agency of his depnty, and must not this priuciple be kept in view in coustruing the laws upon the subject?

This survey, then, is, in law lauguage, made by William Preston. It is confirmed as a survey made by him. The law recoguizes it as his snrvey. Assnredly, then, his certificate may authenticate it.

The act proceeds to say that "all and every person or persons, his, her, or their heirs, claiming lands upon any of the before recited rights, and under surveys made as herein before mentioned (that is, by a county surveyor), against which no caveat shall have been legally entered, shall, upou the plats and certificates of such surveys being returned into the land-office, together with the rights, &c., upon which they were respectively founded, be eutitled to a grant for the same."

To the court it seems clear that the law authorizes a plat and ccrtificate of survey from the person whom it contemplates as the maker of that survey; that is, from the county snrveyor. The formal requisites of the law are complied with by a plat and certificate under his siguature. He has given it, in this case, on testimouy, which the court deems as full and complete as even the plat certified by the assistant who made the survey would have been.

These are the objectious which have been made to the survey under which the plaintiffs claim. After bestowing on them the utmost attentiou, thc court is decidedly of opinion, that the survey of M'Donald was and ought to be considered as a good and valid survey.

4. The 4th objection to the plaintiffs' claim is founded on their negligcnce.

*At law, this objection is clearly of [249 uo validity. The proviso to that section of the act of 1779, which has been considered, declares that snch surveys shall be returned to the land-office within twelve mouths after the expiration of that session of assembly, or shonld become void. The time for returning them, however, was prolonged until this patent issued. Consequently, a caveat to prevent the emanation of the patent, because the snrvey was not returned in time, could not have been maintained. If the survey of M'Douald came within the law, thc circumstance, that the subsequeut survey of Sumner was made without notice in fact, cannot alter the case. His warrant ouly authorized him to acquire vacaut land, and he took upon himself to find lands of that description. The principle, caveat emptor, is directly applicable.

5. The 5th objectiou made by the defendant is, that the patent of the plaintiffs coutains surplus land. The warrant, it is said, was au authority to snrvey only 2,000 acres, and, for the snrplns, the survey was made without authority.

It is a fact of universal uotoriety in Virginia not ouly that the old military surveys, but that the old patents of that country generally coutain a greater quautity of land than the patents call for. The ancieut law of Virginia uotices this fact, and provides for the case. It prescribes the manner in which this snrplus may be acquired by other persons; and it is worthy of notice that the patentee must himself reject the surplns before it can be acquired by another, aud, after having so rejected it, he has the election to allot it in such part of his patent as he pleases.

It is contended, however, that although a grant containing surplus laud might give a legal right to such surplus, yet a survey could uot be carried into grant so far as such surplns appeared upon a caveat.

*On this subject we find no act of Vir- [250 ginia nnder the regal government. At that tiue the governor and council constituted a branch of the legislature and the geueral court of the colony. They also held a distinct court in the counsel chamber for the trial of caveats, their decisions on which were regulated by rules established by theuselves. These rules, it is believed, are lost; and it is also believed that the means of ascertaining satisfactorily what they were, are uo longer attainable. The land law of 1779 was framed by men who understood them, and it is not unreasouable to suppose that, iu drawing that law, some respect was paid to them. That law gives a caveat against a survey not returned to the land-office within twelve months after it is made, or whose breadth shall not be one-third of its length, but, gives no caveat on account of surplus land contained in a survey, nor does it indicate the idea that, on a survey coutaining such snrplus, a caveat could not be supported. If such survey is not absolutely void for the whole, the difficulty of assiguing the exact quautity is sufficient to have induced legislative regulation, had it been coutcmplated as the subject of a caveat, It would seem that, for security in this respect, the government trusted to the oaths prescribed for surveyors and chaiu carriers. It is also worthy of remark, that the law of 1779 superadds to the restrictions formerly imposed on taking up surplus lands contained in any patent, that it can only be done during the life of the original pateutee, and before any alienation has been made.

It is also to be observed, that the act of 1779 confirms this survey, aud it is understood that no previous entry was deemed necessary to its validity. The entries made on treasury warrants are most frequently iu such terms that a survey for a greater quautity of land might be considered as being so far contrary to location, and might be restrained by the location; but, where there is no entry, the difficulty of restraining the survey is much increased, because there exists uo standard by which to reduce it. There is, indeed, a standard as to quantity, 251] but *not as to form and place. The survey is an appropriation of a certain quantity of land by metes and bounds, plainly marked by an officer appointed by the government for that purpose, and it would seem that the government receives his plat and certificate as full evidence of the correctness of the survey. This being the case, it is admitted by the government to be an appropriation of the land it covers, and it is difficult to discern a rule by which the survey could be reduced on a caveat by the owner of an interfering survey, unless the entry on which it was made was in such terms that the excess might be considered as surveyed contrary to location. For to every and to each part of the land surveyed, its owner has an equal right.

Whatever rules might have been established in the tribunal having jurisdiction of the subject, under the regal government, the caveat in this cause, had one been entered, must have been regulated by the act of 1779. That act gives validity to both surveys; and although it directs caveats depending in the council chamber, at the commencement of the revolution, to be transferred to the general court, and to be tried by the rules which governed when they were entered, it subjects future caveats to the law then introduced. Under this law, as has already been stated, the court can perceive but one principle on which a survey can be reduced ou a caveat, and that principle is inapplicable to this case.

In conformity with this opinion is that of the judges of Kentucky. Not a case exists, so far as the court is informed, in which, on a caveat, the quantity of land in the survey of plaintiff or defendant has been considered as affecting the title, upon the single priuciple of surplus. Yet the fact must have often occurred. And in the case of Beckley v. Bryan and Ransdale, the contrary principle is expressly laid down. In that cause the court said, "It is proper to premise that there is but one species of cases in which any court of justice is authorized by our land law to devest the owner of a survey 252] *of the surplus included within its boundaries; uamely, where the survey was made posterior to an entry made by another person on the same land; and to do more would be unequal, and unjust, inasmuch as a survey which is too small cannot be enlarged.

This position, it is true, was laid down in a contest between a military survey and a patent on a treasury warrant. But it is laid down in terms equally applicable to a contest between two military surveys; and the court does not understand that the law has ever been otherwise understood in Kentucky.

The opinions delivered by the judges of appeals of Virginia in the case of Johnson v. Buffington (2 Wash., 116), would incline this court very much to the opinion that the same rule prevailed in the council chamber before the revolutiou. In that case, under a warrant from Lord Fairfax for 300 acres of land, 450 acres had been surveyed, and the excess appeared on the plat. This survey had lain in the office many years, and was clearly forfeitable; but Lord Fairfax had not taken advantage of the forfeiture. After his death a patent issued on a subsequent entry and survey, and the patentee was decreed to convey to the person claiming under the prior entry. In delivering his opinion Judge Fleming said, "The first objection made by the counsel for the appellant is, that the survey does not pursue the warrant; but I think there is no weight in this, as the variance is only in the quantity. If the land had been imperfectly described, it might have been fatal."

Judge Carrington said he did not consider the variance between the warrant and survey, as to the quantity, as being of any consequence.

The President, who had been an eminent practitioner in the council chamber, said he felt no *difficulty about the variance [253 in the quantity of the land.

The rules established by Lord Fairfax were known to conform to those of the crown, and the declarations of the judges in this case, all of whom were acquainted, in some degree, with the usages under the regal government, make a strong impression on this court in favor of the opinion that, in the council chamber, the law was understood to be, that excess in the survey was not to be regarded.

The law of this case, then, so far as respects the state of title previous to the emanation of either grant, appears to be with the first survey. It remains to inquire whether a court of equity will relieve against the legal title acquired by the first grant.

The principle on which relief is granted is, that the patent, which is the consummation of title, does, in equity, relate to the inception of title; and, therefore, in a court of equity, the person who has first appropriated the land in contest has the best title, unless his equity is impaired by the circumstances of the case.

In this cause, the first patentee is said to be a purchaser without notice. But, for the reasons assigned in a former part of this opinion, the court does not consider him as clothed with that character. His warrant authorizes him to survey waste and unappropriated lands, and he undertakes himself to find lands of that description. The government acts entirely on his information; and the terms of his grant are, that the lands were waste aud unappropriated. It is not for him to say that he had misinformed the government, and had surveyed appropriated instead of vacant lands, and had thereby entitled himself to be considered as a pnrchaser without notice.

Neither does the court conceive that the 254] plaintiffs *have forfeited their right to come into a court of equity, by their negligence.

In the case of 1 Wash., 116, the prior right of the plaintiff had been absolntely forfeited, so that the defendant had the first title both in eqnity and law, and the plaintiff's bill was dismissed because he failed to prove the fraud which he alleged, and which was, in that case, necessary to give the court jurisdiction.

In the case of Picket and Dowdale, and of Currie and Burns, there were both forfeiture and abandonment.

In the case of Johnson and Brown (3 Call, 259), more than sufficient time had elapsed between the entry and survey of the plaintiff to prodnce a forfeiture; bnt, by the old law, notice was to be given by the surveyor before a forfeiture could take place, and this fact was not proved. Dnring forty years this entry had been totally neglected; and the court was of opinion that, after snch a lapse of time, the fact of notice by the surveyor might be presnmed. This case then also turned on the principle of forfeitnre. There were, besides, a great many circumstances in Johnson's title which gave a strong bias to the judgment of the court.

The difference between the case nnder consideration, and those cited is apparent. But the case of Johnson v. Buffington was much stronger than this. The prior survey was actually forfeitable, but had not been forfeited; and in that case, after a much longer time than exists in the present, a conrt of equity supported it against the eldest grant.

The general principles which have been relied on in this branch of the argnment, cannot be considered as applicable to a case in which the act, which constitutes the foundation of the charge of negligence, was performed within 255] the time allowed by statute *for its performance. The circumstances, which excused the owners of military snrveys for not returning them, were before the legislature and have been declared, by law, to be snfficient.

But it is contended that the plaintiffs can have no equity beyond the 2,000 acres contained in the warrant on which M'Donald's survey was made.

If this court is to consider itself as merely substituted for a court of law, with no other difference than the power of going beyond the patent, this question is already decided. Bnt, in the case of Bodley and Hughes v. Taylor, an opinion was indicated that its jnrisdiction, not being given by statute, bnt assumed by itself, must be exercised upon the known principles of equity. This opinion is still thought perfectly correct in itself. Its application to particular cases, and indeed its being considered as a rule of decision on Kentucky titles, will depend very mnch on the decisions of that country. For, in questions respecting title to real estate especially, the same rule ought certainly to prevail in both conrts.

But, in its equity, this case differs essentially from Bodley and Hughes v. Taylor. In that case Taylor had the eldest entry, as well as the eldest patent. In this, the eldest eqnitable right is with him who holds the eldest[1] grant. In that case the variance between the entry and snrvey of the elder right is established by a set of rules growing ont of expositions subsequent to the survey. In this, the eldest grant is fonnded on a survey made on land which, in point of fact, was previously appropriated. Bnt, which is of great importance in that case, the terms of the subseqnent location prove that the locator considered himself as comprehending Taylor's previous entry within his location, and, consequently, did not suppose so much of the land covered by his entry as being then snbject to appropriation. *He either [256 did not mean to acqnire the land within Taylor's entry, or he is to be considered as a man watching for the accidental mistakes of others, and preparing to take advantage of them. What is gained at law by a person of this description, equity will not take from him; bnt it does not follow that equity will aid his views, and give more than the law gives him, by allowing him to hold what he has legally gained, while he demands what is legally lost.

In this case, M'Donald supposed himself to be appropriating, and in fact was appropriating, land to which no other had, at the time, any pretensions.

In addition to these strong differences, in eqnity, between the two cases, no decision of Kentncky was shown to the conrt, which was applicable to the case of Bodley and Hughes v. Taylor. Bnt the case of Beckley v. Bryan and Ransdale is conceived to be an authority in point for this case. The decision of the Court of Appeals of Virginia in the case of Buffington and Johnson is also considered as expressly in point, and is to be respected, because both these snrveys were made while the conntry in which they were made formed a part of Virginia.

It is thought not absolutely unimportant, in a court of eqnity, that one of the circumstances has occnrred, which, at law, rescues, the surplns land in M'Donald's patent from the possibility of being acquired by any other person. An alienation has taken place. The decree, therefore, of the Court for the District of Kentucky, is to be reversed, and the defendant must be decreed to release to the plaintiffs, respectively, the lands within Sumner's patent which lie within the lines of the land conveyed by M'Donald's heirs to them respectively.

v.
JOHN ARTHUR AND ROBT. PATTERSON.

The want of oyer of the condition of a bond in plea of performance is fatal.

Upon demurrer, the judgment of the court must be against the party who commits the first error.

ERROR to the Kentncky District Court of the United States, in an action of debt on a bond for 6,000 dollars.

1.—Quære, youngest?

The capias ad respondendum issued on the 28th of June, 1803, returnable to the first Monday of July in the same year, and was served on the 30th of June.

The declaration was in the usual form of an action of debt for the penalty of the bond with a profert, but without setting forth its condition or any breach thereof.

The defendants, without praying oyer, pleaded as follows: "And the defendants, by their attorneys, come and defend the wrong and injury when and where, &c., and for plea say they have well and truly kept and performed, and have faithfully executed and discharged, all and singular the duties enjoined on them by the laws of the United States, and the conditions in the writing obligatory in the declaration mentioned, and this they are ready to verify," &c.

The plaintiffs replied, that they ought not to be barred, &c., because they say "that the said defendants have not well and truly kept the several conditions in the said writing obligatory, as they in pleading have alleged, but have broken the same in this, to wit, that the said John Arthur, although duly appointed to the office of collector of the revenue for the first division of the first survey of the District of Ohio, as stated in the said condition, had not, at the time of executing the said writing obligatory, executed and discharged, nor after 258] the execution *thereof, did he continue to execute and discharge faithfully, all the duties of said office; and also failed to settle his accounts with the proper officer, according to law, for more than six months previous to the institution of this suit, and also failed to pay over to the proper officer the duties which were collected, or the duties which by law, and the accounts rendered by the said John, he was bound to collect and pay over; and is in arrear to the said United States in the sum of sixteen thousand one hundred and eighty-one dollars and fifteen cents, due from and unpaid by him in his said office of collector as aforesaid; and this the said plaintiffs pray may be inquired of by the country.

To this replication the defendants demurred specially, "Because this suit is prosecuted under the 14th section of the act of Congress passed in the month of July, 1798 (c. 88), entitled, 'An act to regulate and fix the compensation of the officers employed in collecting the internal revenues of the United States, and to insure more effectually the settlement of their accounts,' which section is in the following words, to wit; 'The bond of any supervisor or other officer of the revenue, who shall neglect or refuse, for more than six months, to make up and render to the proper officer, his accounts of all duties collected or secured, pursuant to such forms and regulations as have been, or shall be, prescribed, according to law, or to verify such accounts on oath or affirmation, if thereto required, or to pay over the moneys which shall have been collected, shall be deemed forfeited, and judgment thereon shall and may be taken at the return term on motion, to be made in open court, by the attorney of the United States, unless sufficient cause to the contrary be shown to, and allowed by, the court; provided always, that the writ or process in such case shall have been executed at least fourteen days before the return day thereof;"

"And the plaintiffs, in assigning the breach in the following words, to wit, 'And also failed to pay *over to the proper of- [259 ficer the duties which were collected, or the duties which by law, and by the accounts rendered by the said John, he was bound to collect and pay over,' have assigned the said breach neither within the letter nor the meaning of the said section of the said act of Congress; but the same is calculated to charge the said defendants with the amount of the duties due within the said first division of the first survey of the District of Ohio, whether the same is collected or secured, or not, or whether they could or might have been collected or not."

This demurrer being joined, the judgment of the court below was in favor of the defendants; and the United States brought their writ of error.

Rodney, Attorney General, for the United States.

Whether the replication be good, or not, the defendants have committed the first error in pleading, and therefore the judgment of the court below ought to have been against them. The plea is bad for want of oyer of the bond, and of the condition, the performance of which is pleaded; as in the case of Wallace v. The Duchess of Cumberland (4 Term Rep., 370), where the defendant, after praying oyer of the bond and condition, omitted to set forth the recital which preceded the condition; and the court said that the plaintiff might have signed judgment as for want of a plea.

But the replication is good in substance; and if it contain more than is necessary, the surplusage will not vitiate it. (4 Dal., 440.) A replication may be bad in part, but good upon the whole. This replication states matter sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to maintain an action upon the bond; and even if it afterwards states something which is inaccurate, it will not vitiate the whole. (3 Term Rep., 376, Duffield v. Scott; Buller's opinion.) The breach need not be assigned in the words of the condition. It *is sufficient if a substantial breach be [260 set forth. (Doug., 367; Esp. N. P., 209.)

A demurrer admits all matters of fact although informally pleaded, if the right of the matter sufficiently appears. (1 Tidd's Prac., 649 [London edit.] Hob., 233.)

The action is not necessarily brought under the 14th section of the act of July, 1798. That section does not prevent the United States from bringing actions in any other manner.

Pope, contra.

The first error is in the declaration. No action can be maintained upon an official bond until the condition be broken; and unless the declaration show the condition to be broken, it shows no cause of action in the United States. The act of Congress only authorizes a suit to be brought upon such a bond when the obligor has failed in his official duty, and such failure is a part of the plaintiff's title to sue.

In the case of Stoddert v. M'Clanaghan, in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, (Sneed's Cases, 359,) the court said, as the plaintiff could only sue in his own name, upon a bond given to the governor, by virtue of the act of assembly which gives a right of action upon such a bond to a person injured, the plaintiff ought in his declaration to have averred himself to be a person injured; otherwise he does not show a title in himself to sue.

LIVINGSTON, J. How does it appear that this is an official bond, and not a bond for a debt simply?

Pope. The bond of a public officer upon which a suit is brought is always a part of the record.

Rodney, in reply.

This case is not like that of Stoddert and 261] M'Clanaghan. *In that case the name of the plaintiff did not appear in the bond, and the only fact which could give him a right to sue upon the bond was that he was a person injured. But in the present case the plaintiffs are the obligees of the bond, and the defendants under their hands and seals have acknowledged themselves to stand indebted to the plaintiffs in the amount of the penalty of the bond. If they would take advantage of the condition of the bond they must show it.

February 24. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, to the following effect:

If this case depends upon the replication, the judgment of the court must be in favor of the defendants. It is certainly bad, inasmuch as it charges the defendants with moneys not collected. But upon a demurrer the judgment is to be against the party who committed the first error in pleading.

The want of oyer is a fatal defect in the plea of the defendants; and the court cannot look at any subsequent proceeding. The plea was bad when pleaded. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Judgment reversed.

262*] *HEPBURN AND DUNDAS, PLAINTIFFS IN ERROR,
v.
COLIN AULD, DEFENDANT IN ERROR;
AND HEPBURN AND DUNDAS, APPELLANTS,
v.
COLIN AULD, APPELLEE.

After a long possession in severalty a deed of partition may be presumed.

In equity, time may be dispensed with if it be not of the essence of the contract.

A vendor may compel a specific execution of a contract for the sale of land, if he is able to give a good title at the time of the decree, although he had not a good title at the time when, by the contract, the land ought to have been conveyed.

But a court of equity will not compel a specific performance unless the vendor can make a good title to all the land contracted to be sold.

THE first of these cases was a writ of error to the judgment of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, in an action of debt at common law brought by Auld, agent and attorney in fact for Dunlop & Co., against Hepburn and Dundas for 45,000 dollars, the penalty of the same articles of agreement which are recited in the case of Hepburn and Dundas, v. Auld (ante, vol. 1, p. 321).

The second of these cases was an appeal from a decree of the same court dismissing the bill in equity brought by Hepburn and Dundas against Colin Auld, to compel him to accept the land, and pay the difference between the agreed value of the land and the award.

The questions in the two cases being substantially the same, they were heard and argued together.

The breaches assigned in the declaration, in the action of debt by Auld were, that Hepburn and Dundas did not, on the 2d of January, 1800, pay the amount of the award in cash, nor bills of exchange, and did not on that day assign and transfer to Auld the contract of Graham, with full powers, &c.

Hepburn and Dundas pleaded a tender of the assignment of Graham's contract in three different pleas, the pleadings upon which ended in demurrers. The first raised the question whether Auld was obliged to accept a deed of assignment, the preamble of which stated a part of the consideration of the assignment to be "a full acquittance and discharge *of all [263 the claims and demands of the said John Dunlop & Co., against them being made and executed by the said Colin Auld." The other two demurrers brought into view the title of Hepburn and Dundas to the land sold to Graham.

The bill of Hepburn and Dundas alleges that the agreement by Auld to accept an assignment of Graham's contract towards the discharge of the debt due from them to Dunlop & Co., and to give an acquittance and discharge of that debt, and of all demands, was the inducement for them to submit the accounts to arbitration. It also states the acts and letters of Auld subsequent to the tender, to show that he considered himself bound to accept the assignment. That on the 27th of June, 1801, after recovering judgment in ejectment against Graham's heirs, Hepburn and Dundas offered to make him a deed for the land, but he refused to accept it.

The answer of Auld denies that he was bound to accept an assignment of Graham's contract which should bind him to give an acquittance and discharge of all demands of Dunlop & Co. against Hepburn and Dundas. He endeavors to explain his conduct and letters subsequent to the tender by saying that he was induced to do it by the representations of Hepburn and Dundas that it was necessary, and that the money due to them by Graham might be sooner recovered, or raised, by sale of the land, than by any contest at law relative to the transaction of the 2d of January, 1800. He denies that he ever considered the tender as good, but was willing to co-operate with them in bringing to an end the suit with Graham, until which time it would be doubtful whether a sufficient title in fee-simple could be obtained from them.

He avers that the compromise made with Graham's heirs was without his consent, and may be set aside when they come of age.

He says the offer of a deed on the 27th of June, 1801, was after he had brought suit against them *upon the award, and [264 when it was apparent that their title was bad, or at all events doubtful.

In an amended answer, he states that he had requested them to exhibit to him their title papers, which they refused to do; and requires that they should produce them in court. He avers his belief that their title is defective.

Hepburn and Dundas filed a supplemental bill which states their title. It avers possession ever since 1773, and refers to certain title papers; they say that they verily believe their title to be good, and never heard a doubt till long after the tender of the assignment; that as soon as the objections were made known they took pains to remove them, and have lately obtained deeds of confirmation from the surviving patentees. That the title of Sarah, one of the co-devisees of John West, after her death in 1795, descended upon her brothers, Thomas, John and Hugh, and her sister Catharine, and that John, Hugh, and Catharine have lately confirmed their title, and refer to the deeds; and they suppose that Thomas had passed all his title to Sarah's part by a deed executed before her death.

The title which they show in their supplemental bill is as follows, viz.:

The six thousand acres were included in a patent for 51,302 acres of land, granted on the 15th of December, 1772, by the State of Virginia to George Muse, Adam Stephen, Andrew Lewis, Peter Hog, John West, John Polson, and Andrew Waggoner. This tract of 51,302 acres was in 1773 divided between the patentees who have occupied in severalty ever since. One of the shares containing 6,000 acres, was allotted to John West, who died seized thereof, and devised all his Ohio lands to be equally divided among his children, Thomas, John, Hugh, Catharine, Sarah and Francina, excepting that Hugh was to have 1,000 acres more than any of the other children. The testator had but two tracts 265] on the waters of the *Ohio, viz., that of 6,000 acres on the banks of the Ohio, and one of 1,400 acres on Pokitallico Creek. The devisees made a partition among themselves; Francina's one thousand acres were allotted to her out of the 1,400 acres on Pokitallico Creek, and she, and those claiming under her, have ever since held and enjoyed the same exclusively.

The tract of 6,000 was divided between the others; Hugh having 2,000 and the other four having 1,000 each.

Thomas, by deed of 20th of May, 1788, conveyed his 1,000 acres to Hepburn and Dundas.

John, by deed of 21st of February, 1790, also conveyed his 1,000 acres, in which deed Thomas was a party.

Hugh, also, by deed of 24th of April, 1788, conveyed his 2,000 acres.

Catharine intermarried with Baldwin Dade, who, with her and Thomas West, by deed of 20th of June, 1788, conveyed to Hepburn and Dundas her 1,000 acres.

Sarah intermarried with John Bronaugh, who, with her and Thomas West, conveyed to Hepburn and Dundas her 1,000 acres, by deed of 21st of February, 1790.

Thomas, also, by deed of 25th of April, 1788, quit-claimed to Hepburn and Dundas the 2,000 acres conveyed by Hugh.

By virtue of these deeds Hepburn and Dundas aver that they were seized of the 6,000 acres, and so continued seized and possessed until the contract with Graham.

They then proceed to answer some objections to their title which had been suggested by Auld. *They say that he had objected that the [266 original patentees were joint tenants, and that it does not appear that partition was made among them by deed.

To this they answer, first, that after such a lapse of time a deed ought to be presumed. And, secondly, that upon inquiry they found that George Muse, Andrew Lewis, and Peter Hog died before 1787; that Adam Stephen died since 1787, and Andrew Waggoner and John Polson were still alive, who made deeds of confirmation to Hepburn and Dundas. That they also obtained a like deed from the residuary devisee of Adam Stephen.

They also state that Auld had objected that the partition between the devisees of John West, not being by deed, was not valid; and that Francina, although she had consented to take her thousand acres on Pokitallico Creek, might yet claim a share of the 6,000 acres.

To this they answer, that a parol partition among the devisees was valid.

They state that it was further objected by Auld, that Sarah Bronaugh had never duly conveyed her 1,000 acres to Hepburn and Dundas, and that she was not privily examined according to the laws of Virginia.

To this they answer, that they believe she was privily examined, but the commission is lost or mislaid so that they cannot find it. And further that Sarah Bronaugh died in 1795, without issue; and Francina, who had intermarried with Charles Turner, died without issue in 1796, and her husband in 1802, by which deaths the interest of those ladies in the 6,000 acres, if any they had, devolved upon their brothers Thomas, John, and Hugh, and their sister Catharine Dade, whereupon Hepburn and Dundas obtained from John and Hugh, and Baldwin Dade and Catharine Dade, deeds of confirmation as to the shares of Sarah and Francina. They did not get such a deed from Thomas, because he *had before [267 conveyed to them his interest in those lands.

Auld's answer to the supplemental bill denies that any division ever took place between the devisees of John West, under his will, and avers that Francina always refused to sell her interest in the Ohio lands to Hepburn and Dundas, and that it was settled upon her husband, Charles Turner, who died, leaving two children by a second marriage.

That the interest of Sarah Bronaugh never passed from her to Hepburn and Dundas, for want of her privy examination.

That the deeds from Hugh West and Thomas West were not recorded within the eight months, so as to be valid against creditors or subsequent purchasers without notice. That Thomas was embarrassed in his circumstances for many years previous to his death, and there are still debts due from him by bonds and judgments, which bind any lands which descended to him from his sisters Sarah and Francina.

Swann and P. B. Key, for the appellants.

E. J. Lee and C. Lee, for the appellee.

On the part of the appellants, it was contended,

1. That Hepburn and Dundas had done everything on their part necessary to entitle them to a specific execution of the agreement, and to compel Auld to accept the land and give a release of all demands of Dunlop & Co. against them.

That they were entitled to such a release upon making the assignment of Graham's contract.

Upon this point the argument took nearly the same course as in the case between the same parties (ante, vol. 1, p. 324).

268*] *They further attempted to show, from the evidence, that it was the intention of the parties that such a release should be given in case of the assignment of Graham's contract, and that instructions to that effect were given to the scrivener who drew the articles of agreement. In support of their right to prove those facts by parol evidence, they cited 1 Fonb., 188; 2 Atk., 203; 3 Atk., 388; 1 Ves. Jun., 456.

2. That it was not necessary that Hepburn and Dundas should have had a complete legal title in fee-simple at the time of the agreement, nor at the time of the tender of the assignment of Graham's contract. But it is sufficient to entitle them to a specific execution of the agreement if they can now give a good title. (Sugden's Law of Vendors, 249, 250.)

Where time is not of the essence of the contract, the lapse of time is no bar to a specific execution. (1 Atk., 12; Sug., 246, 248; 2 P. Wms., 630; Longford v. Pitt; 2 Pow., 266; Newland, 230, 236, 238, 241.)

Even if in this case time were material, Auld has waived it by his subsequent conduct. He never objected on account of defect of title. He never asked for the title papers till 1804, nor has the defect of title caused any delay. The title was never questioned until March, 1805, long after the present bill was filed.

The title is now complete. The only question which can possibly be raised is as to any supposed interest which may have descended from Sarah Bronaugh and Francina Turner upon Thomas West. But Thomas West, by joining in the deed from Mrs. Bronaugh, as well as by his own deed, has estopped himself from claiming any title. (5 Bac. Abr., 440, 445, tit. Warranty.)

A deed of partition between the original 269*] patentees *ought now to be presumed after thirty-six years' possession in severalty. (Sug., 213; 4 Term. Rep., 482; Cowp., 216, 217.)

It is not necessary under the law of Virginia that a deed of partition should be recorded.

For the appellee, it was said,

That Auld is a defendant. He does not come here to ask anything. A court of equity will not decree that to be done which in equity and conscience ought not to be done. He is a mere agent. The intention of the parties was to pay a debt, not to purchase land. The agreement was that Graham's contract should be so assigned to Auld that he should either have the land, or the money, at his option. In order to do that, Hepburn and Dundas ought then to have had a good title; for Auld could not compel Graham to pay the money, if Hepburn and Dundas had not a good title. Auld did everything that he ought to have done. He offered to receive such an assignment, and to give such a receipt, as were conformable to the agreement.

If the vendor has not a good title at the time when the agreement is to be performed, and the vendee brings an action at law upon the articles, the vendor cannot have a decree for a specific performance, although he afterwards obtain a good title before judgment in the suit at law.

In April, 1801, Auld brought his suit at law upon the articles, and, as late as 1806, Hepburn and Dundas had not a good title.

The original patentees were joint tenants. The will of John West did not sever the joint tenancy, but all his interest vested in the survivors. They could only sever by deed. (2 Bl. Com., 186.)

Neither joint tenants nor tenants in common in *Virginia, could make partition by [270 parol since the statutes for recording deeds.

That the completion of the title in Hepburn and Dundas, after suit brought by Auld upon the articles, was too late to entitle them to a specific execution. The counsel for Auld cited Newland on Contracts, 206, 207, 227; Sugd., 90, 91; 2 Pow., 19, 37, 69, 75, 79, 221, 267; 4 Ves. Jun., 849; 5 Ves. Jun., 818; 3 Atk., 388, 573; 1 Hen. & Munf., 131; 2 Bro. Chan. Cas., 343; 1 Bro. Chan. Cas., 93, 440; 2 Pow., 14; 2 Ves., 389; Sugd., 165; 5 East, 198; 1 Wash., 14; 1 Vern., 366; 1 Ves., 319; 1 Fonb., 107; 7 Ves., 211.

Even if there be only doubts about the title, a court of equity will not compel the purchaser to take it.

Parol testimony cannot be admitted to vary the written agreement. (1 Ves., 319, 426; 3 Call, 139; 2 Bro. Chan. Cas., 343; 4 Ves. Jun., 849; 1 Fonb., 129.)

The title as to Thomas West's part of Sarah Bronaugh's and Francina Turner's shares of the 6,000 acres, is clearly defective. He is not estopped by his deed to claim under a title which he has since acquired.

By the agreement of the 27th of September, 1799, the plaintiffs bound themselves, in the event of not paying, on the 2d of January, in bills of exchange, or money, the amount of the award to be rendered between the parties, to assign and transfer, on that day, to the defendant, a contract they had made with Graham, by which they had sold to him a tract of land containing 6,000 acres for the sum of 18,000 *dollars, payable at different times, [271 with interest. They also bound themselves to execute an irrevocable power of attorney enabling the defendant, in their names, to recover the possession of the land, or to enforce the payment of the purchase money, at his election.

The defendant covenanted to accept this assignment, towards the discharge of the award, and, if it should exceed the amount thereof, to pay the excess.

On the part of the defendant it has been contended that this assignment was to be received as security for, and not as payment of, the debt due to Dunlop & Co. But on this point it is impossible to entertain a doubt. The contract itself is conclusive. The word "towards" was obviously introduced because, the award not being then made, it was uncertain whether the assignment would completely discharge its amount. But the words of the agreement admit of no other construction than that it was to be received either in part or in full payment, as the sum awarded might be of a greater or less amount than the stipulated value of the contract to be assigned. All the testimony connected with the agreement of September, 1799, tends to confirm this construction.

The next inquiry respects the transactions of the 2d of January, 1800. The plaintiffs insist, and the defendant denies, that the tender made by Hepburn and Dundas on that day was a legal offer to do what they had covenanted to perform.

The efficacy of the assignment itself is not questioned; but it is contended on the part of the defendant that the instrument is vitiated by the clause which is introduced into it, reciting, as a part of the consideration on which it was made, that a release of all claims and demands whatsoever, on the part of John Dunlop & Co. against them, had been given.

272*] *The contract of September, 1799, certainly does not, in terms, stipulate for such a release; and if this recital in the deed of assignment could possibly prejudice John Dunlop & Co. that circumstance would unquestionably invalidate the tender. But if it should be deemed an unimportant recital, then the tender is a substantial performance of the contract, so far as it was to be performed on the 2d of January, 1800, and at least imposed on Colin Auld the duty of preparing an unexceptionable deed, and demanding its execution.

It has already been stated that, under the agreement of September, 1799, the assignment of Graham's contract was to be received in payment, and consequently that assignment, accompanied with a proper power of attorney, would discharge the award as fully as a payment in bills of exchange or money. Had the deed, therefore, limited its recital to a discharge of all claims and demands under the award, it would have been strictly correct; for to such a discharge Hepburn and Dundas were entitled. The deed of assignment, properly executed and received, and the power of attorney would, in law, have been a full payment of the award; and the subsequent claims of John Dunlop & Co. would grow out of the agreement of September, 1799.

The inquiry, whether the general terms of the recital affords any substantial objection to the deed, produces two questions.

1. Could John Dunlop & Co. have had any other claims and demands on Hepburn and Dundas than were comprehended in this award?

2. Would this recital in the deed of assignment impair those claims which grew out of the agreement?

1. The papers themselves sufficiently show that every claim whatever of John Dunlop & Co. on Hepburn and Dundas was settled in the 273] award. The *general complexion of the agreement of September, 1799, proves this; but the particular stipulation to give "a full receipt and discharge of all claims and demands of John Dunlop & Co. against them," in the event of payment of the award being made in money or bills of exchange, places the subject beyond any doubt. Dunlop & Co. had no claims and demands on Hepburn and Dundas which were not settled in the award.

2. Could this recital impair the rights of Dunlop & Co. under the agreement of 1799?

The covenants of that agreement which were not completely satisfied were, 1st. That Hepburn and Dundas would not, after executing the deed of assignment, interfere with the measures which Colin Auld might think proper to pursue for the recovery of either the land sold to Graham, or the money due under Graham's contract; 2d. That they would convey the said lands in fee-simple, after the termination of the suit then depending, to the person who should be decided to be entitled to them.

1. The covenant not to interfere was not a present duty. The obligation it created did not come into existence until after the execution of the deed of assignment. It was to be a consequence of that deed. At the time of its execution, this was not a claim or a demand. Taking the words in their most literal sense, the covenant not to interfere would not, in the opinion of the court, be released by them; but the court is also of opinion that, if this was in any degree doubtful, these general terms would be restrained by the manifest intent of the parties, apparent on the face of the papers.

2. This release could not discharge the obligation to convey the lands, after the termination of the suit with Graham, for the reasons assigned against the foregoing objection, and for this additional reason; the deed intended to transfer to *Auld all the rights of Gra- [274 ham under the contract, and is so expressed; and one of the covenants in the contract assigned was, to make a conveyance with a general warranty of a title free from all encumbrances.

The recital, then, presents no solid objection to the deed of assignment, because it could not impair the rights of Dunlop & Co. Yet it is unusual and unnecessary, and had Colin Auld prepared a deed which was perfectly unexceptionable, and Hepburn and Dundas had refused to execute it, this court, although the tender might have been good at law, would probably have held them responsible for any injury which might have been sustained in consequence of such refusal.

The power of attorney, which was tendered at the same time with the deed of assignment, appears entirely unexceptionable.

It is, then, the opinion of the court that, on the 2d of January, 1800, Hepburn and Dundas offered to do everything which it was at that time incumbent on them to do; and that the tender made on that day, with the refusal of that tender, do in law amount to a performance, so far as to place Hepburn and Dundas in the same situation, with regard to the claims of Dunlop & Co. under the award, as if Colin Auld had accepted the deed. This, however, did not discharge them from the duty of executing a proper deed when required, nor from the duty of making conveyances for the land which was the subject of the agreement of September, 1799.

If a doubt existed on this point, the subsequent conduct of Colin Auld would, in a court of equity, amount to a waiver of the day, so far as respects the tender of the deed, and a consent to accept such deed at an after day within a reasonable time.

The subsequent demand of a deed by Colin Auld, when he tendered the money which was due on account, *of the excess of value [275 in the estimated price of the land over the sum awarded to John Dunlop & Co. was made in a manner, and under circumstances, which are not deemed reasonable. Hepburn and Dundas had a right to consider and to take counsel on the deed they were required to execute; and although their delay was unnecessarily great, yet the offer they made might have been acceded to. In fact, they might reasonably insist on leaving the transaction on the ground on which it was placed by the contract of September, 1799, which would have been done in a manner free from all exception by executing such a deed as that tendered on the 2d of January, 1800, after striking out that part of the recital which respected the release.

The interference of Hepburn and Dundas, in accommodating the suit with Graham, is also urged as an objection to their conduct. They had certainly no right to interfere without the consent of Colin Auld. But when the correspondence is inspected, and it is perceived that they interfered only to effect the object he had himself desired, and which he had avowed his own inability to effect without their consent, the interference must be considered as innocent in point of intention, and unproductive of injury in fact.

The court, then, perceive nothing in the conduct of the plaintiffs, up to the decision of the suit with Graham, which ought to defeat their right to demand a specific performance of this contract. Could they at that time have conveyed a good title, Colin Auld ought to have accepted it.

It is alleged that the title, sold by the heirs of West to Hepburn and Dundas, was not a title to 6,000 acres of land in severalty, but an undivided interest in a much larger tract, and that, as this purchase was made, not for the purpose of acquiring an estate, but for the purpose of immediately selling and paying a debt which Auld was authorized to collect, the time of executing the contract is very material.

276*] *It is not to be denied that circumstances may render the time material; and the court does not decide that this case is not of that description. But the majority of the court is of opinion that the estate is to be considered as an estate held in severalty.

That a complete partition was made by an agreement, binding on all the parties who were interested, is in full proof. This partition would unquestionably have been protected in equity, and the majority of the court conceive that after such a lapse of time, and such a long separate possession, a deed of partition ought to be presumed; and that the court, in which the verdict in the ejectment against Graham was found, might so have directed the jury.

It remains, then, only to inquire whether Hepburn and Dundas hold a title under West, which is so free from exception that the defendant ought to be decreed to take it.

Long previous to the contract with Colin Auld, Hepburn and Dundas had obtained deeds from all the devisees of John West, Jun., who were entitled to undivided parts of the 6,000 acres lying on the Ohio. But the deeds from Thomas West, and Hugh West, were not recorded, and the privy examination of Mrs. Bronaugh, one of the devisees, does not appear. By her deed, therefore, nothing passed, and the deeds of Thomas and Hugh West were liable to very serious objections.

Had Colin Auld refused to receive a conveyance from Hepburn and Dundas after the termination of Graham's suit, because they were unable to make a good title, the objection would certainly have been entitled to very serious consideration. But his rejection of the conveyance then offered was not induced by any defect in the title. He previously determined not to receive a conveyance, because Graham's contract had not been assigned in such manner as he conceived to be a full execution of *the [277 agreement of September, 1799. These omissions, then, to record the deeds of Thomas and Hugh West, and the total want of title as to Mrs. Bronaugh's part, have produced no real inconvenience to Colin Auld. Had the title been unexceptionable, it would still have been refused; and this contest would still have been carried on with the same determined perseverance which marks the conduct of the parties. Under these circumstances, it is the opinion of the majority of the court that this case ought to be governed by those general principles which regulate the conduct of a court of chancery in decreeing a specific performance, if the defect of title, which existed at the time of contract, be cured before the decree.

Are Hepburn and Dundas now able to convey a perfect title?

Mrs. Bronaugh and Mrs. Turner, two of the devisees of John West, Jun., are dead. On the death of Mrs. Bronaugh, her real estate descended on her brothers and sisters, who were her co-heirs. Deeds of confirmation from Hugh and John West, and from Dade and wife have been obtained. Thomas West joined in the deed from Bronaugh and wife for the purpose of releasing his supposed reversion; but there is no conveyance from Francina Turner.

The court is not satisfied that Thomas West, by uniting in the deed for the purpose of conveying his reversionary interest, has conveyed a title which afterwards descended on him, or has estopped himself from asserting that title. To Thomas West's part of Mrs. Bronaugh's 1,000 acres, then, Hepburn and Dundas have no title.

On the death of Francina Turner, her interest in her sister Bronaugh's estate passed to her brothers and sister, who were her co-heirs. To Thomas West's share Hepburn and Dundas have no title.

*The undivided interest of Thomas [278 West, which descended on him at the death of Mrs. Bronaugh, is 166 2-3 acres; and the undivided interest which descended on him, at the death of Francina Turner, is 41 1-3 acres; making 208 acres, to which Hepburn and Dundas have, at this time, no title.

The omission to record the deed from Thomas West is not cured; and this court is now to decide whether, under these circumstances, Hepburn and Dundas are entitled to claim a specific performance.

Had there been simply a deficiency of 208 acres, the majority of the court would have considered it as a case for compensation; or had the parties entitled to this land been before the court, a division might possibly have been directed, and compensation for that quantity ordered: but, however this might be, as persons not before the court hold this interest, no order can be made respecting it; and it may very much embarrass those acts for asserting the title which may possibly be necessary. The part actually conveyed by Thomas West, too, never having been confirmed by a deed from himself or his heirs, properly recorded, might impose on Colin Auld the necessity of bringing a suit in chancery to perfect his title; or of being subjected to the inconveniences constantly attending the establishment of a deed not recorded, and the risks inseparable from such a deed.

This, therefore, is thought by the majority of the court to be a case not proper for a specific performance; and the bill is to be dismissed.

LIVINGSTON, J., expressed his non-concurrence in the reasoning of the court, in the latter part of the opinion just delivered by the chief justice. He would dismiss the bill, even if a good title could now be given by the complainants. This court can no more dispense with punctuality as to time in any case, than with 279] any other part of the *agreement. But in this particular case, time was of the essence of the contract. The object was payment of a debt; and from the anxiety of the defendant to resist a decree for a conveyance, and the desire of the complainants to urge it upon him, it is to be presumed that the lands have fallen in value during this delay of the title. The remedy by a decree for specific performance is a departure from common law, and ought to be granted only in cases where the party who seeks it has strictly entitled himself to it. It is said that by the English authorities the lapse of time may be disregarded in equity, in decreeing a specific execution of a contract for land. But there is a vast difference between contracts for land in that country and in this. There the lands have a known, fixed, and stable value. Here the price is continually fluctuating and uncertain. A single day often makes a great difference; and in almost every case time is a very material circumstance.

He dissented also from another part of the opinion, which intimates that if this were simply a deficiency of a few hundred acres, it would be considered as a case of compensation. This part of the opinion does not seem to be necessary, and does not affect the present case; but this court can in no case compel a specific performance on terms and conditions. We cannot decree a special execution for part, and assess damages as to the residue.

This is like a contract for 5,000 bushels of wheat. A tender of 4,500 would not be good; and we could not compel the purchaser to take a less quantity than he contracted for. So here the contract was for 6,000 acres. The complainants have a title to a part only; we could not compel the defendant to take that part, and give him damages for the non-conveyance of the residue.

JOHNSON, J., observed, that he had perhaps taken a peculiar view of this subject, but he should be in favor of decreeing a specific per- 280] formance generally; *leaving Auld to his remedy upon the warranty of the complainants for any defect of title which might appear. Auld, perhaps, thought it would be a good speculation, and had stipulated for a general warranty.

He acquiesced, however, in dismissing the bill, because he considered the judgment in the action at law brought by Auld against the complainants, as equivalent to a decree for a specific execution of the agreement, inasmuch as it prevents him from obtaining satisfaction in any other way for the sum awarded.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., declared the opinion of the court, in the action at law, to be, that the tender of the assignment of Graham's contract, and the power of attorney, was good as pleaded, and that Auld ought to have accepted it.

Judgment reversed.

THE UNITED STATES v. EVANS.

It is not a ground for a writ of error that the judge below refused to reinstate a cause after non-suit.

ERROR to the District Court for the Kentucky District.

In the court below, the judge at the trial rejected certain testimony which was offered by the attorney for the United States, who thereupon took a bill of exceptions, and became non-suit, and afterwards, at the same term, moved the court to set aside the non-suit and grant a new trial, upon the ground that the judge had erred in rejecting the testimony. But the court overruled the motion and refused a new trial; whereupon the attorney for the United States sued out his writ of error.

The case was submitted by the Attorney General and Rowan, without argument.

*MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the [281 opinion of the court, that in such a case, where there has been a non-suit, and a motion to reinstate overruled, the court could not interfere.

Judgment affirmed.

YEATON AND OTHERS, CLAIMANTS OF THE SCHOONER GENERAL PINKNEY AND CARGO, v. THE UNITED STATES.

In admiralty cases, an appeal suspends the sentence altogether; and the cause is to be heard in the Appellate Court as if no sentence had been pronounced.

If the law under which the sentence of condemnation was pronounced be repealed after sentence in the court below, and before final sentence in the Appellate Court, no sentence of condemnation can be pronounced; unless some special provision be made for that purpose, by statute.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, which condemned the schooner General Pinkney and cargo, for breach of the act of Congress prohibiting intercourse with certain ports of the island of St. Domingo; passed February 28th, 1806. (Vol. 8, p. 11.) This act was limited to one year; but by the act of February 24th, 1807, it was continued until the end of the then next session of Congress, when it expired on the 26th of April, 1808.

The schooner General Pinkney, on the 23d of August, 1806, was cleared from Alexandria for St. Jago de Cuba with a cargo, but went to Cape Francois in the island of St. Domingo, one of the prohibited ports. On her return, she was seized on the 17th of November, 1806, and libeled on the 5th of January, 1807, and condemned in the District Court on the 23rd of July following, which condemnation was affirmed in the Circuit Court on the 7th of November, from which sentence the claimants immediately appealed, in open court, to the Supreme Court of the United States, then next to be holden on the first Monday of February, 1808, where the cause was continued until the present term.

282*] *The only question now argued was, whether this court could now affirm the sentence of condemnation, inasmuch as the law which created the forfeiture, and authorized the condemnation, had expired?

C. Lee, Martin, Harper and Youngs, for the appellants, contended that, in all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, an appeal suspends entirely the sentence appealed from; and that in the Appellate Court the cause stands as if no sentence had been pronounced. (1 Browne's Civil Law, 495, 501; 1 Br. Parl. Cas., 70, 590, Rochfort v. Nugent; 2 Domat, 686; 2 Browne's Civil Law, 436, 437; 3 Dall. 87, 114, 118; Penhallow v. Doane, 4 Cranch, 2; Jennings v. Carson, Id. 443; United States v. The Betsy & Charlotte, Parker, 72.)

If, then, the case stands as if no sentence of condemnation has been passed, the question arises, can this court now proceed to condemn the vessel when there is no law authorizing a condemnation?

The act of Congress makes no provision for the recovery (after the expiration of the act) of penalities or forfeitures which had been incurred under that act during its existence.

And in such cases the law has always been understood to be, that the penalty or forfeiture cannot be enforced, nor the punishment inflicted. The court has no longer any jurisdiction in the case. (2 East's Cr., Law, 576, Jones's case; 1 W. Bl., 451, Miller's case; 4 Dal. 373; 1 Hale, 291, the case of the United States v. The cargo of the Ship Sophia Magdalena, before Judge Davis, at Boston, and a like case before Judge Hall, at New Orleans; 1 Cranch, 103, United States v. Schooner Peggy.)

Rodney, Attorney General, on the part of the United States, did not controvert the principles contended for on the other side, but in addition 283*] to the *authorities produced by the opposite counsel, referred the court to the opinion of Ch. J. Ellsworth, in the case of Wiscart v. Dauchy (3 Dal., 327), where he says, "an appeal is a process of civil law origin, and removes a cause entirely, subjecting the fact as well as the law to a review and retrial;" and to the opinion of Marshall, Ch. J., in the case of Pennington v. Coxe (2 Cranch, 61).

March 7. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

The majority of the court is clearly of opinion, that in admiralty cases an appeal suspends the sentence altogether; and that it is not res adjudicata until the final sentence of the Apellate Court be pronounced. The cause in the Appellate Court is to be heard de novo, as if no sentence had been passed. This has been the uniform practice not only in cases of appeal from the district to the circuit courts of the United States, but in this court also.

In prize causes, the principle has never been disputed; and in the instance court, it is stated in 2 Browne's Civil Law, that in cases of appeal it is lawful to allege what has not before been alleged, and to prove what has not before been proved.[1]

The court is, therefore, of opinion, that this cause is to be considered as if no sentence had been pronounced; and if no sentence had been pronounced, it has been long settled, on general principles, that after the expiration or repeal of a law, no penalty can be enforced, nor punishment inflicted, for violations of the law committed while it was in force, unless some special provision be made for that purpose by statute.[2]

*The following sentence was then [284 pronounced by the court:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof the court is of opinion, that an appeal from the sentence of a court of admiralty brings the whole case before the Appellate Court unaffected by the sentence of condemnation from which the appeal is made, and that a sentence of condemnation cannot be pronounced on account of a forfeiture which accrued under a law not in force at the time of pronouncing such sentence, unless, by some statutory provision, the right to enforce such forfeiture be preserved.

The court is, therefore, of opinion, that the sentence pronounced in this cause by the Circuit Court of the District of Maryland, affirming the sentence of the judge of the District Court in this cause, be reversed and annulled; and the court, proceeding to pronounce the proper sentence, doth direct that the libel be dismissed, and the property libeled be restored to the claimants, they paying the duties thereon if the same have not been already paid.

And, on the motion of the Attorney General, it is ordered to be certified that in the opinion of this court, there was probable cause of seizure.

v.
POTTS AND OTHERS.

"Round copper bottoms turned up at the edge," are not liable to duties, although imported under the denomination of "raised bottoms."

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland. The question upon which the judges of that court differed in opinion was,

1.—Clerk's Praxis, tit. 54. "Nam in appellatione a sententia definitiva licet non allegata allegare et non probata probare."

2.—The cases of Wilmot et al. claimants of the schooner Collector, and Lewis, claimant of the schooner Gottenburgh v. United States, were reversed upon the same principle.

Whether round copper bottoms turned up at the edge are liable to the payment of duty within the meaning of the several acts of Congress.

285*] *The following facts were admitted, viz., that the defendants imported a certain quantity of round copper plates, under the denomination "flat bottoms;" round copper plates turned up at the edges, under the denomination of "raised bottoms;" and square and oblong copper plates, under the denomination of "sheets." That the round copper plates, and the round copper plates, turned up at the edge, are never used, nor imported for use in the form in which they are imported, although they are capable of being used, but not with convenience or advantage, in that form; but are worked up by the manufacturers in this country into vessels of use after importation. That the round copper plates, as well as the square copper plates, are cut from large sheets which are made by pressure under a roller, but are never imported in the size or shape in which they come from the roller. That it is a great convenience and saving to the manufacturer here that the sheets of copper should come in a round rather than in a square shape, avoiding great waste by clipping and repeated heats. That all the said articles are sold and bought by weight, and the same price paid for the round plates, and the round plates turned up at the edges, as for the square or oblong plates. That the round copper plates turned up at the edge are raised at the edge from four to five inches. That copper plates of this description are sold for eighteenpence sterling per pound, and that copper wrought up into vessels or implements of any kind, are sold at two shillings and fourpence to two shillings and sixpence per pound. That there is no copper imported into this country under the denomination of plates; but that the square and oblong plates, which are commonly called copper plates, and are admitted to be free of duty, are imported under the denomination of sheets.

Harper, for the defendants.

This case differs from that of the United States v. Kid & Watson, (4 Cranch, 1,) in one circumstance only. In that case it does not ap-

286*] pear but that the *copper plates turned up at the edge were imported under the denomination of copper plates, and the jury expressly found that they came under that description. But in the present case they were imported under the denomination of "raised bottoms."

The real question is, whether these raised bottoms are to be considered as manufactured copper, or as much a raw material as plain copper plates.

The acts of Congress on this subject are all to be construed together. They are the act of July 4, 1789, c. 2, Oswald's edit., Laws U. S. vol. 1, p. 21. The act of 10th of August, 1790, § 1, Laws U. S., vol. 1, p. 251. The act of May 2, 1792, § 2, Laws U.. S., vol. 2, p. 71. And the act of June 7, 1794, Laws U. S., vol. 3, p. 108.

Rodney, Attorney General.

In the case of the United States v. Kid & Watson, the jury having found that the articles imported came under the description of copper in plates, there was nothing left for judicial decision.

But a question of revenue ought not to be left to the caprice, or misunderstanding of juries. It ought not to be left to the different customs or names used in different ports of the United States. The decisions on this subject ought to be uniform, and they can only be made so by the opinion of this court.

The case was submitted without argument.

March 7. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

The opinion of this court is, that copper plates turned up at the edge are exempt from duty, although *imported under the [*287 denomination of raised bottoms.

It appears to have been the policy of the United States to distinguish between raw and manufactured copper. From the facts stated, the copper in question cannot be deemed manufactured copper within the intention of the legislature.

The opinion certified to the court below was, that round copper bottoms turned up at the edge are not liable to the payment of duty within the meaning of the several acts of Congress.

RUSH v. PARKER.

This court will give time to procure affidavits as to the value of the matter in dispute.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Maryland, in an action of replevin.

I. P. Boyd, for the defendant in error, contended, that the replevin bond being in the penal sum of 1,200 dollars only, was conclusive evidence that the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, did not amount to 2,000 dollars, and consequently this court has no jurisdiction in the case.

Martin, contra, stated that he did not know till yesterday that this point would be made in the cause, and prayed time to show by affidavits the real value of the matter in dispute. Which

The court granted.

LIVINGSTON, J., thought that leave ought not to be given, on account of the delay it would produce. He had found a practice established here of receiving such affidavits; but he did not know of any case in which time had been given to produce them; and he would not consent to give it now. The case was *brought [*288 up to last term. The party ought to have come prepared to support the jurisdiction.

March 15. This being the last day of the term, and no affidavits having been produced,

The writ of error was dismissed, this court having no jurisdiction in the case.

LOGAN v. PATRICK.

The Circuit Court has jurisdiction in a suit in equity, to stay proceedings upon a judgment at law between the same parties, although the subpœna be served upon the defendant out of the district in which the court sits.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the 7th circuit and District of Kentucky, in which the judges below differed in opinion upon the following questions:

Whether the complainant (Logan), who is a citizen of the state of Kentucky, and is so stated in the pleadings, can maintain this suit, in this court, against the defendant, who is a citizen and inhabitant of the state of Virginia, and is so stated in the pleadings, upon the following case: John Patrick obtained in this court a judgment in ejectment against David Logan, who filed a bill in equity against him to be relieved against the judgment, and to compel a conveyance of the land, and obtained an injunction to stay proceedings on the judgment; but the subpœna was not served in the District of Kentucky. Can this court entertain jurisdiction of the cause? If not, does the defendant's answering the bill, without insisting upon the objection that the process was not served upon him in the District of Kentucky, authorize the court to entertain the cause?

The court, upon the first opening of the 289] case, *said there could be no doubt of the jurisdiction of the court below, and ordered it to be certified accordingly.

RADFORD v. CRAIG.

If the counsel on neither side appear when the cause is called, the writ of error will be dismissed.

NO appearance having been entered on the docket for either party in this cause, no counsel appearing, the court ordered both parties to be called, and neither of them appearing, the court ordered the writ of error to be dismissed.

The same order was made in the cases of Banks v. Bastrop, Tompkins v. Tompkins, and Buchannan v. Yeates.

HARRISON v. STERRY AND OTHERS.

In the distribution of a bankrupt's effects in this country, the United States are entitled to a preference, although the debt was contracted by a foreigner in a foreign country; and although the United States had proved their debt under the commission of bankruptcy, and had voted for an assignee.

An assignment by one partner, in the name of the copartnership, of the partnership effects and credits, is valid.

Under a separate commission of bankruptcy against one partner, only his interest in the joint effects passes.

The bankrupt law of a foreign country cannot operate a legal transfer of property in this country.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina, in a suit in equity, in which Richard Harrison was complainant, and the following parties defendants, viz.: 1. The United States. 2. Sterry and others, assignees of H. M. Bird and Benjamin Savage, under a British commission of bankruptcy. 3. Aspinwall and others, assignees of Robert Bird, under an American commission of bankruptcy. 4. Several American creditors who had attached the effects of Bird, Savage & Bird, in South Carolina. 5. Several British creditors who had also attached the same effects. And, 6. Thomas Parker, who, by consent of the creditors, had been appointed by the Court of Common Pleas in South Carolina, an agent for all the parties concerned, to collect and receive the debts due to Bird, Savage & Bird, which had been attached, and when *received, to hold the same till [*290 the further order of the court.

The question was, how those attached effects should be distributed.

Harrison, the complainant, claimed them as a trustee for the benefit of certain creditors of the house of Robert Bird & Co., which was the name of the firm by which the house of Bird, Savage & Bird, of London, carried on merchandise at New York. Robert Bird, desirous of aiding and supporting the credit of the house of Bird, Savage & Bird, by raising funds, upon the security of the cargo of the East India ship Semiramis, and certain debts to a large amount due to them in South Carolina, made a deed of trust on the 3d of December, 1802, intending thereby to assign that cargo and those debts to the complainant. The deed purported to be signed and sealed by H. M. Bird and Benjamin Savage, by Robert Bird, their attorney; and by Robert Bird, in his own right. It recited that, "whereas H. M. Bird, Benjamin Savage and Robert Bird, being copartners in trade under the several firms of Bird, Savage & Bird, and Robert Bird & Co., have in consequence of disappointments been obliged to borrow money from the bank of England, and under the firm of Robert Bird & Co. to purchase bills of exchange, public and bank stocks and goods, upon credit in America, in order to furnish means of more effectually supporting the credit of the said Bird, Savage & Bird, of London. And whereas it may be necessary for the purpose aforesaid, that the said Robert Bird & Co. should continue to make such purchases until the present difficulties may be removed; and security having been already given to the persons bound as sureties to the bank of England, for their responsibilities, the said H. M. Bird, Benjamin Savage and Robert Bird, are desirous to secure all persons from whom purchases have been or may be made as aforesaid, for the purpose of aiding the said house or firm of Bird, Savage & Bird. Now, therefore, know ye, that the said Henry M. Bird, Benjamin *Savage and Robert Bird, for the pur- [*291 pose above expressed," &c. The trust expressed was "to apply the same and every part thereof for the equal security and indemnification, in proportion to their just demands, of all persons from whom the said Robert Bird & Co. shall, before the end of the year 1803, have made any such purchases of goods, stocks or bills, or who before that time shall be holders of any bills of exchange drawn or negotiated by the said Robert Bird & Co. for the purpose of giving support to the house of Bird, Savage & Bird, as aforesaid."

Another ground of Harrison's claim was a similar instrument of writing, dated the 31st of January, 1803, not under seal, but signed, "Bird, Savage & Bird," and "Robert Bird & Co.," which signatures were in the handwriting of Robert Bird.

The bill of complaint stated that Robert Bird & Co. before and after the 3d of December, 1802, and before the end of the year 1803, made various purchases of stocks, goods and bills of exchange, and became indebted for bills drawn and negotiated by them for the purpose of giving support to the house of Bird, Savage & Bird, which debts remain unpaid. There was a letter of attorney from Henry M. Bird and Benjamin Savage, to Robert Bird, but it did not authorize him to execute deeds in their names generally.

The claim of the United States rested upon the priority given by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1797. (Vol. 3, p. 423, § 5.)

The attaching creditors relied upon their attachments under the laws of South Carolina.

The assignees under the several commissions of bankruptcy relied upon the British and American bankrupt laws.

The United States had proved their claim under the American commission, and had voted 292] in the *choice of assignees. They had also attached the effects in South Carolina, under the laws of that state, and had arrested Robert Bird, and held him to bail in New York.

The court below decided that the United States were entitled to priority of payment. That after satisfaction of that claim Harrison would be entitled, under the assignment, to Robert Bird's third part or share of the property mentioned in the deed, and the attaching creditors to the other two-thirds. That the assignees under the British commission could take nothing; and that the assignees under the American commission could take nothing but the surplus after all the other classes of creditors were satisfied.

From this decree all the parties, excepting the United States, appealed.

C. Lee, in behalf of the attaching creditors, admitted the priority of the United States, but contended that his clients were entitled to the whole of the surplus after satisfaction to the United States. They have a legal priority by means of their attachments, and they have equal equity. The statutes of South Carolina gives them as good a title at law as if goods were taken under a fieri facias.

Robert Bird's letter of attorney did not authorize him to make deeds of conveyance or assignment in the names of his partners; nor did his power as one of the firm extend to sealing deeds in their names, nor to assigning the partnership effects without seal. But a more solid objection to Harrison's deed is, that it was made to cover the property from the other creditors; and was made in contemplation of bankruptcy. It was not to pay a debt to Harrison, but to support the credit of Bird, Savage & Bird. It does not name the creditors, nor mention any sum which it was intended to secure. It could not convey more than an equitable title to Harrison in the choses in action, 293] but the creditors who attached *gained the legal title, without notice of Harrison's claim. Equity will not deprive them of this legal title. (2 Eq., Cas., Abr., 85.) Nor will equity protect an assignment of a chose in action except for a precedent debt.

The assignees under the British commission must yield to the attaching creditors. If they have any right, it can only be from the date of the assignment, which was subsequent to the attachments. (Doug., 170, Le Chevalier v. Lynch; 2 H., Bla., Hunter v. Potts; 1 H., Bla., 665, Sill v. Worswick; 1 East, 6, Smith v. Buchannan.)

This case differs from that of the United States v. Hooe (3 Cranch, 73). That was an assignment of real estate; this is only of a chose in action.

It does not appear when the acts of bankruptcy were committed. The commission against Bird & Savage issued on the 12th of June, 1803; that against Robert Bird on the 5th of December, 1803, and as the act of bankruptcy must be within six months before issuing the commission, it must have been subsequent to the 5th of June, 1803, long subsequent to the attachments.

There is no distinction between the rights of the British and the American attaching creditors. They all come in according to the dates of their attachments.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. Does the law of South Carolina create a lien from the time of the attachment without power to release the attached effects?

Harper, for the assignees under the British and American commissions.

The attachment may be dissolved by bail; but if no bail is given, and judgment of condemnation be had, it relates back to the time of the attachment, in the same manner as a fieri facias lodged in the *hands of the sheriff, under [294 the statute of frauds. (Laws of South Carolina, p. 188, § 3 and 8.) But the 31st section of the bankrupt law of the United States (vol. 5, p. 67), destroys all liens created by prior attachments. We admit that the bankrupt laws of England have no such effect in this country.

The case of the United States v. Fisher establishes the right of the United States to priority of payment. But the United States may waive their right by coming in as a creditor under the bankrupt law. They stand on the same ground with the attaching creditor at St. Kitts in the case from Douglass. If he had afterwards proved under the commission, it would have been a waiver of his priority under his attachment. So if a mortgage creditor would prove under the commission, he must relinquish his mortgage.

The United States have proved their debt under the commission, and voted in the choice of assignees. If in such a case an individual would be excluded, so will the United States, unless they can show that the agent had no authority. It is stated to have been done by the attorney of the United States for the district, who is the proper officer to prosecute for, and recover the debts due to, the United States, in the manner most for the interest of the United States, according to the best of his judgment. The United States are bound even by his mistakes.

The United States have elected to prove under the commission, and are bound by that election.

The commissioners of bankrupt cannot distribute but as the bankrupt law directs. They cannot pay the United States more than their dividend pro rata.

The debt from Bird, Savage & Bird was contracted in England, where they were bankers for the United States. Can the United States claim a preference against British subjects resident in England? Can they claim it in this country, under the commission here against British subjects?

295*] *As to the claim of Harrison. The instrument of January 31, 1803, is not sufficient to transfer even the property of Robert Bird. It could not assign the joint effects, because that was an act which he had no right to do. He had no right to use the name of the firm for that purpose. It does not transfer his own individual right, because it purports to transfer the joint estate in the joint name.

It is an act attempted to be done by the firm. One member of a firm may sell the goods and give a good receipt, because they are acts necessary in the regular course of business. But how far does this power extend? We must look, for an answer, into the law of merchants. It extends to the drawing and accepting bills, making notes, bills of parcels, receipts, bargain and sale of chattels in the course of the trade; but not to the assignment of the property of the firm for the purpose of obtaining more credits, because this is not necessary in the usual course of their business. It is an extraordinary act in which all the members must concur. It is a case not foreseen, nor contemplated, and therefore not provided for, by the law merchant.

In England a copartner cannot bind the firm by a bond: not because there is any magic in a seal, but because it is not necessary in the regular course of business. So with regard to real estate; one partner alone cannot convey. A secret assignment of property is not a regular mercantile transaction; and if one partner were permitted to make it, it might be the instrument of deception, if not of legal fraud.

But such an assignment is void by the bankrupt law. It is a conveyance, on the eve of bankruptcy, to give a preference to a particular class of creditors. It does not appear by the record that this assignment to Harrison was not of the whole estate of the bankrupts, at least the whole in this country.

It cannot operate as the deed of Robert Bird, 296] *because not executed in his own name, and as his deed. It cannot convey the joint interest of Bird, Savage & Bird, because, not executed in the name of the firm. And if it could, it is void under the bankrupt law.

As to the attaching creditors; the attachment, under the laws of South Carolina, did not change the property. It only gave a specific lien; but if it did change the property, still it is overruled by the express words of the 31st section of the bankrupt law.

The British creditors cannot give a priority by attachment in this country. They must come in under the British commission of bankruptcy; for they as well as the bankrupts were subject to the British bankrupt laws. They were bound by the assignment in England, and must claim under it, if they can claim at all.

P. B. Key, for Harrison.

The assignment to Harrison is legal and valid. It was at least competent to convey Robert Bird's interest.

The instrument of January 31, 1803, was not an act of bankruptcy in itself. It was more than six months prior to the issuing of the commission. It was a disposition of the property for a valuable consideration, not in payment of antecedent debts, but to raise new funds for the benefit of all the other creditors. This was not an unjust preference. It was equivalent to an absolute sale. Robert Bird had the full control over the debts due to the firm in this country. He could release, or assign and transfer, or sell, and, a fortiori, he could mortgage or pledge them. These creditors have peculiar merit. They advanced funds upon the credit of this property. The other creditors did not. The funds raised upon this property have been applied for the benefit of the general estate which has suffered no diminution by this exchange of property. *If the other cred-[297 itors succeed in destroying this assignment to Harrison, they will have a double share, while these creditors will get nothing.

The priority claimed by the United States did not attach until the bankruptcy. The commission issued on the 5th of December, and the act of bankruptcy upon which it issued, must have been committed within six months, next preceding, viz., after the 5th of June. But this assignment was long antecedent to that day. That the priority takes place when the event of insolvency happens, is to be inferred from the opinion of this court in the case of The United States v. Fisher (2 Cranch, 385, 395).

Rodney, Attorney General for the United States.

The assignment to Harrison was made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and therefore void. It was made on the 31st of January, and on the 6th of February the commission issued in London. The situation of the house must be presumed to be known to all the partners. (Peake's Cas., 200; Burr., 830.) It was not made to secure previous debts; no sum is mentioned; the debts were unascertained. The possession was not delivered, nor even an assignment of the bill of lading.

If it was made to defeat the bankrupt law, or even to secure a creditor, it is void. (Burr., 467, 474; Cowp., 117, 122.) It is not necessary that it should have been of all the estate. An assignment even of one-third is fraudulent. (Cowp., 632; 3 Wils., 47; 4 Burr., 2239.)

The assignees under a separate commission cannot recover the joint effects in their own name, but they may use the joint name. (1 Johns., 123). An assignment under a joint commission transfers the joint and separate property. (2 P. Wms., 500, Cox's note, ex parte Cooke.)

Harper*. A joint commission may [298 issue if all the partners be within the jurisdiction; but on a separate commission, nothing of the joint funds passes but the right of the bankrupt in them. (Cowp., 445, 449; 7 Bac. Abr. tit. Merchant, 12 Mod., 446; 1 Ves., 242.)

March 15. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

The object of this suit is to obtain the direction of the court, for the distribution of certain funds in South Carolina, which were the property of a company trading in England, under the firm of Bird, Savage & Bird, and in America, under the firm of Robert Bird & Co. The United States claim a preference to all other creditors, and their claim will be first considered.

Two points have been suggested, as taking this case out of the operation of the preceding decisions of the court respecting the priority to which the United States are entitled.

1. That the contract was made with foreigners, in a foreign country.

2. That the United States have waived their privilege, by proving their debt under the commission of bankruptcy.

1. The words of the act, which entitle the United States to a preference, do not restrain that privilege to contracts made within the United States, or with American citizens. To authorize this court to impose that limitation on them, there must be some principle in the nature of the case which requires it. The court can discern no such principle. The law of the place where a contract is made is, generally speaking, the law of the contract; i. e., it is the law by which the contract is expounded. But the right of priority forms no part of the con- [*299 tract *itself. It is extrinsic, and is rather a personal privilege dependent on the law of the place where the property lies, and where the court sits which is to decide the cause. In the familiar case of the administration of the estate of a deceased person, the assets are always distributed according to the dignity of the debt, as regulated by the law of the country where the representative of the deceased acts, and from which he derives his powers; not by the law of the country where the contract was made. In this country, and in its courts, in a contest respecting property lying in this country, the United States are not deprived of that priority which the laws give them, by the circumstance that the contract was made in a foreign country, with a person resident abroad.

2. Nor is this priority waived by proving the debt before the commissioners of the bankrupt.

The 62d section of the bankrupt act expressly declares, that "nothing contained in that law shall, in any manner, affect the right of preference to prior satisfaction of debts due to the United States, as secured by any law heretofore passed."

There is nothing in the act which restrains the United States from proving their debt under the commission, and the 62d section controls, so far as respects the United States, the operation of those clauses in the law which direct the assignees to distribute the funds of the bankrupt equally among all those creditors who prove their debts under the commission. Omit this section, and the argument of the counsel for the general creditors would be perfectly correct. The coming in as a creditor under the commission might then be considered as electing to be classed with other creditors. But the operation of this saving clause is not confined to cases in which the United States decline to prove their debt under the commission. It is universal. It introduces, then, an exception from the general rule laid down in [*300 the 29th and 30th sections of the *act, and leaves to the United States that right, to full satisfaction of their debts to the exclusion of other creditors, to which they would be entitled, had they not proved their debt, under the commission.

The priority of the United States is to be maintained in this case, unless some of the creditors can show a title to the property anterior to the time when this priority attaches.

The assignment made to Richard Harrison is, it is contended, such a title.

To this assignment several objections have been made.

1. It is said that Robert Bird was not authorized to make it, because it is not a transaction within the usual course of trade. But this court is of opinion that it is such a transaction. The whole commercial business of the company in the United States was necessarily committed to Robert Bird, the only partner residing in this country. He had the command of their funds in America, and could collect or transfer the debts due to them. The assignment under consideration is an act of this character, and is within the power usually exercised by a managing partner. In such a transaction he had a right to sign the name of both firms, and his act is the act of all the partners.

2. It is the assignment of a chose in action; and is, therefore, to be considered rather as a contract than an actual transfer, and could be of no validity against the several claimants in this case.

The authorities cited at bar, especially those from 1 Atk., and Williams's Law Cases, are conclusive on this point, to prove that equity will support an equitable assignment.

3. But a third exception has been taken to this instrument, which the court deems a substantial one. *It is made under cir- [*301 cumstances which expose it to the charge of being a fraud on the bankrupt laws.

Considered as the act of Bird, Savage & Bird, it is dated but a few days before their bankruptcy; and considered as the act of Robert Bird & Co., it is but a short time before they stopped payment, and is made at a time when there is much reason to believe, from the face of the deed, as well as from extrinsic circumstances, that such an event was in contemplation.

Money actually advanced upon the credit of this assignment, subsequent to its date, might perhaps be secured by it; but there is no evidence that any money was actually advanced upon it, and the face of the instrument itself would not encourage such an opinion. It might be caught at by those who were already creditors, but holds forth no inducements to become creditors. It was impossible for any person viewing it to judge of the sufficiency of the fund, or of the pre-existing liens on it.

This assignment, therefore, under all its circumstances, many of which are not here recited, is no bar to the claim of the United States, or of the attaching creditors.

This being the case, there exists no obstacle to the priority claimed by the United States, and their debt is to be first satisfied out of the fund to be distributed by the court.

2. The attaching creditors are next in order.

By the bankrupt law of the United States, their priority, as to the funds of the bankrupt, is lost. They can only claim a dividend with other creditors. So far, then, as the effects attached are the effects of the bankrupt, their lien is removed by the bankruptcy.

Robert Bird alone has become a bankrupt under *the laws of the United States. [*302 Consequently, only his private property and his interest in the funds of the company pass to his assignees. This interest is subject to the claim of his copartners, and if, upon a settlement of accounts, Robert Bird should appear to be the creditor or the debtor of the company, his interest would be proportionably enlarged or diminished. But he is not alleged to be either a creditor or a debtor; and of consequence, the court consider his interest as being one undivided third of the fund. This third goes to the assignees.

As the bankrupt law of a foreign country is incapable of operating a legal transfer of property in the United States, the remaining two-thirds of the fund are liable to the attaching creditors, according to the legal preference obtained by their attachments.

The court thinks it equitable to order that those creditors who claim under the deed of the 31st of January, 1803, and who have not proved their debts under the commission of bankruptcy, should be now admitted to the same dividend out of the estate of the bankrupt as they would have received if, instead of relying on the deed, they had proved their debts. The assignees, therefore, take this fund subject to that equitable claim, and in making the dividend, those creditors are to receive, in the first instance, so much as will place them on an equal footing with the creditors who have proved their debts under the commission.

With respect to any surplus which may remain of the two-thirds, after satisfying the United States, and the attaching creditors, it ought to be divided equally among all the creditors, so as to place them on an equal footing with each other. The dividends paid by the British assignees, and those made by the American assignees, being taken into consideration, this residuum is to be so divided between them as to produce equality between the respective creditors.

303*] *BROWNE AND OTHERS v. STRODE.

The courts of the United States have jurisdiction in a case between citizens of the same state, if the plaintiffs are only nominal plaintiffs for the use of an alien.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, the judges of that court being divided in opinion upon the question whether they had jurisdiction of the case.

It was an action on a bond given by an executor for the faithful execution of his testator's will, in conformity with the statute of Virginia. The object of the suit was to recover a debt due from the testator in his life-time to a British subject. The defendant was a citizen of Virginia. The persons named in the declaration as plaintiffs were the justices of the peace for the county of Stafford, and were all citizens of Virginia.

The question being submitted without argument,

The Court ordered it to be certified, as their opinion, that the court below has jurisdiction in the case.

HODGSON AND THOMPSON v. BOWERBANK AND OTHERS.

Although the plaintiff be described in the proceedings as an alien, yet the defendant must be expressly stated to be a citizen of some one of the United States. Otherwise the courts of the United States have not jurisdiction in the case.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland. The defendants below were described in the record as "late of the District of Maryland, merchants," but were not stated to be citizens of the state of Maryland. The plaintiffs were described as "aliens and subjects of the king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

Martin contended, that the courts of the United *States had not jurisdiction, it [*304 not being stated that the defendants were citizens of any state.

C. Lee, contra. The judiciary act gives jurisdiction to the circuit courts in all suits in which an alien is a party. (Laws U. S., vol. 1, p. 55, § 11.)

MARSHALL, Ch. J. Turn to the article of the constitution of the United States, for the statute cannot extend the jurisdiction beyond the limits of the constitution.

(The words of the constitution were found to be "between a state, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.")

The court said the objection was fatal.

The record was afterwards amended by consent.

KEENE v. THE UNITED STATES.

The trial of seizures under the act of the 18th February, 1793, "for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," is to be in the judicial district in which the seizure was made; without regard to the district where the forfeiture accrued.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, in a case of seizure of certain merchandise, being part of the cargo of the schooner Sea Flower, Matthew Keene, claimant, imported from the Havanna, in the island of Cuba, into the port of Vienna, in the District of Maryland, the vessel having sailed on a foreign voyage under a coasting license. The goods having been landed at Vienna, were transported to Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, where they were seized by the collector of that port, and libeled and condemned in the District Court of that district, whose sentence was affirmed by the Circuit Court.

Swann and Martin, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

That there was no law which authorized the 305] seizure, *or the trial and condemnation out of the district into which the goods had been first imported.

The goods were condemned under the 8th section of the act of Congress, "for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793, (vol. 2, p. 174), which enacts, "that if any ship or vessel, enrolled or licensed as aforesaid, shall proceed on a foreign voyage without first giving up her enrollment and license to the collector of the district comprehending the port from which she is about to proceed on such foreign voyage, and being duly registered by such collector, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods, wares and merchandise so imported therein, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture."

By this act the forfeiture arises upon importation. The importation was complete at Vienna, in the District of Maryland, where only the trial can be lawfully had.

By the 35th section of the act, it is enacted, "that all penalties and forfeitures which shall be incurred by virtue and force of this act, shall and may be sued for, prosecuted and recovered in like manner as penalties and forfeitures incurred by virtue of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,' may be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, and shall be appropriated in like manner."

There is no act in the statute book with such a title. The only act then in force regulating the collection of duties on goods imported, and on tonnage, was the act of August 4, 1790, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on 306] goods, wares and merchandise, *imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels."

By the 67th section of this act, it is enacted, "that all penalties accruing by any breach of this act shall be sued for, with costs of suit, in the name of the United States of America, in any court proper to try the same, and the trial of any fact which may be put in issue, shall be within the judicial district in which any such penalty shall have accrued; and the collector, within whose district the seizure shall be made, is hereby authorized and directed to cause suits for the same to be commenced and prosecuted to effect, and to receive, distribute and pay the sum or sums recovered, after first deducting all necessary costs and charges, according to law. And that all ships or vessels, goods, wares or merchandise, which shall become forfeited by virtue of this act, shall be seized, libeled and prosecuted as aforesaid in the proper court having cognizance thereof," &c.

Here the words "as aforesaid" refer to the trial of the fact in the judicial district where the forfeiture was incurred.

This provision is also analogous to that contained in the 8th amendment of the constitution of the United States, which provides for the trial of all offenses in the state and district where they were committed.

The property could not lawfully be seized out of the district of Vienna, unless by the collector of that port. But if the collector of Alexandria had a right to seize it, he ought to have sent it back to the District of Maryland for trial.

Congress need not have recited the title of the act to which they intended to refer, but having undertaken to do so, and not having recited it truly, it is as if no mode of trial had been provided; so *that there is no court compe- [307 tent to condemn the property.

Rodney, Attorney General of the United States, contra.

The act referred to in the 35th section of the act of the 18th of February, 1793, is the act of the 31st of July, 1789, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares and merchandises imported into the United States." This act is not in the common edition of the laws, having been repealed by the act of the 4th August, 1790; but it is found in Oswald's edit. of the Laws, (vol. 1, p. 25.)

The title contains precisely the same words with the title recited in the 35th section of the act of the 18th of February, 1793. They are a little transposed, but the sense is the same. Whereas the title of the act of the 4th August, 1790, varies very essentially from the title recited. It is "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties," &c.

It is no objection that the act of the 31st of July, 1789, was repealed before the act of the 18th of February, 1793, was passed. It remained in the statute book, and answered every purpose of reference as to the mode of recovering forfeitures, as well as if it had remained in force as a law respecting the collection of duties. It was referred to merely to prevent the necessity of transcribing its provisions respecting a particular subject.

But even the act of the 4th of August, 1790, section 67, does not require the trial of forfeitures to be in the district where the cause of forfeiture arose. It only declares that in actions for penalties (not in suits for forfeitures), "the trial of any fact which may be put in issue, shall be within the judicial district in which such penalty shall have accrued." But when it speaks of forfeitures, it says the goods, &c., *"shall be seized, libeled and pros- [308 ecuted as aforesaid, in the proper court having cognizance thereof;" which are precisely the same words with those contained in the 36th section of the act of the 31st of July, 1789.

It was not necessary by the common law that prosecutions on penal laws should be in the counties where the offenses were committed. (3 Inst., 194.) And the stat. of 21 Jac., c. 4, making it necessary in general cases, does not apply to revenue cases. (1 Anst., 220, 221.) In such cases, when the proceedings are in rem, the place of seizure always designates the place of trial; and the thing must always be within the jurisdiction and power of the court where the trial is had, otherwise it can neither enforce a sale after condemnation, nor restore the goods upon a decree of restitution. It is said that the collector of Alexandria ought to have sent the goods back to the District of Maryland, for trial. But at whose risk and expense should they be transported? No provision is made by law for such a case. If he had sent the goods back to Maryland, and upon trial they had been acquitted, would the government take the risk and expense of retransportation to Alexandria? Nothing could be more unreasonable and inconvenient.

But if the act of the 18th of February, 1793, refers neither to the act of July 31, 1789, nor to that of the 4th of August, 1790, there is no mode of prosecution particularly specified in the act of 1793, and the question of jurisdiction must be decided by the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, the 9th section of which enacts that the district courts of the United States shall have exclusive original cognizance of all seizures under the laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on certain waters, or on land, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas.

The collector of Alexandria not only had a 309] *right, but it was made his duty to seize the goods under the 70th section of the collection law of 1799. (Vol. 4, p. 390.) But whether the collector had a right to seize or not, the seizure having been made, it was the duty of the court to take cognizance of it.

March 15. LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

This is a seizure on land, by the collector of the port of Alexandria, for a breach of the act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same, passed 18th February, 1793.

The breach alleged is, that a certain schooner called the Sea Flower, duly enrolled and licensed, sailed to a foreign port, without having first given up her enrollment and license, and without being duly registered. That, on her return voyage, there were imported in the said schooner, from the Havanna into the port of Vienna, in the District of Maryland, certain goods, and thence transported to the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, and within the collection district of Alexandria. The goods were condemned by the Circuit Court, and the only error relied on is, that there is no law authorizing a condemnation in a district different from that in which the forfeiture accrued.

The 35th section of the act under which the seizure was made, declares that all penalties, incurred thereby, shall be sued for in the same manner as penalties incurred by virtue of an act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares and merchandises imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels."

On examining the different acts of Congress on this subject, there is none whose title exactly corresponds with the reference here made. It 310] is contended *by the counsel for the United States, that the act here intended, although it does not bear, in terms, the same title, is the one regulating duties, which passed the 31st of July, 1789, and that this does not render it necessary that the trial should be within the district where the forfeiture accrued; while the plaintiff insists that, as this act had been repealed several years prior to the passing of the law under which this seizure was made, it is more probable that a reference was intended to another act, on the same subject, of the 4th of August, 1790, which requires that the trial of any fact which may be put in issue shall be within the judicial district in which any penalty shall have accrued. It is not improbable that this was the law intended; but as the title of neither corresponds with the one given in this act, the court thinks that the proceedings on forfeitures accruing under it, may well be governed by the 9th section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, which confers, on the district courts, jurisdiction of all seizures under laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, when the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea, by vessels of ten or more tons burden, within their respective districts; and also of all seizures on land, or other waters, than as aforesaid made, and of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States. It is a fair construction of this section, taking the whole together, that nothing more is necessary to give jurisdiction in cases of this nature, than that the seizure should be within the district, without any regard to the place where the forfeiture accrued. It would, in many cases, be attended with much delay and injury, without any one advantage, were it necessary to send property for trial to a distant district, merely because the forfeiture had been incurred there. The court feels no disposition to impose these inconveniences on either of the parties, unless where it be positively directed by an act of Congress. There being no provision of that kind in the law under which this forfeiture accrued, the court cannot perceive any error in the proceedings below; and *therefore orders that [*311 the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed with costs.

THE UNITED STATES v. RIDDLE.

The law punishes the attempt, not the intention, to defraud the revenue by false invoices.

A doubt concerning the construction of a law may be good ground for seizure, and authorize a certificate of probable cause.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, which had affirmed the sentence of the District Court restoring certain cases of merchandise which had been seized by the collector of Alexandria, under the 66th section of the collection law of 1799 (vol. 4, p. 388), because the goods were not "invoiced according to the actual cost thereof, at the place of exportation," with design to evade part of the duties.

The goods were consigned by a merchant of Liverpool, in England, to Mr. Riddle, at Alexandria, for sale, accompanied by two invoices; one charging them at 67*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* the other at 132*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*, with directions to enter them by the small invoice, and sell them by the larger. Mr. Riddle delivered both invoices and all the letters and papers to the collector, and offered to enter the goods in such manner as he should direct. The collector informed him that he must enter them by the larger invoice, which he did. But the collector seized them as forfeited under the 66th section of the collection law of 1799, which enacts, "that if any goods, wares or merchandise, of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, shall not be invoiced according to the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties thereupon, or any part thereof, all such goods," &c., "shall be forfeited." The same section contains a provision for the appraisement of the goods by two merchants in case the collecter shall suspect that the goods are not invoiced at a sum equal to that at which they have been usually sold in the place from whence they were imported, 312] with a proviso *that such appraisement should not, upon the trial, be conclusive evidence of the actual and real cost of the said goods at the place of exportation.

Rodney, Attorney General for the United States, contended, that as the goods were invoiced lower than their actual cost, with intent to defraud the revenue, they were not invoiced according to their actual cost with the like intent, and the goods having been actually entered, although not by the fraudulent invoice, they were within the letter of the law, and ought to be condemned. Besides, it does not appear that the higher invoice was according to the actual cost.

Swann, contra.

The lower invoice was probably what the goods cost the consignor, who manufactured them. The higher invoice was what such goods were then selling for at that place.

But even if a fraud was contemplated, it was not carried into effect. No entry was made, nor attempted to be made by the consignee, upon the false invoice. It was made upon the true invoice, and in conformity with the directions of the collector.

In this case we hope there will be no certificate of probable cause. The conduct of the consignee has been fair and honorable in every respect. A doubt concerning the construction of a law is not "a reasonable cause of seizure."

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

The court thinks this case too plain to admit of argument, or to require deliberation. It is not within even the letter of the law, and it is certainly not within its spirit. The law did not intend to punish the intention, but the attempt to defraud the revenue.

313*] *But as the construction of the law was liable to some question, the court will suffer the certificate of probable cause to remain as it is. A doubt as to the true construction of the law is as reasonable a cause for seizure as a doubt respecting the fact.

Sentence affirmed.

HIMELY v. ROSE.

It is not necessary to take exceptions to the report of auditors, if the errors appear upon the face of the report. If the property, ordered to be restored, be sold, interest is not to be paid.

THIS was an appeal from so much of the final sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina, rendered upon the mandate from this court issued upon the reversal of the former sentence of that court (see ante, vol. 4, p. 292), as affirmed the report of auditors appointed by the court "to inquire and report whether any, and if any, what deductions are to be allowed for freight, insurance and other expenses which would have been incurred by the owners in bringing the cargo into the United States, and also to ascertain and report the interest to be paid by the claimant to the appellant," so far as that report allowed interest to the appellant, and disallowed the expense of insurance to the claimant.

This court, in reversing the former sentence of the Circuit Court, decreed as follows: that the Sarah and her cargo "ought to be restored to the original owners, subject to those charges of freight, insurance and other expenses which would have been incurred by the owners in bringing the cargo into the United States; which equitable deductions the defendants are at liberty to show in the Circuit Court. This court is therefore of opinion, that the sentence of the Circuit Court of South Carolina ought to be reversed, and the cause be remanded to that court in order that a final decree may be made therein conformably to this opinion."

*Upon receiving the mandate from [314 this court to carry its sentence of reversal into effect, the Circuit Court directed a reference to auditors in the terms above stated; and the auditors reported "that the claimant is not entitled to any insurance, but that he ought to be allowed freight on the cargo at the rate of one cent per pound for such of it as was in bags, and one and a half cent per pound for such of it as was in casks, and also the sum of 500 dollars for expenses incidental to the landing, wharfage, storage, &c., of the cargo, which sums being deducted from the amount of the decree, the claimant must pay the appellant two years' interest on the residue at the rate of seven per cent. per annum."

Martin and Jones, for Himely, the appellant.

After the express mandate of this court, directing the allowance of freight and insurance, the court below ought not to have referred it to auditors to say whether anything should be allowed for insurance.

The mandate was silent as to interest; indeed, as the proceeding was in rem, and the decree for restitution, interest could not have been given.

LIVINGSTON, J. Can this court take notice of these errors in the report, if no exception were taken in the court below?

Martin. There were no particular items to which an exception was necessary. The error appears palpably upon the face of the proceedings. And this court, in the case of Murray v. The Charming Betsy (ante, vol. 2, p. 124), decided, that exceptions are not necessary if the error appear upon the face of the report itself.

Besides, in an appeal from a sentence of a court of admiralty, the question of fact is opened as well as the question of law.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. Nothing is before this court but what is subsequent to the mandate. 315] Martin.* The auditors have allowed nothing for the expenses of the cargo at St. Jago de Cuba; Himely was as much entitled to those expenses, under the decree of this court, as to those incurred in this country.

C. Lee, contra.

There were no exceptions to the report in the court below. It was there regularly confirmed by that court, whose decree ought to be affirmed in this, unless the directions of the mandate have been counteracted in one or both the particulars of which the appellant complains.

The mandate left the claim of insurance open to be adjusted in the Circuit Court, and unless insurance was proved to have been actually made, nothing should be allowed on that account.

It is now to be presumed and taken as an admitted fact, that no insurance was made by the appellant.

The interest was properly allowed, unless good reason can be shown in equity why it should not be paid. According to modern usage in commercial controversies, interest is deemed an inseparable incident to the principal debt, the payment whereof is wrongfully delayed. This being the general rule, and the mandate being silent, the allowance of interest is unobjectionable. As the claimant was to have the benefit of equitable deductions, he ought to be subjected to equitable charges. He has had the use of the money, and the other party has lost the interest of it.

The freight and other charges, as well as the value of the cargo, having been amicably arranged by the parties, and there being no appeal as to them, they are not now to be the subject of inquiry or decision.

Upon the question of interest, Mr. Lee cited 3 Dal., 332, Hills v. Ross, and 4 Dal., 289, Crawford v. Willing and Morris.

316*] *March, 10. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

A decree having been formerly rendered in this cause, the court is now to determine whether that decree has been executed according to its true intent and meaning.

That decree directed "the cargo of the Sarah to be restored to the original owners, subject to those charges of freight, insurance and other expenses which would have been incurred by them in bringing the cargo into the United States."

In carrying this decree into execution, an allowance has been made for freight, and for expenses incurred at the port of importation; but no allowance has been made for expenses at the port of lading, nor for insurance. The appellants, too, were charged with interest on the money into which the cargo had been converted.

No exception having been taken to this report, it is now liable to those exceptions only which appear on its face.

So far as respects freight, and the expenses at the port of entry and delivery, the report must be considered as correct; but in those items of the claim which were disallowed, the error, if it be one, is apparent on the face of the proceedings, and may therefore be corrected.

The court has not considered the appellants as infected by the marine trespass committed by the captors of the Sarah and her cargo. Their operations commence with their purchase at St. Jago de Cuba; and the decree designed, and is thought to have been so expressed as to charge the owners with all the expenses which they would have incurred, had they made the purchase themselves. Had they *done [317 so, they must have incurred some expenses at the port of lading. Among these is certainly not to be estimated the price of the cargo; but any expense necessarily attendant upon the transaction, such as putting the cargo on board, may properly, under this decree, be charged to the owners.

It is obvious, too, that the owners, or the underwriters, if they represent the owners, had they been the purchasers, must have insured the vessel and cargo from St. Jago de Cuba to the United States, or must themselves have stood insurers; in which latter case, the risk is deemed equal to the insurance. The decree, therefore, formerly rendered by this court, is understood to have entitled the appellants to insurance,

The question of interest is more doubtful; but this court is of opinion that the appellants ought not to be charged with interest.

Restitution of the cargo was awarded. The property having been sold, the money proceeding from the sales is substituted for the specific articles. If this money remains in possession of the court, it carries no interest; if it be in the hands of an individual, it may bear interest, or otherwise, as the court shall direct. But it is not supposed that the party, to whom restitution is awarded, receives interest in such case, unless it be decreed by the court. This court did not decree interest; nor would interest have been decreed, in this case, had the particular fact of the sale been brought before them.

The circumstances of the case were such as to restrain the court from inserting in its decree anything which might increase its severity. The loss was heavy; and it fell unavoidably on one of two innocent parties. The court was not inclined to add to its weight, by giving interest in the nature of damages. The allowance of interest, therefore, in the court below is overruled.

The sentence of the Circuit Court is reversed.

*JOHNSON, J. When the mandate of [318 this court was received in the court below, auditors were nominated, by consent, to report what would be the usual mercantile allowance between the parties; and to state an account accordingly. Those auditors reported against the allowance of insurance, and in favor of interest. The supposition that the expense of transportation was not allowed, I am convinced, must be incorrect; for insurance and interest were the subject of the only two exceptions taken to their report. Upon hearing argument on these two exceptions, the court affirmed their report upon both these points, and I have since heard no reason to alter the opinion which I entertained on the argument below.

It is contended that the mandate of this court was peremptory as to the allowance of insurance, and did not sanction the charge of interest.

The words of the mandate so far as relates to these points are the following: "subject to those charges for freight, iusurance, aud other expenses, which would have been incurred by the owners in briuging the cargo iuto the United States; which equitable deductions the defendants are at liberty to show to the Circuit Court," &c. These words imperatively require two things; viz., that the deductions, to be allowed to Himely, should be equitable in their nature, and should be shown to the court. Upou what ground could an allowauce for iusurance have been deemed just or equitable? It could ouly have beeu upou Himely's having actually paid au insurance, which he was at liberty to show, or upon his having himself incurred that risk which would have been covered by iusurance. The fact was admitted that he had not insured, and as to having incurred any risk himself, I caunot understaud in what possible view he could have iucurred a risk, when this court has decided that if the property had been lost, he would have lost nothing. It was uot the property of Himely, it was the property of Rose; had it beeu sunk in the oceau, it would uot have been the loss of 319] Himely, it would have *been the loss of Rose; there can be no reason, then, why Rose, who ran all the risk, should be adjudged to pay an insurauce to Himely, who incurred no risk: but such is the effect of deducting it from the sum to be paid to Rose. After deciding that the property was not changed, that it still continued in Rose, and was never vested in Himely, I feel confused by the inquiry on what possible grouud the allowance for insurance can be sanctioned.

With regard to interest, the question is not so clear, but the difficulty does uot arise upon the abstract equity of the charge. In equity, iuterest goes with the principal, as the fruit with the tree. Rose is now to be considered as the rightful owuer of the property, and ought to have had the possession and use of it during the existence of this contest. But Himely, having given stipulation bonds, was, by the order of the District Court, admitted to the possession and use of it, added it to his capital, traded upou it, and made such profits and advantages of it as his skill or ingenuity suggested. Rose, in the mean time, was kept out of the use of it, aud lost those emoluments and mercantile advantages which might have resulted from the use of it. It was uot a case in which the property is locked up in a warehouse, or the proceeds thereof deposited in the hands of the register of this court, but a case in which the goods were, in fact, converted into money by the effect of the stipulation bond, and the use of it given to Himely, to the prejudice of Rose: there could, therefore, be no radical objection to the charge, on the ground of equity. Had the maudate issued to restore to the party a flock of sheep, or stock, or bonds bearing interest, it is presumed that it would have been construed to authorize the delivery of their uatural or artificial increase without any express words to carry them. But it is said that the mandate does uot expressly authorize this allowance. This is true; but it must be recollected that the mandate of this court enjoins the allowance of equitable deductions. Now a variety 320] of deductions *may be, in the abstract, equitable, but may lose that character by its being made to appear that ample compensation has been already made for them. It was in this light that the court below sustained the charge of interest: because having had the usufruct of the property concerning which those charges on his part, which merited the denomination of equitable deductions, were incurred, it appeared to the court in fact that he had been compensated in part for those advances by the use of the money. If this court had not made use of the terms equitable deductions, that court probably would not have thought itself sanctioned in doing what appeared so equitable between the parties.

March 15. Martin and Jones, for the appellant, moved to open the principal decree; and stated that they were prepared to show that this court had been misinformed as to the law of St. Domingo. That they had further arrêtes, or ordinances, of the French government explanatory of that upon which the sentence was founded; and showing that the seizure of the property was the exercise of a belligerent, not of a municipal right.

They contended that while the property remained out of the jurisdiction of the United States, it was lost to the libellants, and that Himely was entitled to a compensation for bringing it within their reach. That he ought to be reimbursed at least what he paid for the property.

C. Lee, contra.

The appeal as to the execution of the mandate gives no right to open the original decree.

No further order was taken in consequence of the motion.

*WELSH [*321
v.
MANDEVILLE AND JAMESSON.

This court will not compel a cause to be heard, unless the citation be served thirty days before the first day of the term.

YOUNGS, for the defendant in error, objected to the hearing of the cause at this term, the citation not having been served thirty days before the first day of the term. The service was on the 12th of January, and the first day of the term was the 6th of February.

E. J. Lee, contra, contended, that it was to be inferred from the case of Lloyd v. Alexander (ante, vol. 1, p. 365), that if the defendant appears within the thirty days, the court will hear the case; or they will hear the case, after the expiration of the thirty days, even if the party does not appear.

Youngs. The 22d section of the judiciary act (vol. 1, p. 62), requires that the defendant in error should have thirty days' notice by the service of the citation.

The citation is to appear on the first day of the term, consequently thirty days' notice must be by service of the citation thirty days before the first day of the court.

The Court refused to take up the case without consent, although thirty days had then (March 9, when the cause was called for hearing) elapsed since the service of the citation; and observed, that the case of Lloyd v. Alexander only decided that the court will not take up the case until thirty days have expired since the service of the citation; but it did not decide that the court would then take it up without consent.

322*] *RIDDLE & CO.

MANDEVILLE AND JAMESSON.

The indorsee of a promissory note, in Virginia, may recover the amount from a remote indorser, in equity, though not at law.
Equity will make that party immediately liable who is ultimately liable at law.
The remote indorser has the same defense in equity against the remote indorsee as against his immediate indorsee.
The defendant has a right to insist that the other indorsers be made parties.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in a suit in chancery, brought by Riddle & Co. against Mandeville and Jamesson, remote indorsers of a promissory note, dated March 2, 1798, at sixty days, for 1,500 dollars, drawn by Vincent Gray, payable to the defendants or order, and by them indorsed in blank. Upon its face it was declared to be negotiable in the bank of Alexandria. The note so drawn and indorsed was by Gray put into the hands of a broker who passed it to D. W. Scott for flour, which he sold for 1,200 dollars in cash, and paid the money to Gray. Scott passed it, without his own indorsement, to M'Clenachan in the purchase of flour, and M'Clenachan indorsed it to Riddle & Co., the complainants, in payment of a precedent debt; Gray failed to pay the note, and was discharged under the insolvent act of Virginia, upon an execution issued upon a judgment in favor of the complainants upon the same note. The complainants then brought a suit at law against the defendants upon their indorsement, and obtained judgment in the court below, which was reversed in this court, upon the principle that an indorsee cannot maintain a suit at law against a remote indorser of a promissory note. (1 Cranch, 290.) Whereupon the complainants brought the present bill in equity, which was decreed to be dismissed in the court below; that court being of opinion that there was no equity in the bill. From that decree the complainants appealed to this court.

The only facts stated in the bill were, that Gray made the note payable to the order of Mandeville and Jamesson, who put it in circulation. That it was afterwards delivered and transferred, for a valuable consideration, to 323] M'Clenachan, who, for a *valuable consideration, indorsed and transferred it to the complainants. That Gray failed to pay it, and was discharged from execution under the insolvent act, whereby the complainants were unable to recover from him any part thereof; in consequence of which the defendants became liable in equity to pay the same, but have refused so to do.

Among the interrogatories contained in the bill, it is asked "with what view was the note made and indorsed?" and whether one of the defendants did not, upon inquiry, declare that the note was good, and would be punctually paid?

The defendants pleaded the judgment at law in their favor in a suit brought upon the same note, in bar of the relief in equity.

To this plea the complainants demurred, and the court sustained the demurrer, and ruled the defendants to answer.

The answer states, that the note was indorsed by them for the purpose of being discounted at bank for the use of the collector's office, in which Gray was the chief clerk or deputy, and had the whole management of the business. That the defendants refused to indorse it until Gray promised to deliver to the defendants, as security, their bond to the United States, given for duties, to the amount of 1,168 dollars, which he never did, and they had to pay it. That they never received any value from any person for their indorsement; that they never gave circulation to the note, otherwise than by indorsing it and delivering it to Gray to be discounted at bank, for which purpose only they indorsed it. They deny that they ever made any contract with any person touching the note, and say they have no recollection of any conversation with any person respecting the note before it became due.

The deposition of D. W. Scott stated, that he gave 200 barrels of flour for the note, but before he *concluded the bargain, he [324 asked Jamesson, one of the defendants, if the note was good, and whether there was any objection to it, and informed him it was offered to him for flour. Jamesson told him it was a good note, and observed that whenever he saw the name of Mandeville and Jamesson on any paper he might be sure it was good. That Scott sold the note to M'Clenachan for 207 barrels of flour, but did not indorse it, and it was expressly agreed that he should not be answerable for it in any event.

The deposition of M'Clenachan stated, that before he would take the note of Scott, he informed Jamesson that he intended to deal for it, and inquired whether it was an accommodation note, or a note given upon a real transaction. Jamesson told him it was a real transaction note, and not an accommodation note, and that it would be punctually paid. The deponent further stated, that the complainants had released to him all claim on account of the note, and of the debt intended to be paid by the note; and that he had also been discharged under the bankrupt act.

These witnesses were objected to by the defendants as interested.

E. J. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error.

1. The court below did right in overruling the plea in bar.

Where, by the principles of law, a party has a right, but the forms of law do not give a remedy, a court of equity will grant relief.

(Mitf., 103.) And in some cases it has a concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of law. (Mitf., 108, 109; 3 Atk., 215; 1 Fonb., 204.)

2. The court below erred in dismissing the bill.

The plaintiffs are entitled to recover in equity against the defeudants. It was the intcn-
325*] tiou of the *defendants to make themselves responsible to any person who should be the holder of the paper. They intended it to be a negotiable instrument. This appears from the note itself, which is expressly made negotiable in the bank of Alexandria, and from the answer of the defendants, who state that they indorsed it for the purpose of being discounted at the bank. Their indorsement was intended to give credit to the uote. If they did not intend to become responsible, they were guilty of a fraud. The complainants, upon the credit of the note, granted iudulgence to M'Clenachan. The defendants were undoubtedly answerable at law to M'Clenachan. That liability was a chose in action which he had a right in equity to assign, although this court has decided that it was uot assignable at law. (1 Atk., 124; 1 Fonb., 201, 204; 1 Term Rep., 622.) In the case of Violet v. Patton, at this term, this court has decided that a person who indorses merely to give credit to the note, is liable at law to his immediate indorsee. If the complainants had brought a suit iu the name of M'Clenachan for their use against the defendants, a court of law would have protected the equity of the complainants. (2 Skin., 6, 7; 1 Term Rep., 622; Winch v. Keely, 4 Term Rep., 341.) And if in such a suit the defendants had a set-off against the complainants, Riddle & Co., a court of law would have allowed it. (2 H. Bla., 1271; Bottomly v. Brooke, 1 Term Rep., 621.) If a court of law will recognize and protect an equitable assignment, à fortiori will a court of equity. In the case of Harris v. Johnston (ante, vol. 3, p. 319), this court said that "the holder of a note may incontestably sue a remote indorser in chancery, and compel payment of it."

Youngs, contra, contended,

1. That the plea in bar ought to have been sustained. A judgment at law against a party in an equitable action of assumpsit, when all the facts are susceptible of proof at law, is conclusive against the jurisdiction of a court of chancery, if it ever had any. If a court
326*] of chancery and a court of law *have a concurrent jurisdiction, an election to proceed in one concludes the party from going into the other. If a person is under no legal obligation to pay money, a court of chancery cannot compel him. It can only enforce the performance of legal contracts, and where there is no contract at law, a court of chancery cannot make one. As no privity exists at law between the holder and a remote indorser, that privity cannot be created by a court of equity.

2. That the court below was correct in dismissing the bill.

The contract was usurious. A note for 1,500 dollars having only sixty days to run was sold for 1,200 dollars' worth of flour.

There was uo valuable consideration flowing to the defendants; and such a consideration alone can make au indorser liable even to his immediate indorsee.

The liability of the indorser is not a complete chose in action. A chose in action is a right of action. No right of action exists against an indorser of a promissory note, in Virginia, until it is ascertained that the money cannot be recovered from the maker. Until that time it is a mere possibility, which is not the subject of assignment even in equity. The liability of the indorser is not assignable under the statute, and cannot be made so by a court of equity.

In the case of a joint obligatiou by principal and surety, if the surety be discharged at law, he can never be made liable in equity, for his equity is equal to that of the obligee. (2 Wash., 136, Harrison v. Field.)

The note was indorsed by the defendants to be discounted at bauk. Gray committed a breach of good faith, an act of fraud, in sending it into the market.

*The complaiuauts can only claim as [*327 creditors of M'Clenachan. But they are no longer his creditors, having released him from the debt, according to his own deposition which they have produced.

If it should be compared to a letter of credit, it is a letter of credit to a particular person for a particular purpose. It is not like a general letter of credit.

Swann and C. Lee, on the same side.

The suit at law was decided against the complainants on account of a defect of right, not for want of a remedy at law.

The money in the hands of Gray was like any other property in his hands. If it had been a horse which Mandeville and Jamesson had transferred to M'Clenachan, with warranty, and M'Clenachan had sold the horse to the complainants, he could not have transferred to them the warranty of Mandeville aud Jamesson. No case can be found in which a suit in chancery has been maintained against a remote warrantor of personal property.

The complainants demand the whole amount of the note; but in equity they can claim only what they paid for it; and how much that was does not appear. The indorsers must sue each other in succession. No case can be found where a holder has recovered in equity against a remote indorser.

C. Simms, in reply,

In the case of Violet and Patton, this court has placed the liability of an indorser upon a much more correct principle than that of privity of contract. It was there decided that an indorsement was equivalent to a general letter of credit; if so, it enables anyone to recover upon it who has parted with his property upon the faith of it. If A gives a letter *of [*328 credit to C, and B afterwards also gives a letter of credit to C, A is not discharged from his liability because B is also liable.

What was said by the chief justice in the case of Harris v. Johnston, cannot be considered as a mere dictum, but must be taken to be the delibcrate opinion of the court, for it is the only answer given to a strong argument urged by the counsel for Johnston to show that the outstanding note was no bar to a recovery upon the open account, viz., that the defendaut, being a remote indorser, could never be compelled to pay the note. The answer of the court was: "It is supposed that the holder of a note may incontestably sue a remote indorser in chancery, and compel payment of it." And during the argument of that case, when this idea was suggested by Mr. Jones, the chief justice said: "True; we shall consider that point. I have always been of opinion that in such cases a suit in chancery can be supported; though I do not recollect any case in which the point has been decided." When, therefore, the chief justice afterwards, in delivering the opinion of the court, repeats the same idea in stronger terms, it must be supposed that the point had been well considered, and that he spoke the opinion of the whole court.

March 13. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit is brought by the holder of a promissory note to recover its amount from a remote indorser. In a suit between the same parties, this court had previously determined that the plaintiff was without remedy at law. It is now to be decided whether he is entitled to the aid of a court of equity.

If, as was stated by the counsel for the defendants, the question is, whether a court of chan-329*] cery *would create contracts into which individuals had never entered, and decree the payment of money from persons who had never undertaken to pay it, the time of this court has been very much misapplied indeed in attending to the laborious discussion of this cause. The court would, at once, have disclaimed such a power, and have terminated so extraordinary a controversy.

But the real questions in the case are understood to be, whether the plaintiffs, as indorsees of a promissory note, have a right, under the laws of Virginia, to receive its amount from the indorser on the insolvency of the maker; whether the defendants, as the original indorsers of the note, are ultimately responsible for it; and whether equity will decree the payment to be immediately made, by the person ultimately responsible, to the person who is actually entitled to receive the money.

This note came to the hands of M'Clenachan, indorsed in blank by Mandeville and Jamesson. M'Clenachan had a right to fill up the indorsement to himself, and he has done so. The law, as understood in Virginia, immediately implied an assumpsit from Mandeville and Jamesson to M'Clenachan to pay him the amount of the note, if he should use due diligence, and should be unable to obtain payment from the maker. M'Clenachan indorsed this note to the plaintiffs, and, by so doing, became liable to them in like manner as Mandeville and Jamesson were liable to him.

The maker having proved insolvent, the plaintiffs have a legal right to claim payment from M'Clenachan, and, on making that payment, M'Clenachan would be re-invested with all his original rights in the note, and would be entitled to demand payment from Mandeville and Jamesson.

If there were twenty successive indorsers of a note, this circuitous course might be pursued, 330*] and, *by the time the ultimate indorser was reached, the value of the note would be expended in the pursuit. This circumstance alone would afford a strong reason for enabling the holder to bring all the indorsers into that court which could, in a single decree, put an end to litigation. No principle adverse to such a proceeding is perceived. Its analogy to the familiar case of a suit in chancery by a creditor against the legatees of his debtor is not very remote. If an executor shall have distributed the estate of his testator, the creditor has an action at law against him, and he has his remedy against the legatees. The creditor has no action at law against the legatees. Yet it has never been understood that the creditor is compelled to resort to his legal remedy. He may bring the executor and legatees both before a court of chancery, which court will decree immediate payment from those who are ultimately bound. If the executor and his securities should be insolvent, so that a suit at law must be unproductive, the creditor would have no other remedy than in equity, and his right to the aid of that court could not be questioned.

If doubts of his right to sue in chancery could be entertained while the executor was solvent, none can exist after he had become insolvent. Yet the creditor would have no legal claim on the legatees, and could maintain no action at law against them. The right of the executor, however, may, in a court of equity, be asserted by the creditor, and, as the legatees would be ultimately responsible for his debt, equity will make them immediately responsible.

In the present case, as in that which has been stated, the insolvency of M'Clenachan furnishes strong additional motives for coming into a court of chancery. Mandeville and Jamessou are ultimately bound for this money, but the remedy at law is defeated by the bankruptcy of an intermediate indorser. It is only a court of equity which can afford a remedy.

*This subject may and ought to be [*331 contemplated in still another point of view. It has been repeatedly observed that the action against the indorser is not given by statute. The contract on which the suit is maintained is not expressed, but is implied from the indorsement itself, unexplained and unaccompanied by any additional testimony. Such a contract must, of necessity, conform to the general understanding of the transaction. General opinion certainly attaches credit to a note, the maker of which is doubtful, in proportion to the credit of the indorsers, and two or more good indorsers are deemed superior to one. But if the last indorser alone can be made responsible to the holder, then the preceding names are of no importance, and would add nothing to the credit of the note. But this general opinion is founded on the general understanding of the nature of the contract. The indorser is understood to pass to the indorsee every right founded on the note which he himself possesses. Among these is his right against the prior indorser. This right is founded on an implied contract, which is not, by law, assignable. Yet if it is capable of being transferred in equity, it vests, as an equitable interest, in the holder of the note. No reason is perceived why such an interest should not, as well as an interest in any other chose in action, be transferable in equity. And if it be so transferable, equity will of course afford a remedy. The defendant sustains no injury, for he may defend himself in equity against the holder as effectually as he could defend himself against his immediate assignee in a suit at law.

The case put, of the sale and delivery of a personal thing, is not thought to be analogous to this. The purchaser of a personal thing does not, at the time of the contract, look beyond the vendor. He does not trace the title. It passes by delivery. But suppose the vendor held it by a bill of sale containing a warranty of title, and should assign that bill to his vendee; is it clear that, on loss of the property for 332] defect of title, no recourse could *be had to the warrantor of that title? The court is not prepared to answer this question in the affirmative.

It is contended that the indorsee of the note holds it subject to every equity to which it was liable in the hands of the indorser.

If this be admitted, it is not perceived that the admission would, in any manner, affect this case.

It is also contended that the plaintiff can only recover what he actually paid.

Without indicating any opinion on this point, the court considers it as very clear that the indorsement is prima facie evidence of having indorsed for full value, and it is incumbent on the defendant to show the real consideration, if it was an inadequate one.

Usury has been stated in the argument, but it is neither alleged in the pleadings nor proved by the testimony.

It is urged that Mandeville and Jamesson are securities who have received no actual value, and that equity will not charge a security who is discharged at law. In support of this argument the case of a joint obligation is cited.

It is true, that, in the case of a joint obligation, the court has refused to set up the bond against the representatives of a security. But, in that case, the law had absolutely discharged them. In this case, Mandeville and Jamesson are not discharged. They are not released from the implied contract created by the indorsement. It is the legal remedy which is obstructed; the right is unimpaired, and the original obligation is in full force.

It is, then, the opinion of this court that, without referring to the depositions to which exceptions have been taken, a right exists in the 333] holder of a promissory *note, at least where he cannot obtain payment at law, to sue a remote indorser in equity.

Certainly, in such a case, the defendant has a right to insist on the other indorsers being made parties, but he has not done so; and, in this case, the court does not perceive that M'Clenachan is a party so material in the cause that a decree may not properly be made without him.

The decree is reversed, and the defendants directed to pay the amount of the note to the plaintiffs.

The decree of the court was as follows:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the court is of opinion, that the decree of the said Circuit Court, dismissing the bill of the plaintiffs, is erroneous, and ought to be reversed; and this court doth reverse the same; and this court, proceeding to give such decree as the said Circuit Court ought to have given, doth decree and order, that the defendants pay to the plaintiffs the sum of 1,500 dollars, that being the amount of the note in the bill mentioned, together with interest thereon from the time the same became due.

DULANY v. HODGKIN.

The indorser of a promissory note, who indorses to give credit to the note, and who is counter-secured by property pledged, is not liable upon the note, nor in an action for money had and received, unless the plaintiff show that the maker is insolvent, or that he has brought suit which has proved fruitless. It is not sufficient to show that the maker of the note is out of the reach of the process of the court.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of assumpsit by the indorsee of a promissory note against his immediate indorser. The note was made by Wellborn, on the first of January, 1806, for 200 dollars, payable to Hodgkin or order 120 days after date, negotiable at the bank of Alexandria. On the *trial, the [334 plaintiff did not produce any evidence of a suit against the maker, nor evidence of his insolvency, but proved that the maker never was an inhabitant of the District of Columbia, but resided in Albemarle county, in the state of Virginia; whereupon the court, upon the prayer of the defendant, instructed the jury that it was still necessary for the plaintiff to prove, to the satisfaction of the jury, that he had brought suit upon the note against the maker, or that a suit against him would have been fruitless, before he could resort to the indorser. To which instruction the plaintiff excepted.

The plaintiff also excepted to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that at the time the note was given, it was indorsed by the defendant with a view of giving credit to the maker with the plaintiff, and that it was so understood; and if they should be further satisfied by the evidence, that the maker left in the hands of the defendant funds to pay the note, or otherwise counter-secured him for becoming indorser of the note, the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action, although the maker should not be proved to have been insolvent before the note became due.

The declaration contained two counts; one upon the note, the other for money had and received.

The case was submitted, without argument, to the court, who, after inspecting the record, on the next day,

Affirmed the judgment, with costs.

*YEATON v. FRY. [335.

If the insurance be "against all risks, blockaded ports and Hispaniola excepted," a vessel sailing ignorantly for a blockaded port is covered by the policy.

The exception is not of the port, but of the risk of capture for breaking the blockade.

Copies of the proceedings in the vice-admiralty court of Jamaica are admissible in evidence when certified under the seal of the court by the deputy registrar, who is certified by the judge of the court, who is certified by a notary public.

Depositions, taken under a commission issued at the instance of the defendant, may be read in evidence by the plaintiff, although the plaintiff had not notice of the time and place of taking the same.

A vessel sailing ignorantly to a blockaded port, is not liable to capture under the law of nations.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, in an action on the case upon a policy of insurance on the brig Richard, at and from Tobago to one or more ports in the West Indies, and at and from thence to Norfolk. The following clause was inserted in the body of the policy. "This insurance is declared to be made against all risks, blockaded ports and Hispaniola excepted." And at the foot of the policy was the following memorandum: "Warranted by the assured free from any charge, damage or loss, which may arise in consequence of seizure or detention of the property, for or an account of illicit or prohibited trade."

On the trial of the general issue, four bills of exception were taken in the court below by the plaintiff in error.

1. The first was to the admission in evidence of certain copies of the proceedings and decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Jamaica, ordering a sale to pay the salvage of the brig. The copies were authenticated by the following certificates, viz.: "Jamaica, ss. I, Adam Dolmage, Esq., deputy of Owsley Rowley, Esq., chief registrar and scribe of the acts, causes and businesses of the court of vice-admiralty within the said island, duly constituted, appointed and sworn, do hereby certify and make known to all whom it doth or may concern, that the several sheets of paper writing hereunto annexed, in number fifteen, and marked or numbered from No. 1 to No. 15, inclusive, do contain a true copy and transcript of certain process and proceedings, had, moved, and prosecuted to interlocutory decree in the said court, in a certain cause therein lately depending, entitled, "Brig Richard, Jacobs, master." In which cause Benjamin Jacobs hath duly 336] *filed his claim thereto in the said court; and I further certify, that I have carefully compared and examined the same with the originals remaining of record in my office.

"In faith and testimony of the truth whereof, I, the said Adam Dolmage, have hereunto set my hand; and the seal of the said Court of Vice-Admiralty hath been caused to be hereunto affixed in the city of Kingston, in the said island, the seventh day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seven.

"ADM. DOLMAGE,
"Dep. Reg. Vic. Cur. Adm."

"Jamaica, ss. I, Henry John Hinchliffe, Esq., judge and commissary of the Court of Vice-Admiralty, in the island of Jamaica, do hereby certify and make known to all whom it may concern, that Adam Dolmage, Esq., who has signed and attested the certificate hereunto annexed, is deputy registrar of the said court of vice-admiralty, and that to all acts and instruments by him signed and attested, in such his capacity, due faith and credit is and ought to be given in judgment, court, and without. In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the court of vice-admiralty aforesaid to be affixed, this sixteenth day of September, 1807.

(Seal.) "HENRY JOHN HINCHLIFFE."

"Jamaica, ss. I, Robert Robertson, secretary, and notary public, of this, his majesty's island of Jamaica, duly admitted, allowed and sworn, dwelling in the city of Kingston, in the county of Surrey, and island aforesaid, do hereby certify and make known to all whom these presents may concern, that Henry John Hinchliffe, Esq., by whom the annexed certificate is signed, is judge and commissary of the Court of Vice-Admiralty of the island of Jamaica aforesaid, and that to all acts and instruments in writing by him, the said Henry John Hinchliffe, Esq., attested, due faith and credit is and ought to be given. In testimony whereof, I, the said notary, have hereunto *affixed [337 my hand and seal of office, at Kingston aforesaid, this fifth day of October, Anno Domini, one thousand eight hundred and seven.

(Seal.) "ROB. ROBERTSON,
"Sec. and N. Pub."

It was further testified by competent witnesses, examined upon oath by the court, that the said Henry J. Hinchliffe, in the year 1804, publicly sat as a judge of, and held the Court of Vice-Admiralty in Jamaica, and in that capacity condemned the vessel of one of the witnesses, who, in the island of Jamaica, received from his proctor a copy of the proceedings in the said court in his cause, which copy was authenticated in the same manner as the paper now offered in evidence, and under a similar seal; and that upon producing that copy to the underwriters in Alexandria and in Philadelphia, the loss was paid without delay. That similar papers, purporting to be copies of proceedings in the same Court of Vice-Admiralty in other cases, had been received in this country by other persons, and had been considered by both insurers and insured as authentic papers, and losses had been paid thereon; and that the present paper was shown to the defendant, who did not object to its authentication, but refused to pay the loss for other reasons. But neither of the witnesses had ever seen the judge write, nor the act of affixing the seal of the court to any paper.

2. The second bill of exceptions stated, in substance, that the defendant (the plaintiff in error) prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if at the time the brig Richard sailed from Tobago for Curracoa, the latter island was actually blockaded, and the brig turned away by the blockading force, and afterwards lost, without again attempting to enter Curracoa, and in the prosecution of her voyage to Norfolk, the plaintiff below was not entitled to recover, although no official notification of such blockade was ever published, and although the master of the brig was ignorant of such blockade *until he met with the blockading force. [338 Which instruction the court refused to give.

3. The third bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiff below offered to read in evidence certain depositions taken in Tobago, under a commission issued at the instance of the defendant, and the court, being satisfied that the plaintiff's attorney had agreed to receive, and did receive and transmit to the plaintiff, notice of the time and place of taking such depositions, suffered the plaintiff to read them in evidence to the jury.

4. The fourth bill of exceptions was to the opinion of the court given to the jury at the request of the plaintiff, that if at the time the brig sailed from Tobago for Curracoa the latter island was not a blockaded port by notification of the British government to the American nation, but was blockaded in fact, and if the master was ignorant of such blockade until he was warned off by the blockading force, and being so warned he did not again attempt to enter the blockaded port, but changed his course intending to come directly to Norfolk, and in the prosecution of such voyage to Norfolk was captured by a French crusier, and recaptured by an English vessel, carried into Jamaica, libeled, condemned and sold under a decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court of that island, then such sailing from Tobago for Curracoa, and from thence to Norfolk, was a lawful voyage within the meaning of the contract of insurance, and not within the exception in the policy, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover against the underwriters an indemnity for the loss sustained by such capture, recapture and sale.

Youngs, for the plaintiff in error, contended.

1. That blockaded ports were absolutely excepted from the policy, and, consequently, there was no insurance if the vessel sailed for a blockaded port. The exception amounts to a warranty that the vessel shall not sail for a 339] blockaded port; and the insured *takes upon himself the chance of the port being blockaded. (Park, 322, 367, Kenyon v. Berthon.)

2. That the copy of the proceedings of the Court of Vice-Admiralty, at Jamaica, was not sufficiently authenticated to be admitted in evidence. The act of Congress does not designate any mode of authentication of foreign papers, but has left that subject entirely to the state legislatures. As the court below was sitting at Alexandria, it ought to have been governed by the act of assembly of Virginia of December 8, 1792 (Revised Code, 168, fol. ed.), which requires, besides the attestation of a notary public, "a testimonial from the proper officer of the city, county, corporation, or borough where such notary public shall reside, or the great seal of such state, kingdom, province, island, colony, or place beyond sea."

In the case of Church v. Hubbart (2 Cranch, 238), this court said, that foreign judgments were to be authenticated, either by an exemplification under the great seal, or by a proved copy, or by the certificate of an officer authorized by law, which certificate itself must be properly authenticated. The proper authentication, under the laws of Virginia, is the testimonial mentioned in the act of assembly, or the great seal of the colony or island.

3. With regard to the depositions taken on behalf of the defendant, and which the plaintiff wished to use on the trial, they ought not to have been read for the plaintiff, because they had not been taken in such a manner as to authorize the defendant to use them against the plaintiff.

This court has determined that notice to an attorney at law is not such notice as is required by the act of assembly of Virginia, for taking depositions, and the attorney could not admit, or waive notice but upon record.

E. J. Lee* and C. Lee, contra, were [340 stopped by the court as to the first point.

2. As to the copy of the proceedings in the Court of Vice-Admiralty, they took a distinction between the proceedings of municipal courts and courts of the law of nations. The seals of courts of admiralty, in cases under the law of nations, are admitted in evidence without further authentication, because they are courts of the whole civilized world, and every person interested is a party. (1 Rob., 296, The Maria; Gilb. Law of Ev., 22, 23.) This was admitted by the counsel on both sides in the case of Church v. Hubbart, referred to by the opposite counsel.

Besides, these proceedings are authenticated in the manner provided by the 19th article of the British treaty of 1794.

Jones, in reply.

The exception in the policy was not intended merely to exclude the risk of attempting to enter a blockaded port, but excluded all risks if the vessel should sail for a port actually blockaded. The trade with a blockaded port is an illegal trade, and there is an express warranty at the foot of the policy against all losses arising from seizure for or on account of illicit or prohibited trade. The exception, therefore, must have been intended to provide for something else. Can it be contended that if the vessel had sailed for Hispaniola, the underwriters would have been liable for a loss, happening in any manner whatsoever? Yet blockaded ports and Hispaniola are equally excepted, and in the very same words. A voyage to such a port is as much excluded from the policy as a voyage to Hispaniola. The exclusion of particular ports amounts to a warranty that the vessel shall not sail to such ports; and if a warranty be not complied with, the underwriters are not bound, whatever may be the cause of the *non- [341 compliance, and whether the loss happened in consequence of such non-compliance or not. It is a condition precedent; and an innocent, an ignorant, or a compulsive violation of a warranty, however immaterial, avoids the contract of insurance. (Park, 318, 326, 363, 369; Marshall, 348, 354.)

March 13. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

The material question in this case grows out of an exception in a policy of insurance.

The plaintiff insured a specified sum on the brig Richard, belonging to the defendant, "at and from Tobago to one or more ports in the West Indies, and at and from thence to Norfolk;" and the insurance is declared to be made against "all risks, blockaded ports and Hispaniola excepted."

The Richard sailed from Tobago for Curracoa, which was then blockaded in fact, but the blockade was not known at Tobago when the vessel sailed, nor was it known to the captain until he was warned off by a British ship of war. He then sailed for Norfolk; but on his voyage was captured by a French privateer, by whom the vessel was plundered to a considerable extent, and ordered to St. Domingo for trial.

The question is, whether this risk comes within the exception contained in the policy.

The counsel has considered the exception as a warranty; but the court cannot so consider it. The words are the words of the insurer, not of the insured; and they take a particular risk out of the policy which, but for the exception, would be comprehended in the contract. 342] *What is that risk?

Policies of insurance are generally the most informal instruments which are brought into courts of justice; and there are no instruments which are more liberally construed, in order to effect the real intention of the parties, if that intention can be clearly ascertained.

In that part of the policy on which the present controversy depends, a few words are given, to which others must be subjoined in order to complete the sense, and give a full description of the risk against which the underwriters were unwilling to insure. These words are, "blockaded ports and Hispaniola excepted."

It is reasonable to suppose that a voyage to Hispaniola was not insured. The assured has notice of this, and if he sails for Hispaniola, the voyage is entirely at his own risk. Against the risks of such a voyage, whatever they may be, the underwriters will not insure. It is a specified place, excluded, by consent, from the policy. The perils attending the voyage are understood, whether they arise from the sea, or otherwise, and are all excepted. The motives for making the exception do not appear, nor can they be inferred from the instrument.

The plaintiff in error contends that the same reasoning applies, in its full extent, to the exception of blockaded ports; but the court does not think so.

Hispaniola is excepted absolutely from the policy; but other ports are within the terms of the voyage insured, if they be not blockaded. It is their character, as blockaded ports, which excludes them from the insurance. Their being excepted by this character is thought to justify the opinion, that it is the risk attending this character which produces the exception, and which is the risk excepted. The risk of a blockaded port, as a blockaded port, is the risk incurred by breaking the blockade. This 343] is defined *by public law. Sailing from Tobago for Curracoa, knowing Curracoa to be blockaded, would have incurred this risk, but sailing for that port, without such knowledge, did not incur it.

The underwriter had no objection to a voyage to Curracoa, other than might arise from its being blockaded. The dangers of the blockade, therefore, were the particular dangers which induced the exception, and it seems to the court that the exception ought not to be extended beyond them. If this be correct, the Circuit Court committed no error in refusing to give the opinion which was required by the counsel on this point.

The sentence in this case is sufficiently authenticated to be received as evidence. Being a court acting under the law of nations, its proceedings may be proved according to the mode observed in the present case; and were this doubtful, that doubt would be removed by the circumstance that it is the form stipulated by treaty.

The defendant is not at liberty to except to his own depositions, because he does not produce proof of his having given notice to the plaintiff. The admission of notice by the plaintiff is certainly sufficient, if notice to him was necessary, to enable him to use the defendant's deposition.

The fourth bill of exceptions depends on the principles stated by the court, in the first part of this opinion.

There is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and it is affirmed with costs.

*OWINGS [*344
v.
NORWOOD'S LESSEE.

In an action of ejectment between two citizens of Maryland, for a tract of land in Maryland, if the defendent set up an outstanding title in a British subject which he contends is protected by the treaty, and therefore the title is out of the plaintiff; and the highest state court in Maryland decides against the title thus set up; it is not a case in which a writ of error can lie to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is not "a case arising under a treaty." The judiciary act must be restrained by the constitution of the United States.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of Maryland, being the highest court of law and equity in that state, in an action of ejectment brought by the defendant against the plaintiff in error, both parties being citizens of Maryland, for a tract of land in Baltimore county, called "The Discovery," being part of a tract of land called Brown's Adventure, originally patented for 1,000 acres to Thomas Brown, in the year 1695, who conveyed to John Gadsby, who conveyed to Aaron Rawlins in 1703, who mortgaged in fee to Jonathan Scarth, a London merchant, by deed of bargain and sale, in 1706, with a proviso to be void upon payment of 800*l.* sterling, with interest, on the 13th of May, 1709. Scarth and his heirs were always British subjects resident in England, and never were in Maryland; but Scarth was charged with the quit-rents, in the Lord Proprietor's debt-books, up to the time of the revolution. Rawlins, however, by his will, in 1741, devised the land specifically to some of his children, without taking any notice of the mortgage. In 1732, Littleton Waters attached, and obtained judgment of condemnation against the land, for a debt due to him from Scarth, but never took out any execution upon the judgment; and by deed of lease and release assigned all his right in the land to the Baltimore company, under whom the plaintiff in error claims.

In October, 1794, Norwood obtained an escheat warrant to affect the tract called Brown's Adventure, upon suggestion of a defect of heirs of Brown, the original patentee. In June, 1800, he obtained a patent from the state founded upon the proceedings under that warrant, for 520 1-2 acres, being part of Brown's Adventure, with an addition of 26 acres of vacant land, and thereupon brought his action of ejectment against Owings. Upon the trial the original

345*] defendant, *in order to show an existing title out of the plaintiff, contended that the mortgage to Scarth was protected from confiscation by the British treaty of 1794, and was still a security for the money to the representatives of Scarth, who were proved to be still living in England. "But the court were of opinion that on the expiration of the time limited in the mortgage for the payment of the money, a complete legal estate of inheritance vested in the mortgagee liable to confiscation: and was vested in the state by virtue of the act of confiscation of October session 1780, (c. 45), and the act of the same session (c. 49), (to appoint commissioners), subject to the right of redemption in the mortgageor and his heirs, and that the British treaty cannot operate to affect the plaintiff's right to recover in this ejectment."

The verdict and judgment of the general court being affirmed in the Court of Appeals of Maryland, and being against the right claimed under the treaty, Owings sued out his writ of error under the provisions of the 25th section of the judiciary act (vol. 1, p. 63), which enacts, that a final judgment in the highest court of a state, in a suit "where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of a treaty, and the decision is against the right claimed under such clause of the treaty, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States."

Harper, for the plaintiff in error.

The question in this case is, whether Scarth's interest in the land was protected by the treaty of peace with Great Britain. By the fifth article of that treaty "it is agreed that all persons who have any interest in confiscated lands, either by debts, marriage settlements, or otherwise, shall meet with no lawful impediment in the prosecution of their just rights." The case of Higginson and Mein, decided by this court (ante, vol. 4, p. 415), was, in substance, the same as this. In both, the time of payment had passed before the confiscation; and the legal 346] estate *was in a British subject. The court in that case decided that the confiscation did not destroy the lien which the British creditor had in the land under the mortgage.

LIVINGSTON, J. Could the mortgageor, sixty or seventy years after the time of payment, maintain a bill to redeem?

Harper. The mortgagee never was in possession of the land; the lapse of time, therefore, would rather operate as a bar to foreclosure than redemption.

Ridgely, contra.

By the act of assembly of Maryland, passed at October session, 1780 (c. 45 and c. 49), all the property in that state belonging to British subjects, except debts, was confiscated and vested in the state, without inquest of office, or entry, or any other act to be done. The statute operated a complete change of property and possession.

This was not at that time a debt due to Scarth. Nearly a century had elapsed since the mortgage was forfeited. There was no covenant in the mortgage for payment of the money; no bond taken, or other evidence of a debt. Rawlins never took any measures to redeem, but abandoned the pledge as an absolute sale. It is a general principle in equity that the mortgageor shall not redeem if the mortgagee has been in possession twenty years after forfeiture of the mortgage. It was not necessary for Scarth to file a bill to foreclose; because the right to redeem was barred by his twenty years' possession. If Rawlins could not have redeemed in 1780, the estate was absolute in Scarth, and the confiscation was complete. There is no case in England, or Maryland, where the mortgagor has been permitted to redeem after twenty years, if no interest has been paid, or account kept between the parties. (Pow. on Mort., 152; 3 P. Wms., 287; 2 Atk., 496; 2 Vern., *418; 3 Bac. Abr., 655; 1 [347 P. Wms., 272; 15 Vin., 467.)

But if Scarth's heirs might avail themselves of the treaty, it is not competent for a third person to set it up. Or if it is, it will not give this court jurisdiction.

Johnson, Attorney General of Maryland, on the same side.

If the judgment below be not against a right claimed under the treaty, if it be not a case arising under the treaty, this court has no jurisdiction.

In this case Owings claims no right under the treaty. Scarth's right, whatever it may be, is not affected by the decision of this case. It is he only who could claim the benefit of the treaty. But he is not a party in the suit. It is, therefore, not a case arising under the treaty.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. There are only two points in this case.

1. Whether Scarth had such an interest as was protected by the treaty; and,

2. Whether the present case be a case arising under a treaty within the meaning of the constitution.

This court has no doubt upon either point.

The interest by debt intended to be protected by the treaty, must be an interest holden as a security for money at the time of the treaty; and the debt must still remain due.

The 25th section of the judiciary act must be restrained by the constitution, the words of which are, "all cases arising under treaties." The plaintiff in error does not contend that his right grows out of *the treaty. Whether [348 it is an obstacle to the plaintiff's recovery is a question exclusively for the decision of the courts of Maryland.

Harper, on the next day, having suggested to the court that he understood the opinion to be that this court had no jurisdiction to revise the decisions of the state courts, in cases where the construction of a treaty was drawn in question incidentally, and where the party himself did not claim title under a treaty, was about to make some further observations on those points, when

MARSHALL, Ch. J., observed, that Mr. Harper had misunderstood the opinion of the court, in that respect. It was not that this court had not jurisdiction if the treaty were drawn in question incidentally.

The reason for inserting that clause in the constitution was, that all persons who have real claims under a treaty should have their causes decided by the national tribunals. It was to avoid the apprehension as well as the danger of state prejudices. The words of the constitution are, "cases arising under treaties." Each treaty stipulates something respecting the citizens of the two nations, and gives them rights. Whenever a right grows out of, or is protected by, a treaty, it is sanctioned against all the laws and judicial decisions of the states; and whoever may have this right, it is to be protected. But if the person's title is not affected by the treaty, if he claims nothing under a treaty, his title cannot be protected by the treaty. If Scarth or his heirs had claimed, it would have been a case arising under a treaty. But neither the title of Scarth, nor of any person claiming under him, can be affected by the decision of this cause.

Harper. The opinion is more limited than I apprehended. But in this case the land is claimed as confiscated, and the question is, 349] whether the plaintiff's *title, by confiscation, is good under the treaty. The defendant has a good title against every body who cannot show a better. He has a right to protect himself, by showing that the plaintiff has no title. In order to do this, he insists that the title of the plaintiff is inconsistent with the treaty. He has a right to set up the treaty in opposition to the confiscating act of Maryland.

Martin, on the same side.

The reason of the clause in the constitution was, that there might be uniformity of decision upon all questions arising upon the construction of the constitution, and laws and treaties of the United States. In every case, the question concerning a treaty must come on incidentally. The intention was, that wherever a state court should decide against a claim, set up under the construction of a treaty, such decision should be examinable in this court.

This was the cotemporaneous exposition given to the constitution by the first Congress, convened under that constitution, and which was composed of a great number of the leading members of the convention by which the constitution was framed; and who must have well known what was the intention of that body in adopting that article.

The right of the plaintiff to recover in this suit, and the right of the defendant to retain the possession as against this plaintiff, depend upon the treaty.

The property having been once granted, the state could not again acquire the title but by escheat or confiscation. The court below decided, that it was not a case of escheat, because the heirs of Scarth were living. Whether the property was confiscated within the meaning of the treaty, is therefore the only remaining question upon the merits of the case. That question, however, is not before this court, until this court shall decide whether they are *competent to consider it in this case. [350 We consider the judiciary act as a correct exposition of the constitution in this respect, and that this is clearly a case within the provisions of the 25th section of that act.

This argument produced no alteration in the opinion of the court; and the Writ of error was dismissed.[1]

1. As this cause occupied a considerable portion of the time and talents of the courts and bar of Maryland, and as it decided several important points in that state, it is deemed not improper to give a short abstract of the case as it appears in the bills of exception.

Upon the trial, the defendant Owings took 10 bills of exception.

The 1st bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiffs offered in evidence a patent from the lord proprietor of Maryland to Thomas Brown, dated November 10, 1695, for a tract of land called Brown's Adventure, containing 1,000 acres. Also a patent from the state of Maryland to Edward Norwood, the original plaintiff in this action, dated 25th June, 1800, for a tract of land called "The Discovery," containing 520½ acres, included within the lines of Brown's Adventure. The defendant offered evidence that the heirs of Brown, the original patentee, were still living in Maryland. The defendant offered in evidence a deed from Brown to Gadsby, dated May 2, 1700, on which was an indorsement dated May 4, 1699, purporting to be a receipt for the alienation fine due to the lord proprietor. And the following "Memorandum: That the date of this was originally according to the date of the above receipt, but altered by consent of the provincial court and parties, to bring it within the act of assembly. "W. TAYLARD."

Whereupon the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they were of opinion that the indorsements were made at the request of Gadsby the grantee, and with his privity and consent, and that the deed with the indorsements was recorded for his benefit, and with his assent, then the indorsements are competent to be read in evidence to support the facts therein contained against the title of Gadsby to the lands in the deed mentioned. But the court was of opinion that the memorandum of Taylard "was not evidence, being an act done by the said W. Taylard without authority, and that the said deed was valid and operative in law to transfer the said land to the said Gadsby."

The 2d bill of exceptions states that, in addition to the above evidence, the plaintiff offered in evidence a deed from Gadsby to Barker, for 130 acres, part of Brown's Adventure, dated 10th of July, 1701. Also a deed from Gadsby to Aaron Rawlins of the residue of Brown's Adventure, dated 2d of October, 1703. Also a deed of mortgage in fee from Rawlins to Jonathan Scarth, dated the 13th of May, 1706. He also offered evidence that Barker and Scarth died before 1795, without heirs. Also an escheat warrant to the plaintiff, dated 28th of October, 1795, and a certificate of re-survey, and a patent thereupon to the plaintiff, dated 25th of June, 1800. The plaintiff also offered evidence, that the lands are truly located on the plats as directed by the plaintiff. The defendant offered evidence that the heirs of Brown were still living in Maryland; that Scarth's heirs are still living in England, and that he and his heirs were always British subjects, and always resided in England.

The court had directed the jury that if the heirs of Scarth were living in England at the passage of the acts of October session, 1780 (c. 45, c. 49, and c. 51), the warrant of escheat which issued to the plaintiff, issued without authority of law, but that a patent which issued on such a warrant came within the provision of the act of November session, 1781 (c. 20, s. 8), whereupon the defendant offered in evidence the valuation of the land so escheated by the plaintiff, and the sum by him paid into the treasury for the said lands on the 24th of December, 1799, and that the sum so paid was only two-thirds of the appraised value of the said lands so escheated, and prayed the direction of the court, that if the jury should be of opinion that the plaintiff had paid only two-thirds of the appraised value, he could not entitle himself to the benefit of the warranty contained in the act of November, 1781 (c. 20, s. 8). "But the court were of opinion, that if the jury should find the facts as stated, the said patent was good, valid and operative in law to pass the said land to the said Edward Norwood and his heirs, and so directed the jury, notwithstanding the said Edward Norwood had not paid more than two-thirds of the appraised value of the said land. The court considering the case of the said Edward Norwood as coming fully within the provision of the 8th sect. of the act of November session 1781, (c. 20), and that the two-thirds of the value of the said land

351*] *MOSS v. RIDDLE & CO.

A bond cannot be delivered to one of the obligees as an escrow.

Fraud consists in intention: and that intention is a fact which must be averred in a plea of fraud.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in an action of debt upon the joint bond of Welsh and Moss for the payment of money.

Welsh, who was the principal debtor, not being found in, and not being an inhabitant of, the District of Columbia, the suit abated as to him.

The defendant Moss, in his first plea, after 352] protesting *that he did not deliver to any person, unconditionally, as his act and deed, the writing in the declaration mentioned, 353] averred that he signed and *sealed the same, and delivered it to Joseph Riddle, one of the plaintiffs, as an escrow, to be his act and deed, on condition that the same should after-354] wards *be signed, sealed and delivered by some other friend of Welsh, which was not done, and so the said writing is void as to him the said Moss.

To this plea the plaintiffs demurred specially; 1st. Because a bond cannot be delivered to the obligee himself as an escrow; 2d. Because the plea does not state by what other friend of Welsh it was to have been executed; 3d. Because it did not state by whom the execution of the bond, by that other friend was to have been procured, leaving it uncertain whether the condition upon which it was to become the deed of Moss was to be performed by him, or by Riddle, or by Welsh; 4. Because the plea is repugnant, inconsistent and informal. The second plea, after protesting as in the first plea, avers, that Riddle came to the defendant and asked him whether Welsh had not applied to him, Moss, to be his security for a debt due to Riddle & Co.; to which Moss replied he had told Welsh he would not be security alone, but would join Welsh and some other friend of his as security for the debt, whereupon Riddle represented that the greatest confidence was placed in Welsh; that *the partnership of Riddle & Co. [355 was about to be dissolved; that Riddle would take care to keep that paper, if it was executed, in his dividend of the debts; that Welsh and Moss might sign the bond at that time, and some other person might sign it afterwards; that in regard to the debt he would look only to Welsh, and would also give Welsh a credit for goods, when he, Riddle, should open and commence business on his private and individual account. The plea further avers, that Moss being induced by that representation and promise, did sign, seal and deliver the writing, upon condition that some other friend of the said Welsh should also sign, seal and deliver the same, and not otherwise; which was never done. That Riddle did afterwards carry on trade and merchandise, on his own separate and individual account, but never afterwards credited Welsh with any goods or merchandise; "and so the said writing made and executed as was as much as the said Edward Norwood was liable to pay; to which last opinion, and to so much of the former opinion as declares the said patent to come within the provisions of the act of November, 1781 (c. 20, § 8), the defendant excepted.

The 3d bill of exceptions, in addition to the foregoing evidence, stated, that the defendant offered evidence of a judgment of condemnation of these lands upon an attachment from the provincial court in 1732, for a debt of 397*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* sterling, due from Scarth to one Littleton Waters. The plaintiff offered in evidence duplicate writs of attachment to other counties issued by Waters for the same debt, upon which sundry sums of money were attached and condemned in the hands of garnishees, amounting altogether to 226*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* sterling.

To show that the lands attached by Waters was the 386 acres located on the plats as being in the possession of the Baltimore Company, the plaintiff read in evidence the lord proprietor's old rent-roll, stating 870 acres to be in possession of Rawlins, and 130 in the possession of John Barker. And the last rent-roll stating 419 acres to be in possession of Scarth, and 386 in the possession of Charles Carroll & Co.; and the lord proprietor's debt-book for the year 1754 (being the oldest book of that kind remaining), which charges the Baltimore Company with the quit-rents of 386 acres and no more, and Scarth with 419; which charges were continued annually until the Revolution. And the defendant thereupon prayed the opinion of the court, that by virtue of the said judgment and attachment and condemnation by him given in evidence, a legal estate was vested in the said Littleton Waters in the said tract of land called Brown's Adventure. But the court were of opinion, and so directed the jury, that the said Littleton Waters did not acquire a legal estate in the said land by virtue of the said judgment, attachment and condemnation.

The 4th bill of exceptions stated the same facts, and further that the defendant read the act of assembly passed at November session 1797, (c. 119), and prayed the opinion of the court, that by virtue of that act the right of the state was so far vested in the persons possessing the land called Brown's Adventure under the condemnation aforesaid, that the plaintiff could not in virtue of his said warrant, certificate and patent, have any right or title to the said land; or, if any, then no more than the proportion or compensation to which a discoverer of confiscated property is entitled. But the court were of opinion that the right of the plaintiff to Brown's Adventure attached upon his obtaining the warrant of escheat, and that his right was saved and protected by the proviso in the 2d section of the said act of November 1797, (c. 119). And that the grant transferred to him the interest the state had in the land called "The Discovery" from the time of his obtention of his said warrant of escheat.

The 5th bill of exceptions states the same facts, whereupon the defendant prayed the opinion of the court, and their direction to the jury, that if the warrant of escheat which issued in this case, issued without authority of law, then the warranty contained in the act of November, 1781 (c. 20, § 8), did not operate to give title to the plaintiff, and that there can be no relation to a warrant which issues without authority of law, or to a certificate made in pursuance of such warrant.

But the court were of opinion, that the act of 1781 (c. 20, § 8), did secure to the plaintiff the said land so by him escheated on his paying two-thirds of the value of the said land, being what the plaintiff was liable to pay for the same as confiscated British property; and that the grant obtained by the plaintiff did operate to pass the land to him by relation from the date of the said warrant.

The 6th bill of exceptions also stated the same facts, and that the defendant thereupon prayed the court to direct the jury that if the said tract of land called Brown's Adventure belonged to a British subject at the time of passing the act for confiscating British property in the state of Maryland, and if no actual possession had been taken thereof by the said state or its agents, and no sale or disposition made thereof by the state to any person at any time before the treaty between the United States and Great Britain dated the 19th of November, 1794, took effect, the plaintiff could make no title thereto by his said warrant, certificate and patent.

But the court refused to give that direction to the jury, being of opinion that the state of Maryland, by their commissioners, was in possession of all British property within the limits of the said state, under and by virtue of the act of confiscaaforesaid is void as to him the said Robert Moss."

To this plea the plaintiff also demurred specially, for the causes stated in the first demurrer; and further, because the plea is multifarious, argumentative, and offers to put in issue a number of matters unconnected with the defense set up and immaterial in themselves.

The court below gave judgment for the plaintiffs upon both demurrers.

Before the judgment was entered by the clerk, the defendant below prayed leave to amend his first plea, by striking out the words "delivered to Joseph Riddle, one of the plaintiffs in this cause," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "placed in the hands of Joseph Riddle, one of the plaintiffs in this cause." But the court refused leave to make the amendment. To which refusal the defendant excepted.

Afterwards, and after the court had pronounced judgment in the cause, the defendant moved the court for leave to file an amended 356] plea, which was in *all respects like the 2d plea, except that it averred that Riddle stated it to be the rule of the plaintiffs to take specialties for their debts if they could be obtained, and that the bond was delivered to Riddle in the absence of the other plaintiff, and except also that the conclusion was as follows: "And so the said defendant saith that the said writing, made and executed as aforesaid, was obtained by deception and fraud, as aforesaid, as to him the said Robert Moss, and, by reason of the said deception, is void as to him the said Robert Moss; and this he is ready to verify." But the court refused to suffer the plea to be filed, being of opinion that it would be bad upon demurrer. To this refusal also the defendant took a bill of exceptions.

C. Lee and Swann, for the plaintiff in error.

The plea of escrow was good. An instrument may be delivered to one of the parties as an escrow. Pawling v. United States, in this court.

It was not delivered to the plaintiffs, but to one of them only. It was not delivered absolutely, but upon condition that it should also be executed by another person also.

The plea of fraud also was good. It is not necessary to aver fraud in a plea. If the facts themselves show fraud, it is sufficient. Anything that avoids the deed may be pleaded; and the conclusion, "and so the said writing is void," is proper and sufficient. It is not necessary to say it is not his deed. (2 Wils., 352, Collins v. Blantern.)

E. J. Lee and Jones, contra.

An instrument cannot be delivered as an escrow to a party who is to derive benefit under the deed. It must always be to a stranger. (Shep. Touch., 55, 56, 57; Hob., 246; 3 Bac. Abr., 320, 694; Esp. N. P., 221.)

The 2d plea is not a plea of fraud. It is an attempt *to set up as a discount or set- [357 off against a bond, an unliquidated claim for damages for breach of a promise.

The facts stated do not amount to fraud. Fraud consists in the intention, the quo animo, tion, October, 1780, (c. 45), and the act of the same session (c. 49), to appoint commissioners, &c. And that the possession of the said land was in the state of Maryland at the time the plaintiff obtained his escheat warrant; and that no British subject could hold land in the state of Maryland on the 19th of November, 1794, the time when the treaty was entered into between the United States and Great Britain.

The 7th bill of exceptions, in addition to the facts before mentioned, stated, that the defendant offered evidence that the heirs of Rawlins were still living in Maryland. That Rawlins, in the year 1741, made his will and devised Brown's Adventure by name to some of his children. That the heirs of Littleton Waters are still living in Maryland That the Baltimore Company, under whom the defendant claims, have been for fifty years past in the actual possession and use of the whole land called Brown's Adventure, by clearing and cutting the wood off the said land for their iron works, and claiming the said land; and that there has been no actual or mixed possesion of any part of the said land by Scarth, or by any person claiming under him, or by any person claiming adversely to the Baltimore Company. Whereupon the defendant prayed the court to direct the jury, that if they find the facts stated by the defendant to be true, and that no payment of principal or interest due on the said mortgage, or acknowledgement of the said mortgage, was at any time paid, made or done, on or after the 13th of May, 1709, the jury may and ought to presume the said mortgage satisfied before the year 1780, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. But the court were of opinion that the facts stated in the above case will not warrant the jury in presuming the said mortgage was satisfied before the year 1780, and refused to give the direction prayed.

The 8th bill of exception states the same facts, and that the defendant further prayed the court to direct the jury, that if the facts are found true as stated by the defendant, the act of confiscation of October session, 1780, (c. 45 and c. 49), vested no beneficial interest in the state of Maryland, in the lands in the mortgage from Rawlins to Scarth, but that the same, if it vested in the state under the act of confiscation, was liable to the equity of redemption in the heirs of Rawlins the mortgageor, and that by operation of the British treaty, so far as the mortgagee could claim an interest in the said mortgaged lands, the same was saved from confiscation by the said treaty, and, consequently, the lessor of the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

But the court were of opinion, that on the expiration of the time limited in the mortgage for the payment of the money, a complete legal estate of inheritance vested in the mortgagee liable to confiscation, and was vested in the state in virtue of the act of confiscation of October session, 1780, (c. 45), and the act of the same session (c. 49), to appoint commissioners, subject to the right of redemption in the mortgageor and his heirs, and that the British treaty cannot operate to affect the plaintiff's right to recover in this ejectment, and refused to give the direction prayed.

The 9th bill of exceptions, in addition to the same facts, states, that the defendant offered in evidence a lease and release from Littleton Waters to Benjamin Tasker and others, dated June 20 and 21, 1738, of so much of Brown's Adventure as, according to a valuation upon oath returned to the provincial court, would amount to 145*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* sterling, and thereupon prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they find the facts as stated by the defendant, the deeds of lease and release from Waters to Tasker and others conveyed a legal title in the lands therein mentioned; and that if a legal title did not pass, then the jury may and ought to presume a title in the said Tasker and others to the whole of an undivided 386 acres of land, being an undivided part of the 870 acres of land mortgaged to Jonathan Scarth, called Brown's Adventure. But the court refused to give the direction prayed.

The 10th bill of exceptions states, that upon the same facts the defendant prayed the court to direct the jury that as to all that part of Brown's Adventure contained in the deed from Waters to Tasker and others, under whom the defendant claims, the patent granted to the plaintiff does not give him a title thereto, or enable him to recover the same, which direction the court refused to give.

which is not averred in the plea; and fraud can never be presumed, especially if it be not averred. (1 Vent., 9, 210; 3 Bac., 320; 1 Fonb.)

March 13. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

It is admitted by the counsel in this case, that a bond cannot be delivered to the obligee as an escrow. But it is contended that where there are several obligees constituting a copartnership, it may be delivered as an escrow to one of the firm. The court, however, is of opinion that a delivery to one is a delivery to all. It can never be necessary to the validity of a bond that all the obligees should be convened together at the delivery.

Upon the other point the counsel for the plaintiff in error has insisted that the plea is sufficient.

But the court thinks it so radically defective as to be bad even upon general demurrer.

There is no allegation of fraud, and the circumstances pleaded do not, in themselves, amount to fraud.

Fraud consists in intention, and that intention is a fact which ought to have been averred, for it is the gist of the plea, and would have been traversable.

Upon what was the plaintiff below to take issue? Upon all the circumstances stated in the plea which are mere inducement, or upon the conclusion that "the bond is void?" If he had traversed the inducement, the issue would 358*] have been immaterial; *if he had traversed the conclusion, it would have been putting in issue to the jury matter of law.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

C. Lee suggested that there was also an exception to the refusal of the court to allow an amended plea to be filed, after the court had adjudged the pleas bad.

But the Chief Justice said that the court had, in an early part of this term,[1] decided that such refusal was no error for which the judgment could be reversed.

BRENT v. CHAPMAN.

Five years' adverse possession of a slave in Virginia, gives a good title upon which trespass may be maintained.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of trespass brought by Chapman against Brent, marshal of the District of Columbia, for taking in execution, on a fi. fa. against the estate of Robert Alexander, deceased, a slave named Ben, who was claimed by Chapman as his property.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon a statement of facts agreed by the parties, which was in substance as follows:

The slave was the property, and in possession of the late Robert Alexander the elder, at the time of his death. His sons, Robert Alexander and Walter S. Alexander, were named executors of his will, but never qualified as such. On the 17th of December, 1803, Walter S. Alexander took out letters of administration with the will annexed. No division was *ever [359 made, by the order of any court, of the personal estate of the deceased among his representatives; but previous to August, 1800, a parol division of the slaves was made between Robert Alexander the younger, and his brother, Walter S. Alexander, the latter being then under the age of twenty-one years. Robert Alexander the younger being possessed of the slave, and being taken upon an execution for a debt or debts due from himself in his individual character, in August, 1800, took the oath of insolvency under the laws of Virginia, and delivered up to the sheriff of Fairfax county, in that state, the slave as a part of his property included in his schedule. The sheriff sold him at public sale, and the plaintiff, knowing the slave to belong to the estate of the deceased Robert Alexander as aforesaid, became the purchaser for a valuable consideration, and took possession of the slave, and continued possessed of him under the sale and purchase until July, 1806. The plaintiff in the winter usually resided in Maryland, and in the summer in Virginia, on his farm, where he kept the slave, and has never resided in the District of Columbia.

Dunlop & Co. obtained judgment against Robert Alexander the younger, as executor of his father Robert Alexander, and, upon a fieri facias issued upon that judgment, the marshal seized and took the slave as part of the estate of the testator Robert Alexander, there being no other property belonging to his estate in the county which could have been levied except what Robert Alexander the younger had sold and disposed of for the purpose of paying his own debts. The agent of the creditors, Dunlop & Co., as well as the marshal, had notice, prior to the sale, that the plaintiff claimed the slave.

Upon this state of the case, the court below rendered judgment for the plaintiff according to the verdict. And the defendant brought his writ of error.

C. Lee, for the plaintiff in error, contended, that, *under the circumstances of this [360 case, five years' possession did not give a good title to Chapman. The possession was not adverse, for there was no administration upon the estate of Robert Alexander, Sen., consequently no person legally competent to claim the possession. Besides, Chapman knew that the slave belonged to the estate of the testator.

This debt was a legal lien on the slave.

Robert Alexander, Jun., could only transfer his right to the sheriff of Fairfax. The goods of the testator cannot be taken in execution for the debt of the executor. (4 T. R., 625, Farr v. Newman.) Chapman could therefore only purchase the right of Robert Alexander, Jun., in the slave.

The parol partition was void for the infancy of one of the parties. There was no executor qualified to assent to the legacy. By the law of Virginia, an executor cannot act until he has given bond. (1 Cranch, 259, Fenwick v. Sears; 3 Cranch, 319, Ramsay v. Dixon.)

It is very doubtful whether five years' possession of a slave in Virginia is itself a good title for a plaintiff. It may protect the possession of a defendant; and that is the only effect of the statute.

1.—See the case of Mandeville and Jamesson v. Wilson, at this term, (ante, p. 15).

Swann, contra.

Robert Alexander the younger did not hold the slave as executor of his father's will, but under the legacy.

It is immaterial whether Chapman did or did not know that the slave belonged to the estate of the testator. Five years' possession by Chapman was a good title against all the world.

In England twenty years' possession is a good bar in ejectment, and it is also a good positive title in itself, upon which an ejectment may be maintained.

361*] *MARSHALL, Ch. J. Can an executor distribute the estate before he has qualified and obtained letters testamentary?

LIVINGSTON, J. In England, an executor, before probate, can do everything but declare.

WASHINGTON, J., mentioned the case of Burnley v. Lambert (1 Wash., 308), in which it was decided, by the Court of Appeals of Virginia, that, "after the assent of the executor, the legal property is completely vested in the legatee, and cannot be devested by the creditors."

March 13. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

This court is of opinion that the possession of Chapman was a bar to the seizure of the slave by the marshal, under the execution stated in this case. The only objection of any weight was, that there was no administration upon the estate of Robert Alexander, Sen., and, consequently, that the possession of Chapman was not an adverse possession.

But there was an executor competent to assent, and who did assent, to the legacy, and to the partition between the legatees, and who could not afterwards refuse to execute the will.

Judgment affirmed.

AULD v. NORWOOD.

If the owner of a slave permit her to remain in the possession of A for 4 years, and A then without the assent of the owner delivers her to B who keeps her 4 years more, the possession of B cannot be so connected with the possession of A as to make it a fraudulent loan within the act of assembly of Virginia, in regard to B's creditors.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of detinue for a female slave named Eliza.

362*] Upon the *trial of the general issue in the court below, the plaintiff in error, who was defendant in that court, took a bill of exceptions, which stated that evidence was offered of the following facts: The slave, in November, 1798, was the property of John Dabny, against whom a fieri facias was issued at the suit of Norwood, the present defendant in error, upon which the slave was seized and sold by the proper officer; that one Charles Turner bought her for the said Norwood, and held her, as Norwood's property, until November, 1802, when he delivered her, without authority from Norwood, to one R. B. Jamesson, who held her until September, 1806, when he became insolvent under the insolvent act of the District of Columbia, and delivered her, as part of his property, to Auld, the plaintiff in error, who was appointed trustee under that act. This suit was commenced on the 19th of September, 1806.

Whereupon the plaintiff in error prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they found the facts to be as stated, the plaintiff below was not entitled to recover. And if the court should not think proper to give that instruction, that they would instruct the jury that the plaintiff's suffering the slave to remain out of his actual possession for so long a time was fraudulent in law as to the defendant. Which instructions the court refused to give, and the defendant Auld excepted. The verdict and judgment being against him, he brought his writ of error.

Swann, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

That it was to be considered as a loan of the slave to Turner; and that the possession of Jamesson, connected with that of Turner, made a period of more than five years, and, by the statute of frauds and perjuries of Virginia (P. P. 16), such possession transferred the property to the person in possession.

That statute declares that "where any loan of *goods and chattels shall be pre- [363 tended to have been made to any person with whom, or those claiming under him, possession shall have remained by the space of five years, without demand made and pursued by due process of law on the part of the pretended lender," "the same shall be taken, as to the creditors and purchasers of the persons aforesaid so remaining in possession, to be fraudulent within this act, and that the absolute property is with the possession, unless such loan" "were declared by will, or by deed, in writing proved and recorded as aforesaid."

C. Lee and E. J. Lee, contra, contended,

That the possession of Jamesson, which was adverse to Norwood, could not be connected with Turner's possession, which was under Norwood, so as to make the case a fraudulent loan within the statute.

And of that opinion was the court.

Judgment affirmed.

SLACUM v. SIMMS AND WISE.

A magistrate who has received a deed of trust from an insolvent debtor, which deed is fraudulent in law as to creditors, is incompetent to sit as a magistrate in the discharge of the debtor under the insolvent law of Virginia. And the discharge so obtained is not a discharge in due course of law.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

The former judgment of the court below having been reversed in this court at February term, 1806, (ante, vol. 3, p. 300), and remanded for further proceedings, the following statement of facts, in the nature of a special verdict, was agreed upon by the parties.

That the defendants executed the bond in the declaration mentioned. That the defendant Simms, being in custody under the execution mentioned in *the condition of the [364 bond, afterwards obtained his discharge as an insolvent debtor, by authority of the act of assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act for reducing into one the several acts concerning executions, and for the relief of insolvent debtors." That he was discharged from the prison bounds by warrant from Amos Alexander and Peter Wise, Jun., two of the aldermen or justices of the corporation of Alexandria, before whom Simms delivered in a schedule of his estate, and took the oath of an insolvent debtor in the manner prescribed by the act, and being so discharged, he departed out of prison bounds, and not before, or in any other manner. That the defendant, Peter Wise, Jun., is the same Peter Wise who acted as one of the justices, and who signed the warrant of discharge, and that Simms, before taking the oath, executed a deed conveying all his property, real and personal, to John Wise, and the said Peter Wise, in trust, for the benefit of the creditors of Simms, who, notwithstanding the said deed, afterwards, and after his discharge, exercised acts of ownership over the property. That Peter Wise never acted under the deed of trust. That the deed of trust was made by Simms with a view of preventing the effect of the plaintiff's execution, and was fraudulent in law, but such fraud was without the participation of the said Peter Wise; and without his privity, other than that the said deed was exhibited to the said magistrates, and discussed by counsel before them, at the time the schedule was delivered, and the oath administered.

That no escape warrant was ever applied for in consequence of Simms's departing from the prison bounds.

That if the law be for the plaintiff as to both defendants, or either of them, judgment to be entered for 2,570 dollars and 90 cents, to be discharged by the payment of 1,820 dollars and 20 cents, damages and costs against such defendant or defendants severally; but if the law be for either or both of the defendants, 365] *then judgment to be entered for such defendant or defendants severally.

The schedule referred to in the statement, was as follows: "I have neither real or personal property, but what has been conveyed by a deed of trust to John Wise and Peter Wise, Jun., for the use of my creditors, as will appear, reference being had to said deed.

(Signed) "JESSE SIMMS.

"August 30th, 1800."

The court below decided the law for both defendants; and the plaintiff sued out his writ of error.

Swann, for the plaintiff in error.

The case now presented is different from what it formerly was. It will now be contended that Simms was not discharged by due course of law.

1. Because Simms was guilty of fraud in effecting his discharge, and Wise knew it; and, by his conduct, contributed to assist him in it. Fraud is a question of law and fact. It is not necessary that it should be expressly averred. It is an inference of law from the facts. (Russell v. Hamilton, 1 Cranch, 309; 1 Bnrr. 396, 474; 3 Co., 77, 79, Fenner's case; Esp. N. P., 245; Buller, 172.)

2. Because Wise was not competent to act as a magistrate in discharging Simms. He was directly interested; for by discharging Simms he discharged himself from the obligation of his bond. An interested person is not competent to act as a judge. (12 Mod., 669, Wood's case; Com. Dig. tit. Justices, I, 3.)

The defendant must show all the proceedings to be regular and correct. It is not like the case of a *judgment of a compe- [366 tent court, which will be affirmed unless the error be apparent on the proceedings.

The proceedings are in pais, there can be no writ of error. This is the only mode in which the proceedure can be corrected.

C. Lee and Jones, contra.

Fraud is never to be presumed; and it is not found. It was a mere ministerial act, which is not void by reason of interest.

This is not the mode by which the plaintiff can avail himself of the fraud, if it be one. The discharge is prima facie good.

It is expressly found that Wise did not participate in the fraud which Simms contemplated by his deed. He never acted under the deed as a trustee. His only knowledge of the fact was in his capacity of magistrate. As a magistrate he had no discretion; he was bound to grant the warrant of discharge upon the debtor's taking the oath, and delivering the schedule.

All the authorities cited in Comyns' Digest confine the incompetence to cases where the judge is a party upon record.

If a legal proceeeding of this kind may be vacated at any subsequent time, by showing a remote collateral interest in the magistrate, there can be no security for property. The distinction is between a direct interest as party, and a consequential interest. If the interest do not appear upon the record, the only remedy is by prohibition. As long as the proceeding remains unreversed by a competent tribunal, it is valid. (Hard., 503. Brooks v. Earl of Rivers, 12 Co., 114; Earl of Darby's case, Dyer, 220, a; Sir N. Bacon's case, 1 Leon., 184; Cro. Eliz, 717; Errish v. Reeves, 8 Co., 118; Bonham's case, Co. Litt., 141; 4 Com. Dig. tit. Justices, I. & T.; 1 Salk., 398; 12 Mod., 587; 2 Salk., *425; Queen v. Rodgers, 2 Salk., 607, [367 Sty., 137; Smith v. Hancock, Sty., 209.)

Swann, in reply.

It is immaterial whether it be a ministerial or a judicial act. Sheriffs, witnesses, jurors are all rendered incompetent by interest; and à fortiori is a judge.

March 15. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

The former case between these parties presented the single circumstance of fraud in Simms, the principal debtor, in which Wise had no share as it was then stated.

The decision in that case does not affect the present. It is here stated that the defendant Wise was one of the magistrates who granted the discharge, and who received a conveyance from Simms of all his estate, &c.

It cannot be doubted that if there had been a combination between the surety of the insolvent and the magistrate to grant the discharge, such surety could never plead that discharge in bar of this action. Such would have been the law if Peter Wise the surety had been a different person from Peter Wise the magistrate. But being the same person, he is clearly incompetent. He is directly interested, and his interest appears upon the record.

But the case is stronger when we consider the irregularity of the schedule of property delivered by Simms at the time of his discharge.

The whole schedule is in these words: "I have neither real or personal property, but what has been conveyed by a deed of trust to 368] John Wise and Peter *Wise, Jun., for the use of my creditors, as will appear, reference being had to the said deed."

He does not directly affirm that it is, or is not, his property. He might have taken the oath although he knew that the property contained in the deed remained in himself. The schedule, therefore, was not such as the law requires. The transaction is fraudulent upon the face of it.

The discharge, being granted by an incompetent tribunal, is wholly void.

Judgment reversed.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
VOWELL AND M'LEAN.

Duties upon goods imported do not accrue until their arrival at the port of entry.

The duty upon salt, which ceased with the 31st of December, 1807, was not chargeable upon a cargo which arrived within the collection district before that day, but did not arrive at the port of entry until the 1st of January, 1808.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Columbia, in an action of debt upon a bond given by the defendants in error to the United States, for duties on a cargo of salt from St. Ubes, which arrived and came to anchor within the collection district of Alexandria, sixteen miles below the town and port of Alexandria, on the 23d of December, 1807, but did not arrive at the port of Alexandria until the first of January, 1808.

The collector of Alexandria refused to permit the cargo to be landed until the duties were secured. Vowell contended that the salt was not subject to duty.

The facts being specially pleaded, and admitted in the replication, to which there was a general demurrer, the only question was, whether, as the duty upon salt ceased with the 31st of December, 1807, this cargo, which 369] arrived within the district, but not *at the port of Alexandria before the 1st of January, 1808, was liable to duty.

The court below was of opinion that it was not, and rendered judgment for the defendants, upon the demurrer.

The United States brought their writ of error.

Jones, for the United States.

The duty attached when the salt was imported into the district, and perhaps, when brought into the United States.

By the act of the 10th of August, 1790 (vol. 1, p. 248), a duty of 12 cents a bushel is laid upon salt which, after the 31st of December then next, should be "brought into the United States, from any foreign port or place." So by the act of the 8th July, 1797 (vol. 4, p. 35), an additional duty of 8 cents is laid upon all salt imported into the United States. By the act of March 3, 1807 (vol. 8, p. 290), it is enacted, "that from and after the 31st day of December next, so much of any act as lays a duty upon imported salt, be and the same is hereby repealed; and from and after the day last aforesaid, salt shall be imported into the United States free of duty: Provided that for the recovery and receipt of such duties as shall have accrued, and on the days aforesaid respectively remain outstanding, and for the recovery and distribution of fines, penalties and forfeitures, and the remission thereof, which shall have been incurred before and on the said days respectively, the provisions of the aforesaid act shall remain in full force and virtue."

The laws of the United States take a distinction between importing and entering, between a port and a place. (Vol 4, p. 317, § 23 and 24.) Goods may be imported before they are entered or delivered. So if goods are brought in and destined to be delivered in different districts or ports, they are to be inserted *in [370 the manifest in successive order, and the law speaks of them as imported. The forfeiture for want of a manifest does not accrue at the time of entry, but at the time of importing or bringing in. So if goods are brought into the United States, to be exported again to foreign ports, the law speaks of them as imported (vol. 4, p. 331, 332, § 32), although they are not intended to be landed.

In vol. 4, p. 327, § 30, is the following expression: "at any port of the United States established by law, or within any harbor, inlet or creek thereof;" which shows that a port established by law, is coextensive with a collection district.

C. Lee, contra.

Until the vessel arrives at the port of entry, neither the duties on the goods, nor on the tonnage, accrue. Yet they both accrue at the same time.

The question is, what is the fiscal meaning of the word imported?

The first collection law, which was passed on the 4th of July, 1789, (Child's edit. Laws, vol. 1, p. 25,) has the same expression, imported into the United States. Yet it afterwards speaks of the time of importation, where it evidently means the time when a permit is applied for at the proper office. Some rule is necessary by which to fix the time of importation; it ought not to depend upon the question at what time the vessel arrived within the jurisdiction of the United States. The same act, when speaking of the ad valorem duties, refers to the time and place of importation, for the purpose of ascertaining the value.

If goods should be lost after arrival within the collection district, but before they reach the port of entry, no duties would accrue upon them. So if they are damaged, the value is to be ascertained not *at their arrival with- [371 in the district, but at the port of entry.

The second collection law (vol. 1, p. 248, Folwell's edition), does not repeal the first, except so far as it is repugnant thereto, but is explained by it.

The duty on tonnage does not accrue until the arrival at the port of entry.

In the act of May 2, 1792, (vol. 2, p. 68), the duties therein mentioned are to be "laid, levied and collected upon the said article at their importation into the United States."

The acts of Congress take a clear distinction between a district and a port. A district may contain several ports. (Vol. 1, p. 162.)

The case of a vessel detained by ice, is the only case in which an entry of a vessel within the district can be made before her arrival at the port of entry.

By the collection act, in vol. 1, p. 175, the District of Alexandria is created, and a collector is to reside at Alexandria, which is made the sole port of entry; "and the authority of the officers of the said district shall extend over all the waters, shores, bays, harbors and inlets, on the south side of the river Potomac from the last-mentioned cockpit point to the highest tide water of the said river."

If district meant port, a vessel must enter within 48 hours after arrival within the district, or the vessel and cargo will be liable to forfeiture.

Six months' credit is given for duties from the time of importation. The uniform construction of the treasury has been that this six months begins from the time of entry and permit. In this very case the bond is dated on the 2d of January, 1808, the date of the permit.

372*] *In all cases too where additional duties have been imposed, the construction of the treasury has always been, that the additional duties are to be paid if the vessel arrived at the port after the day fixed by law, although she arrived within the district before that day.

March 15, MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

The distinction taken by the counsel for the defendants in error, between a district and a port of entry, is correct. The duties did not accrue in the fiscal sense of the term, until the vessel arrived at the port of entry. If the question had been doubtful, the court would have respected the uniform construction which it is understood has been given by the treasury department of the United States upon similar questions. It is understood that in case of an increase of duty, the United States have always demanded and received the additional duty if the goods have not arrived at the port of entry before the time fixed for the commencement of such additional duty, although the vessel may have arrived within the collection district before that time. The same rule of construction is to be observed when there is a diminution of duty.

Judgment affirmed.

SLOOP SALLY
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

An appeal from the District Court of the District of Maine, in a case of admiralty jurisdiction, does not lie directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, but to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

In all cases where the District of Maine acts as a District Court, the appeal is to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the District Court for the District of Maine, condemning the sloop Sally and cargo for violation of the revenue laws of the United States. The appeal was directly to this court.

Rodney, Attorney General. [373

No appeal lies from that court directly to this in a case where that court acts in the capacity of a district court. In such cases the appeal is expressly given to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

By the 10th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (vol. 1, p. 54), it is enacted that the "District Court in Maine district, shall, besides the jurisdiction herein before granted, have jurisdiction of all causes (except of appeals and writs of error) herein after made cognizable in a circuit court, and shall proceed therein, in the same manner as a circuit court; and writs of error shall lie from decisions therein, to the Circuit Court in the District of Massachusetts, in the same manner as from other district courts to their respective circuit courts." And by the 21st section it is enacted, "that from final decrees in a district court in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of three hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the next Circuit Court to be held in such district. Provided, nevertheless, that all such appeals from final decrees as aforesaid, from the District Court of Maine, shall be made to the Circuit Court, next to be holden after each appeal, in the District of Massachusetts."

By the act of March 3d, 1803, (vol. 6. p. 315, § 2), it is enacted, "that from all final judgments or decrees rendered, or to be rendered in any circuit court, or in any district court acting as a circuit court, in any cases of equity, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and of prize or no prize, an appeal, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum or value of two thousand dollars, shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States," &c.

In this case the court below could only act in its capacity of a district court, because such causes of *admiralty and maritime [374 jurisdiction are exclusively cognizable in a district court.

C. Lee, contra, contended, that there was a repugnance between the act of 1789, and that of 1803, the latter declaring that appeals in such cases should be directly to the Supreme Court.

But the court was of opinion that this not being a case where the District Court was acting as a circuit court, the appeal ought to have been to the Circuit Court of Massachusetts.

Appeal dismissed.

ABBREVIATIONS.

F. C. appended to a citation from the regular reports of the U. S. Circuit and District Courts refers to the series of reprints called the Federal Cases and gives, as its publishers do and recommend, the number of the case in that series.

Fed. Cas. is used when the case is contained in the series of Federal Cases but is not reported in the regular series of U. S. Circuit and District Court Reports, and the citation of such cases is to the volume and page of Fed. Cas., not to the number of the case.

Fed. or Fed. Rep. refers to the well known series Federal Reporter, containing reports of the Circuit and District Court decisions since 1880.

L. R. A. will be readily recognized as the abbreviation for the Lawyers' Reports Annotated, and particular attention should be given to these citations, as in a large proportion of cases the citing case will be found accompanied by a note on its principal point absolutely exhaustive of the authorities thereon.

Am. Dec., Am. Rep. and Am. St. Rep. will be readily recognized as the abbreviations for the well known trinity of selected case reports, The American Decisions, American Reports and American State Reports.

Pennsylvania State Reports (Pa. St.) The New Jersey Law Reports (N. J. L.) and Equity Reports (N. J. Eq.) are distinguished by the number of the series, not by the name of the reporter, while the North and South Carolina Reports, Law and Equity, are cited by the name of the reporter where the reports are so titled and it has been the universal custom.

Duplicate citations are given to the National Reporter System where cases are therein contained, and to the Reporter System alone of cases not, at the date of the preparation of the annotation, officially reported. The usual abbreviations are used, as follows:

L. 450, holding order of sale made by Orphans' Court valid; Jackson v. Gumaer, 2 Cow. 567, holding certificate of acknowledgment in usual form sufficient; Meriam v. Harsen, 2 Barb. Ch. 270, certificate of acknowledgment substantially complying with the statute sufficient; Bank v. Mersereau, 3 Barb. Ch. 577, 49 Am. Dec. 205, holding deed in customary form sufficient; Moore v. Vance, 1 Ohio, 12, holding deed without subscribing witnesses valid; Chesnut v. Shane, 16 Ohio, 603, 47 Am. Dec. 390, holding if construction is doubtful, usage will control; McFerren v. Powers, 1 S. & R. 106, holding acknowledgment of deed before associate judge of a country other than that in which land lay, valid; Harrington v. Smith, 28 Wis. 68, and State v. Timme, 54 Wis. 340, 11 N. W. 793, declaring that great weight is to be given to the practical construction of a statute by officials. Cited approvingly in Beals v. Hale, 4 How. 51, 11 L. 870. Cited arguendo, in McCall v. Hinkley, 4 Gill, 160; dissenting opinion, McArthur v. Porter, 1 Ohio, 108.

Distinguished in Love v. Hinckley, Abb. Admr. 441, F. C. 8,548, holding proof did not establish the custom; O'Donnell v. Glenn, 9 Mont. 461, 463, 23 Pac. 1019, 1020, that the use of erroneous form of verification of location notice was not generally enough to make it sufficient; Cuming Co. v. Tate, 10 Neb. 196, 4 N. W. 1047, where there was no evidence of deviation or universality of a custom; Gray v. Askew, 3 Ohio, 479, refusing to follow a practice neither old nor general.

Statutes.— Federal courts follow State courts' construction of State statutes, p. 32.

This proposition is affirmed, followed and applied by the following citations: Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. 168, 6 L. 167, adopting local law of real property as ascertained by decisions of State courts; Green v. Neal, 6 Pet. 296, 8 L. 404, holding Federal courts adopt State courts' construction of State statutes; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. 504, 14 L. 517, following State court exposition of State Constitution; Supervisors v. United States, 18 Wall. 82, 21 L. 775, holding that construction of statute of State by its highest court binding on this court; as also in McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 391, 28 L. 1031, 5 S. Ct. 667, as to statute providing for probate of will; Thompson v. Phillips, Bald. 284, F. C. 13,974, law limiting lien of judgments; Merrill v. Portland, 4 Cliff. 144, F. C. 9,470, as to statute prescribing conditions annexed to the right to recover for injury received in consequence of defect in highway; Bowditch v. Boston, 4 Cliff. 341, F. C. 1,719, as to statute rendering city liable for property destroyed to stop a fire; In re Wylie, 2 Hughes, 460, F. C. 18,112, as to "State exemption laws;" Griffing v. Gibb, 1 McAll. 222, F. C. 5,819, construing legislative grants; Mitchell v. Lippincott, 2 Woods, 472, F. C. 9,665, as to "married woman's law;" State v. Railway Co., 3 Fed. 888, statute providing for removal of criminal case; Lookout, etc., R. R. Co. v. Houston, 44 Fed. 450, holding decision of State court on demurrer is binding on Federal court to which case has been removed; Prentice v. Zane, 19 Fed. Cas. 1272, following State courts' construction of negotiable paper law; Bloodgood v. Grasey, 31 Ala. 589, following foreign States' construction of its own statutes; Youley v. Lavender, 27 Ark. 264, holding Federal courts will follow State statute limiting rights of creditor in probate matters; McClure v. Owen, 26 Iowa, 253, holding Federal courts will follow latest adjudications of State courts construing States statutes; Levy v. Mentz, 23 La. Ann. 262, holding that Federal courts will follow State courts' interpretation of State laws, respecting titles; Craig v. Fox, 16 Ohio, 569, refusing to alter construction of statute sanctioned by many decisions; Smith v. Power, 23 Tex. 33, holding decisions of this court, construing local statutes affecting titles to real property, are binding on all courts; Derby v. Jacques, 1 Cliff. 439, F. C. 3,817, holding Federal courts follow State practice in law cases.

Distinguished in Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 34, 27 L. 365, 2

S. Ct. 22, refusing to follow decision of State court, rendered after Circuit Court had construed State statute; Ryan v. Staples, 76 Fed. 727, 40 U. S. App. 427, holding Federal courts not bound by single decision of State court applying principles of common law to question as to validity of judgment, where rights of party became vested before decision was made; Blanchard v. Sprague, 1 Cliff. 290, F. C. 1,516, holding that in equity cases State laws do not furnish rules of evidence to Federal courts.

Deed.— If land in two counties be conveyed, by one deed, it need be recorded only in one county, p. 33.

This rule is cited and applied in Wilt v. Cutler, 38 Mich. 194, holding deed covering land in different counties is properly recorded in anyone of them; Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 S. & R. 318, holding an exemplification certified by the recorder of a county of a deed conveying lands in that and in another county is evidence in dispute concerning the latter; Hancock v. Lumber Co., 65 Tex. 233, holding valid registration of deed in one county establishes prima facie its execution everywhere. Cited arguendo, in Beals v. Hale, 4 How. 54, 11 L. 873.

Distinguished in Penn v. Preston, 2 Rawle, 18, holding the covenant on part of grantor to procure recording of a power is not fulfilled in relation to lands in one county by recording it in another.

5 Cr. 34–45, 3 L. 29, TUCKER v. OXLEY.

Bankruptcy.— A joint debt under bankrupt law may be set off against the separate claim of the assignee of one of the partners, p. 40.

In the following citing cases this principle is affirmed and applied: Mead v. Bank, 6 Blatchf. 187, F. C. 9,366, holding creditor, taking for partnership debt, note of co-partnership and individual notes of partners, indorsed by co-partners, was entitled, after bankruptcy, to dividends out of the several estate, joint or several; In re Jewett, 7 Biss. 337, F. C. 7,306, declaring that a partnership creditor could prove his debt against the estate of an individual partner; Wilkins v. Davis, 2 Low. 514, F. C. 17,664, holding that a joint creditor may prove against the separate estate of the bankrupt and will receive dividends from joint assets and surplus of separate assets after separate debts are paid; In re Webb, 4 Sawy. 328, F. C. 17,317, holding joint creditor, in case of bankruptcy of one partner, has a right to prove his joint debt and vote for assignee; In re Carrier, 39 Fed. 198, holding, where one of two joint debtors becomes bankrupt, the creditor may set off the debt against his separate indebtedness to the bankrupt; In re Lloyd, 15 Nat. Bank Reg. 257, 15 Fed. Cas. 713, holding in involuntary proceedings against a separate partner, creditors of partnership must be counted in computing legal quorum; In re Melick, 16 Fed. Cas. 1328, 4 N. B. R. 97, holding an adjudication of bankruptcy may be made against one partner only upon a joint debt; In re Rice, 20 Fed. Cas. 655, holding firm creditors can participate in a dividend without showing they have exhausted the individual estate of the retiring partner; Harris v. Peabody, 73 Me. 268, holding, if there is no joint estate and no solvent partners, joint and separate creditors share the separate estate together; Allen v. Wells, 22 Pick. 455, 33 Am. Dec. 761, holding separate property may be attached for partnership debts and a lien so acquired will not be defeated by subsequent attachment by separate creditor; Bullard v. Dorsey, 7 S. & M. 13, holding individual debt due a joint creditor could not be set off against joint debt; Dahlgren v. Duncan, 7 S. & M. 294, holding, under statute, individual and partnership debts stand on equality as to insolvent's estate; Simpson v. Schulte, 21 Mo. App. 644, holding partnership creditor may have judgment against any partner without joinder of the others; Lathrop v. Reed, 13 Allen, 295, holding contract claim for unliquidated damages provable in insolvency; Smith v. Spengler, 83 Mo. 413, and Green v. Conrad, 114 Mo. 664, 21 S. W. 841, holding debt due before assignment by bank may be set off against debt due after it; Pearce v. Cooke, 13 R. I. 187, holding partnership creditor could prove his judgment against separate estate; Higgins v. Rector, 47 Tex. 364, deciding that holder of a claim against a partnership can establish his claim against estate of a deceased partner; Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 312, 323, quære, if joint creditor is entitled to share in separate estate of debtor with separate creditors; Bardwell v. Perry, 19 Vt. 301, 47 Am. Dec. 692, holding all that separate creditors can require, in equity, is that partnership creditors first exhaust partnership funds; Curtis v. Woodward, 58 Wis. 504, 505, 506, 46 Am. Rep. 649, 650, 651, 17 N. W. 331, holding firm debt provable in bankruptcy against individual partner, where there was no partnership property, and other partners had been discharged from liability. Cited in Receivers v. Gas Light Co., 23 N. J. L. 297.

Distinguished in Murrill v. Neill, 8 How. 427, 12 L. 1141, holding that individual property shall first be applied to individual debts of respective partners; Gray v. Rollo, 18 Wall. 633, 634, 635, 21 L. 929, holding, where a bankrupt owes a joint debt and holds a note given by one of the joint creditors and a third person, the two claims cannot be set off; Hitchcock v. Rollo, 3 Biss. 287, F. C. 6,535, holding assignee of claim against an insolvent insurance company, assigned after notice of insolvency, cannot set it off against his previous indebtedness; McKinney v. Bellows, 3 Blackf. 33, holding set-off applies only to debts due in the same right; Gillaspy v. Peck, 46 Iowa, 462, holding lien of subsequent judgment for an individual debt does not take priority over lien of previously rendered judgment upon a partnership debt, as to separate estate; McCulloh v. Dashiell, 1 Harr. & Gill, 106, 107, 18 Am. Dec. 279, holding joint creditors in equity can only look to the surplus of the separate estate.

Equity.— Rules for marshalling assets are equitable restraints on legal rights, p. 43.

Cited in In re Nims, 10 Ben. 56, F. C. 10,268, holding joint creditors share equally with partnership creditors in the partnership assets.

Distinguished in Cleghorn v. Bank, 9 Ga. 323, holding equity in favor of separate creditors will not be allowed to take away a right acquired by an execution at law on the part of joint creditors against the separate estate.

Statutes.— In adopting and enacting a foreign statute decisions expounding it are adopted with it; this principle followed as to bankrupt law, p. 42.

Rule applied in Warner v. Railway Co., 164 U. S. 423, 41 L. 500, 17 S. C. 149, holding States, in adopting statute of frauds, adopted the settled construction of it; Willis v. Eastern & C. Co., 169 U. S. 307, 42 L. 758, 18 S. Ct. 352, holding that United States, in adopting Massachusetts statute providing "summary process for recovery of land," adopted the settled construction of it; Cronan v. Cotting, 104 Mass. 249, 6 Am. Rep. 235, construing phrase "fiduciary character" in bankruptcy act; Merrill v. National Bank of Jacksonville, 173 U. Constitutional law — Citizen.—A corporation aggregate is not a citizen, p. 86.

This proposition is approved in dissenting opinions in Marshall v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 16 How. 348, 14 L. 968, and Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 364, 15 L. 415, where citizen of one State sued corporation formed in another, the majority of the court holding corporation is a citizen for jurisdictional purposes; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 178, 19 L. 359, and Ducat v. Chicago, 48 Ill. 176, 95 Am. Dec. 531, holding corporation not to be citizen within meaning of clause providing "citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" Wood v. Hartford, 13 Conn. 209, 212, 33 Am. Dec. 396, 399, where corporation claimed it must be sued in county in which it has its residence; the court held it had no residence. The general rule is approved in Tatem v. Wright, 23 N. J. L. 442; Smith v. Bank, 5 Serg. & R. 320, and Barrow Co. v. Kane, 170 U. S. 106, 42 L. 966, 18 S. Ct. 528, although all follow Marshall v. B. & O. Ry. Co., supra, and hold, for purposes of jurisdiction, corporation will be considered a citizen. Cited in Lexington Co. v. Dorr, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 257, holding court will look to character of individuals who compose corporation, and if they may sue in any particular court, in right of citizenship, corporation may.

Cited generally in Wilson v. Pierce, 30 Fed. Cas. 153, and in dissenting opinion, B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Cary, 28 Ohio St. 218, as to what is test of citizenship of corporation.

Courts.— Capacity of corporation aggregate to sue in Federal courts depends on citizenship of its members, and this must be shown by proper averments, p. 61.

Rule cited and applied in similar case. Bank of Cumberland v. Willis, 3 Sumn. 473, F. C. 885; Kirkpatrick v. White, 4 Wash. 597, F. C. 7,850, where plea to jurisdiction was sustained, it being shown four of the corporators were residents of same State as plaintiff; North River Co. v. Hoffman, 5 Johns. Ch. 303, where some members of corporation were residents of same State with defendant.

Cited in dissenting opinion, Marshall v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 16 How. 348, 350, 16 L. 968, 969, the majority holding, averment that corporation is formed under laws of particular State sufficient, without any averments as to citizenship of members. This view is adopted and followed in Covington Co. v. Shepherd, 20 How. 233, 15 L. 898; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 178, 19 L. 359; Shaw v. Quincy Co., 145 U. S. 451, 36 L. 772, 12 S. Ct. 938; St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. James, 161 U. S. 557, 40 L. 806, 16 S. Ct. 625, holding there is an indisputable presumption that corporation is composed of citizens of State which created it. Simpson, 1 Mo. 185, holding court will look beyond corporate name, and notice individuals who compose corporation, and will, therefore, allow foreign corporation to maintain suit in State courts; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 1 N. H. 116, note, 12 Am. Dec. 241, note, 12 Am. Rep. 546.

Modified in Park Bank v. Nichols, 4 Biss. 315, F. C. 10,048, holding it is a nonrebuttable presumption that corporators are citizens of State in which corporation has its legal existence. Distinguished in Middlebrooks v. Insurance Co., 14 Conn. 309, 310, where attempt was made to bring foreign corporation into State court by service of summons on resident stockholders; Adams v. Wiscasset Bank, 1 Me. 365, 10 Am. Dec. 90, as presenting an entirely different point; Union Bank v. United States, 4 Hump. 370, case is decided on statutory grounds.

Federal courts.— Right of action given by act of congress does not imply a right to sue in the Federal courts unless it is so expressed, p. 86.

Cited and principle applied in Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 135, 23 L. 838, interpreting bankruptcy act, holding assignee may sue in State courts to recover assets of bankrupt; In re Barry, note, 136 U. S. 609, 615, 34 L. 508, 509, 42 Fed. 122, 126, F. C. 6,137, where action was brought in Circuit Court to determine controversy between two citizens of same State involving title to office; United States v. New Bedford Bridge, 1 Wood. & M. 431, 438, 455, F. C. 15,867, holding the Circuit Court has no power to punish for the erection of a bridge over tide water, or the obstruction of navigation in navigable waters; Pettilon v. Noble, 7 Biss. 453, F. C. 11,044, and National Bank v. Hubbard, 49 Vt. 2, 24 Am. Rep. 98, holding further, clause giving United States courts jurisdiction of suits by or against national banking associations, does not invest said courts with exclusive jurisdiction. Principle applied in Robinson v. Bank, 81 N. Y. 391, 37 Am. Rep. 513, holding statute permitting suits to be brought in certain Federal courts is permissive, and does not limit general rule which permits civil cases arising under laws of the United States to be prosecuted and determined in State courts. Bank of United States.— Charter gives corporation capacity to appear as suitor in any court which would, by law, have cognizance of the cause, if an individual were the party, but does not enlarge jurisdiction of any Federal courts, p. 85.

Same construction applied in Central Bank v. Gibson, 11 Ga. 456, where like provision in State charter was under consideration. Cited generally in dissenting opinion, Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. 877, 888, 6 L. 237, 240, where second charter is construed. Cited generally in St. Louis Bank v. Allen, 2 McCrary, 93, 5 Fed. 552, and in National Bank v. Distinguished on ground of wording of second charter, Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. 817, 6 L. 223.

Constitutional law — Citizenship.— A corporation aggregate is not a citizen, p. 87.

The proposition is maintained in dissenting opinion, Rundle v. Delaware Co., 14 How. 99, 100, 102, 14 L. 343, 344, the majority holding it is a citizen for purpose of giving jurisdiction; also, dissenting opinion, Marshall v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 16 How. 348, 14 L. 967, the majority following Rundle v. Delaware, supra; dissenting opinion, Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 364, 15 L. 415, where corporator brought suit against corporation, the majority holding he might bring suit in Federal courts if he resided in different State from that in which corporation has its domicile. Cited and approved in Wood v. Insurance Co., 13 Conn. 209, 212, 33 Am. Dec. 396, 399, and, therefore, has no residence, but for purpose of maintaining jurisdiction courts will regard residence of stockholders as residence of corporation; Ducat v. Modified in Ohio & Miss. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black. 295, 17 L. 133, and Barrow Co. v. Kane, 170 U. S. 106, 107, 42 L. 966, 967, 18 S. Ct. 528, collecting authorities, holding for purpose of giving jurisdiction in Federal courts, corporation may be considered a citizen; also in McKinley v. Wheeler, 130 U. S. 635, 636, 32 L. 1050, 9 S. Ct. 640, holding corporation may join in location of mining claims upon public lands in like manner as individual citizens. The rule is further modified in Railroad Tax Case, 8 Sawy. 265, 283, 13 Fed. 745, 758; also, 9 Sawy. 193, 18 Fed. 403, where a private corporation is said to be a citizen within the meaning of the first section to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Modified in Louisville Ry. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. 554, 11 L. 376, a leading case, holding for jurisdictional purposes, corporation will be considered a citizen of State which created it; and to same effect, Elson v. Piggott, 94 Ind. 22; also, Cooke v. State Bank, 52 N. Y. 110, 11 Am. Rep. 676, and B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Cary, 28 Ohio St. 218, collecting authorities.

Federal courts.— Corporations suing in Federal courts must aver facts to show that its members are entitled as citizens to maintain action, p. 92.

Cited and rule applied in dissenting opinion, Marshall v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 16 How. 340, 14 L. 964, where no averments were made as to citizenship of members, the rule was denied by the majority. C. 6,404, as bearing on question of right of Circuit Court to entertain jurisdiction of case when it does not have jurisdiction over all of defendants.

Overruled In Marshall v. B. & O. Ry. Co., 16 How. 326, 14 L. 958, holding averment that corporation was organized under laws of State of which adverse party is not a resident is sufficient. Cited in Covington Bridge Co. v. Shepherd, 20 How. 233, 234, 15 L. 898, 899, where rule in Marshall v. B. & O., supra, was approved. This case collects authorities. The proposition is overruled in leading case, Louisville Ry. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. 554, 11 L. 376, holding corporation a citizen of State creating it, for jurisdictional purposes. The rule in Louisville v. Letson, supra, approved generally in Ober v. Gallagher, 93 U. S. 205, 23 L. 831; Missouri Ry. Co. v. Texas Ry. Co., 4 Woods 364, 10 Fed. 500; Shaw v. Quincy Mining Co., 145 U. S. 451, 36 L. 772, 12 S. Ct. 938, holding further, corporation, like individual, can only be sued in district of its domicile, or in that of plaintiff; so also it is approved and followed in St. Louis & San Francisco Ry. Co. v. James, 161 U. S. 555, 556, 557, 40 L. 806, 16 S. Ct. 625; Barrow Co. v. Kane, 170 U. S. 106, 107, 42 L. 966, 967, 18 S. Ct. 528, where authorities are collected and examined; Doremas et al. v. Insurance Co., 3 Dill. 410, F. C. 13,839, holding corporation ereated by laws of Great Britain to be an "alien," and entitled, when sued, to have action brought in Federal court; Lonergan v. Illinois Ry. Co., 55 Fed. 551, but a mere averment that corporation is a citizen of a particular State is insufficient; City of Ysleta v. Canda, 67 Fed. 7, case of a municipal corporation; Hollingsworth v. Southern Ry. Co., 86 Fed. 356, holding further, that one State by adopting a corporation already organized under the laws of another State, does not make corporation a citizen of its State, so that Federal court is divested of jurisdiction in an action between one of its citizens and corporation. Overruled in Dinsmore v. Philadelphia Ry. Co., 7 Fed. Cas. 728, and Bank v. Simonton, 2 Tex. 539, following Louisville v. Letson, supra, but holding there must be an averment of jurisdictional facts in case of corporations suing, the same as when individual citizen sues. Note, 33 Am. Dec. 400.

Corporations.— The term "inhabitant" may include corporations having property within a district, p. 88.

Cited with approval in Gilbert v. New Zealand Ins. Co., 49 Fed. 885, and Zambrino v. Galveston Ry. Co., 38 Fed. 451, 453, holding corporation may be an inhabitant of a district other than that of which it is a citizen or subject; Home Ins. Co. v. Augusta, 50 Ga. 541, 542, where foreign corporation having local agent was held to be an inhabitant; Slavens v. S. P. R. R. Co., 51 Mo. 310, where corporation was held to be resident of county through which its railroad passed; Bushel v. Comm. Ins. Co., 15 S. & R. 177, holding the word "person" as used in a statute, includes corporations as well as individuals. Cited generally, Yadkin Co. v. Benton, 1 Hawk. 423, implying, without deciding, residence of corporation is confined to county in which it has its principal office.

Trustee is a real person, capable of being a citizen or alien, who has the whole legal estate in himself, p. 91.

Cited in Mead v. Walker, 15 Wis. 503, which involved the question whether trustee or cestui que trust was real party in interest in suit brought by former.

5 Cr. 100–115, 3 L. 48, HODGSON v. MARINE INS. CO.

Insurance.— Insurance made for benefit of all whom it may concern, without warranty as to neutrality, covers the interest of a belligerent, p. 109.

Rule applied in Seamens v. Loring, 1 Mason, 136, F. C. 12,583, holding policy issued under such circumstances covers interest of all who have authorized the insurance; Maryland Ins. Co. v. Bathurst, 5 Gill & J. 191, where loss occurred through ship and cargo being property of belligerent.

Insurance.— Promissory note given for premium is sufficient consideration for contract of insurance, p. 110.

Pleading.— It is not necessary, in action of covenant on sealed policy, to aver an abandonment in declaration, p. 110.

Insurance.— Overvaluation, without other evidence of fraud, will not avoid policy, p. 111.

Cited and principle applied in Brooke et al. v. Insurance Co., 4 Mart. (N. S.) 643, where payment of policy was contested on ground of overvaluation of cargo; Akin v. Insurance Co., 4 Mart. (N. S.) 662, where insured recovered, although goods invoiced at sum less than amount insured for; Phoenix Co. v. McLoon, 100 Mass. 476, holding, in absence of fraud, valuations are binding on insurers both in law and equity. Extended note, 29 Am. Dec. 619.

Insurance.— An innocent misrepresentation, not material to risk, does not avoid the policy, p. 111.

Cited approvingly in Dewees v. Insurance Co., 34 N. J. L. 251, holding plea setting up misrepresentation collateral to contract of insurance in avoidance of policy, must show it was material and fraudulently made.

5 Cr. 115–141, 3 L. 53, UNITED STATES v. PETERS.

Federal courts.— Federal courts may exercise jurisdiction over a case in which a State may be ultimately affected, provided the State be not necessarily a party defendant, p. 139.

This principle was applied in Louisville Ry. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. 550, 11 L. 375, where corporation was sued in United States Circuit Court, although State was a member of corporation; also, in Lee v. Kaufman, 3 Hughes, 103, F. C. 8,191; and United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 209, 211, 212, 27 L. 178, 179, 1 S. Ct. 279, where suit was maintained against defendants who held as representatives of the United States; South Carolina v. Wesley, 155 U. S. 544, 39 L. 254, 15 S. Ct. 231, where there was a suggestion that the State was a necessary party, but no averment and proof thereof; Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S. 214, 221, 42 L. 140, 143, 17 S. Ct. 774, 777, holding averment by defendants that they hold as representatives of the State, does not make State defendant within meaning of eleventh amendment, so as to deprive court of jurisdiction; Head v. Porter, 48 Fed. 482, where suit was maintained against government armorer for infringement of patent; Howell v. Miller, 91 Fed. 135, holding injunction maintainable to prevent infringement of copyright by State agents preparing a new edition of its laws. Approved generally in dissenting opinion, Cunningham v. Macon Ry. Co., 109 U. S. 462, 27 L. 998, 3 S. Ct. 612, the majority holding, under facts, State was an indispensable party defendant. Explained in dissenting opinion, United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 242, 27 L. 189, 1 S. Ct. 279.

Distinguished in Governor v. Madrazo, 1 Pet. 122, 7 L. 79, where it was held a suit against governor of a State officially is suit against State; Briggs v. Lightboats, 11 Allen, 178, where lien for labor and material furnished in construction of boat was sought to be enforced against United States, after title and possession had passed to United States; Board v. Gannt, 76 Va. 463, where suit was in State court, against State's official, although State was held to be real party defendant; State v. Doyle, 40 Wis. 203, 206, where it was held a suit could not be maintained against the secretary of state, when he is sued in his official capacity. This case collects and reviews authorities.

Federal courts.— Jurisdiction of, cannot be affected by State legislation, p. 138.

Bills and notes.— Blank indorsement of negotiable instrument with intent to give a person credit, precludes indorser from denying that it was not filled up when he indorsed it, p. 151.

Cited and principle applied in Michigan Bank v. Eldred, 9 Wall. 552, 19 L. 776, where blanks in note were filled in by holder, after which it was transferred to bona fide purchaser; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 361, 15 L. 939, and Bank v. Neal, 22 How. 108, 16 L. 328, holding, where party to negotiable instrument intrusts it to another with blanks not filled up, such instrument carries on its face implied authority to fill up blanks; Roberts v. Adams, 8 Port. 301, 33 Am. Dec. 292, where firm had signed blank note, and after dissolution it had been filled out by one of the partners and given in satisfaction of firm debt; Herbert v. Huie, 1 Ala. 20, 34 Am. Dec. 756, where note was filled in for greater sum than had been agreed on; Beckwith v. Angell, 6 Conn. 321, where agreement between indorser and holder was filled in subsequent to indorsement; South Berwick v. Huntress, 53 Me. 91, 87 Am. Dec. 537, where penal bond was signed by sureties before sum was inserted, it was presumed parties had agreed that one to whom bond was delivered might make insertion; Androscoggin Bank v. Kimball, 10 Cush. 374, holding, if one sign note with blank date for accommodation of another, it will be presumed he authorized other to fill in date; Greenfield Bank v. Stowell, 123 Mass. 198, 25 Am. Rep. 68, holding indorsement and delivery under such circumstances makes one to whom delivered indorser's agent; Whitmore v. Nickerson, 125 Mass. 498, 28 Am. Rep. 258, where A. indorsed in blank unsigned promissory note and delivered it to B. to deliver to C., when C. signed his firm name thereto, B. delivered to C., who signed his individual name; Rogers v. Stevenson, 16 Minn. 73, where C. indorsed A.'s unsigned note to B., B. afterwards acquiring A.'s signature thereto; Chaddock v. Vanness, 35 N. J. L. 524, 10 Am. Rep. 262; Nelson v. Dubois, 13 Johns. 179, where indorsement was made in blank before note was delivered to payee, holder may write over name of indorser a guaranty, so as to take promise out of statute of frauds; Van Duzer v. Howe, 21 N. Y. 537, and Waldron v. Young, 9 Heisk. 782, where filling of blank was violation of agreement and to that extent a forgery; Selser v. Brock, 3 Ohio St. 306, where principal debtor and payee agreed upon and filled in illegal rate of interest; Frazier v. Gains, 2 Baxt. 97, where principal debtor inserted greater sum in note than his sureties had agreed to be liable for; Orrick v. Colston, 7 Gratt. 195; Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Gratt. 495, where indorser of bond was held, the principal debtor becoming insolvent; Snyder v. Van Doren, 46 Wis. 608, 32 Am. Rep. 743, 1 N. W. 288. Cited generally in dissenting opinion, Magruder v. McDonald, 3 Cr. C. C. 310, Fed. Cas. 8,965; Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 525; Weaver v. Marvel, 12 La. Ann. 518, as an instance where note was indorsed containing blank to be afterwards filled; Pierse v. Irvine, 1 Minn. 375, as an instance where parol evidence was admitted to explain the nature of contract arising under such circumstances; Hodgkin v. Bond, 1 N. H. 285, holding, where one indorses in blank, this is not sufficient memorandum, within meaning of statute of frauds.

Distinguished in United States v. Nelson, 2 Brock. 72, F. C. 15,862, holding principle does not apply to sealed instruments; Angle v. Insurance Co., 92 U. S. 339, 23 L. 559, where material parts of printed form were altered; Inglish v. Brenceman, 5 Ark. 382, 41 Am. Dec. 99, where note was altered by insertion of date after execution.

Contracts — Consideration.— Benefit to promisor or damage to promisee constitutes good consideration, p. 150.

Cited and this principle adopted in United States v. Linn, 15 Pet. 314, 10 L. 751, and Kenworthy v. Sawyer, 125 Mass. 29, where accommodation sureties were held bound on strength of something of value flowing from promisee to their principal; Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 43, 16 L. 365, and Offcutt v. Hall, 1 Cr. C. C. 574, F. C. 10,450, holding averment that defendant indorsed note to give it credit, and that this induced plaintiff to accept same, is sufficient averment of consideration; Rucker v. Bolles, 80 Fed. 513, 49 U. S. App. 375, where performance of act by promisee under no obligation to do so, was held good consideration; Gillespie v. Battle, 15 Ala. 283, holding note given by vendee in possession for purchase money of land cannot be avoided on ground that contract is void by statute of frauds; Whiteside v. Jennings, 19 Ala. 790, where note given by purchaser for land sold under order of Orphans' Court was held good consideration for bond for titles executed by commissioners; R. E. Lee Mining Co. v. Omaha Co., 16 Colo. 132, 26 Pac. 331, where advance by promisee to promisor was held good consideration; Fickling v. Marshall, 22 La. Ann. 507, where promisee relinquished third party from mortgage obligation; Farmer v. Stewart, 2 N. H. 101, holding forbearance of right to object to award, is good consideration for promise; Sands v. Crooke, 46 N. Y. 570, where risk incurred by promisee was held sufficient consideration; Bason v. Hughart, 2 Tex. 479, where promisee relinquished judgment; Muller v. Riviere, 59 Tex. 642, 46 Am. Rep. 292, holding agreement of promisee not to foreclose deed of trust on stock of goods owned by promisor's husband, and to furnish promisor goods under same terms they were furnished her husband, is good consideration for promise to pay husband's debts. Approved in Piatt v. United States, 22 Wall. 507, 22 L. 861. Cited generally in Somers v. Miner, 9 Conn. 466, holding where several subscribe and agree to pay to a certain fund, the promises of others are good consideration for promise of each subscriber; Vincent v. Larson, 1 Idaho, 248; Owing's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 401, 17 Am. Dec. 337; Love v. Wall, 1 Hawk. 315.

Distinguished in Rutledge v. Townsend, 38 Ala. 716, where new notes were given as collateral security for existing indebtedness, held no damage to promisee; Crane v. Bullock, Charlt. (Ga.) 320, holding a promise by trustee to pay, individually, debt of cestui que trust, to be without consideration.

Bills and notes.— Blank indorsement, for accommodation, with intent to give a person credit, is in effect a letter of credit, p. 150.

Cited to this point and principle applied in Israel v. Gale, 77 Fed. Rep. 533, holding indorser liable to every one except party for whom it was intended; Jones v. Berryhill, 25 Iowa, 300, holding guarantor, under statute, liable the same as accommodation indorser; Breckenridge v. Lewis, 84 Me. 356, 30 Am. St. Rep. 356, 24 Atl. 865, where one intrusted his signature to agent to have some obligation written over it; Johnson v. Blasdale, 1 S. & M. 20, 40 Am. Dec. 86, holding further, where agent exceeds his authority, and purchaser is aware of this fact, note will be void beyond sum authorized; Davis v. Lee, 26 Miss. 509, 59 Am. Dec. 268, where party to whom note was intrusted was authorized to fill up as he may choose, not inconsistent with purpose for which signed; Smith v. Wyckoff, 3 Sandf. Ch. 90; Chemung Bank v. Bradner, 44 N. Y. 686, where member of firm signed draft in blank with firm's name, and delivered same to third party; Whittle v. Hide Bank, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 618, 26 S. W. 1012, where accepted draft was used by holder to defraud acceptor. See Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cr. 53, 3 L. 35, sustaining action against accommodation indorser. Cited generally in Folger v. Chase, 18 Pick. 68, where indorsement was on blank piece of paper attached to note; Central Bank v. Davis, 19 Pick. 375, holding "accommodation indorser is entitled to no peculiar favor." Approved in Michigan Co. v. Leavenworth, 30 Vt. 20.

Distinguished in Conway v. Bank, 6 J. J. Marsh. 132, where note was indorsed under agreement that it was to be discounted by particular party, which agreement was broken.

Bills and notes — Trial.—Whether suit against maker of note would have produced money is question for jury, p. 153.

Cited and rule applied in Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. 533, 11 L. 713. Approved in Pococke v. Blount, 6 Mo. 345.

Bills and notes.— Before resort can be had to indorser of note, maker must be sued if solvent, p. 153.

Cited and rule applied in Hanna v. Pegg, 1 Blackf. 184, suit against assignor; Herald v. Scott, 2 Ind. 57, holding where assignee sues assignor, he must show that maker is unable to pay any part; Bozell v. Hauser, 9 Ind. 524, where maker was shown to be utterly insolvent. Wren, 4 S. & M. 97, as authority for holding a promise to answer for debts of another need not state consideration; also in Britton v. Angier, 48 N. H. 423, 424; Miller v. Irvine, 1 Dev. & B. 107, where above rule is adopted.

The rule of Thompson v. Hall, supra, is followed in Fyler v. Givens, 3 Hill L. 51, 53; Taylor v. Ross, 3 Yerg. 332, 333; Colgin v. Henley, 6 Leigh, 100, 103; Dorman v. Richard, 1 Fla. 292. Cited generally in Rigby v. Norwood, 34 Ala. 133; How v. Kemball, 2 McLean, 107, F. C. 6,748; Ellett v. Britton, 10 Tex. 212, as being contra to English rule in the following: Hayes v. Jackson, 159 Mass. 453, 34 N. E. 684; Bean v. Valle, 2 Mo. 138; Neelson v. Sanborne, 2 N. H. 414, 9 Am. Dec. 108, as authority for holding no action can be maintained, in case where statute requires agreement to be in writing, unless consideration for promise be stated in writing. Fraudulent conveyances.— In the Virginia statute of 1792, making void as to creditors conveyances not acknowledged and recorded as therein provided, the word "creditors" refers to those of the grantor only, p. 165.

Cited and principle applied in Kelly v. Mills, 41 Miss. 283, holding deed from naked trustee to complainant not void as to trustee's creditors for failure to record; Mississippi, etc., Co. v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 58 Miss. 856, holding unrecorded mortgage not void as to creditors of mortgagee's constructive trustee who is charged with notice; Givens v. Branford, 2 McCord, 155, 13 Am. Dec. 705, holding unrecorded marriage settlement not void as to creditor of husband who had notice; Crenshaw v. Anthony, Mart. & Y. 112, holding failure to record trust deed in Tennessee, and possession for five years by husband of cestui que trust, who had notice, does not give husband title or make deed void as to his creditors; Morgan v. Elam, 4 Yerg. 428, 449, holding unrecorded marriage settlement, made in Virginia, not void as to creditors of husband, who was party thereto; Bradshaw v. Thomas, 7 Yerg. 499, applying rule to similar statute and admitting in evidence unregistered contract to sell a horse to prove title in obligor when levied on by obligee's creditor; Hamilton v. Bishop, 8 Yerg. 42, 29 Am. Dec. 103, holding unregistered deed of slave to separate use of married woman not void so as to give title to purchaser under mortgage made by her husband; Douglass v. Morford, 8 Yerg. 385, holding a proviso in registration statute in favor of "rights of creditors" referred to creditors of grantor as to whom unregistered bill of sale held void; Baldwin v. Baldwin, 2 Humph. 477, holding unregistered deed of feme sole to trustee for her benefit in contemplation of marriage, not void as to creditors of husband; Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 222, 258, holding unrecorded deed by feme sole intended as a trust, made in contemplation of marriage, not void as to her husband's creditors; Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 398, 14 Am. Dec. 790.

Criticised in dissenting opinion in Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 233; distinguished in Thomas v. Gaines, 1 Gratt. 357, 358, holding deed of marriage settlement not recorded, void as to creditors of husband, though he joined therein. Distinguished in McCandlish v. Keene, 13 Gratt. 637. Rule of construction decided in Harmon v. Oberdorfer, 33 Gratt. 503, against leading case in view of change in statute expressly so settling it. Dec. 358, collecting cases — all holding that erroneous judgment is not open to collateral attack; Harvey v. Tyler, 2 Wall. 340, 342, 343, 17 L. 873, 874, unless it be affirmatively shown that they have no jurisdiction; White v. Crow, 110 U. S. 189, 28 L. 115, 4 S. Ct. 74, even where error consists in entry before expiration of statutory period; Birdsall v. Phillips, 17 Wend. 468, or where error involves a finding as to a jurisdictional fact; Telford v. Barney, 1 G. Greene, 589, rule extends to all judicial acts of court of competent jurisdiction; Kittredge v. Emerson, 15 N. H. 263, and to judgments of sister States; State v. Middlesex, 15 N. J. L. 71, to erroneous process. The doctrine is affirmed in Quesenberry v. Barbour, 31 Gratt. 500, and Jackson v. Astor, 1 Pinn. 158, 39 Am. Dec. 291; and applied in Camberford v. Hall, 3 McCord (S. C.), 346, holding that garnishee cannot take advantage of errors in suit against original debtor; in the following: Applegate v. Lexington Mfg. Co., 117 U. S. 269, 29 L. 896, 6 S. Ct. 748; Wright v. Marsh, 2 G. Greene, 114, and Boker v. Chapline, 12 Iowa, 206, all holding every presumption not inconsistent with the record will be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of such a court; Diehl v. Page, 3 N. J. Eq. 147, and State v. Lewis, 22 N. J. L. 566, rule extends to case where special powers are conferred on court of general jurisdiction and every intendment is in favor of the judgment. The following have been held courts of general jurisdiction within the rule: Borden v. State, 11 Ark. 552, 54 Am. Dec. 242, Johnson v. Beazley, 65 Mo. 259, 27 Am. Rep. 281 (reviewing authorities), Guilford v. Love, 49 Tex. 742, Probate Courts; Pittenger v. Pittenger, 3 N. J. Eq. 167, Orphans' Court; Fort v. Stevens, 17 Wend. 484, 485, Court of Common Pleas; Russell v. Lewis, 3 Or. 383, a County Court in probate matters; and Gresham v. Ewell, 85 Va. 6, 6 S. E. 702, a County Court. Cited in general discussion in Lincoln v. Tower, 2 McLean, 478, F. C. 8,355; Hunt's Heirs v. Ellison's Heirs, 32 Ala. 196, 199; Mosely v. Tuthill, 45 Ala. 652, 6 Am. Rep. 718; Morewood v. Hollister, 6 N. Y. 315; James v. Smith, 2 S. C. 187; Francis v. Washburn, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 301.

On the other hand it has been held in Tolmie v. Thompson, 3 Cr. C. C. 137, F. C. 14,080 (afterwards reversed, 2 Pet. 157), 7 L. 381; Morse v. Presby, 25 N. H. 302, and Werz v. Werz, 11 Mo. App. 35, that where a special jurisdiction has been conferred on a court of general jurisdiction the rule does not apply; Van Doren v. Horton, 25 N. J. L. 207, a court of limited jurisdiction must cause jurisdiction to be shown on the face of the proceedings; Clark v. Holmes, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 394, or its judgment is open to collateral attack; Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 215, 216, Police Courts are courts of inferior jurisdiction; Russell v. Work, 35 N. J. L. 320; Camp v. Woods, 10 Watts, 120, 122, Justices' Courts; Young v. Rathbone, 16 N. J. Eq. 227, 84 Am. Dec. 153, where a judgment is not merely erroneous, but an usurpation of jurisdiction, rule does not apply; Hart v. Seixas, 21 Wend. 55, 57, jurisdiction will not be presumed upon appeal.

Courts.— Inferior courts are technically those whose judgments are subject to revision, but they are not necessarily courts of special and limited jurisdiction, whose judgments are disregarded unless their proceedings show jurisdiction, p. 185.

Appeal and error.— Refusal by lower court to grant motion for new trial is not assignable error, p. 191.

This holding is approved by the following citations: Pomeroy's Lessee v. Bank, 1 Wall. 598, 17 L. 640, declining to entertain bill of exceptions to ruling of lower court, denying motion for new trial; Wright v. Lessee, 1 Pet. 169, 7 L. 98, applying principle to granting of motion to amend pleadings by lower court, refusing to entertain writ of error therefor; Railway Co. v. Twombly, 100 U. S. 81, 25 L. 550, refusing to entertain writ of error for refusal to grant new trial; Earnshaw v. United States, 146 U. S. 68, 36 L. 889, 13 S. Ct. 15, holding exercise of discretion by appraisers in refusing to postpone reappraisement of imported goods in absence of importer, not subject to review; Willis v. Board, 86 Fed. 877, where Circuit Court of Appeals refused to review denial of motion to grant new trial; Chouteau v. Consoue, 1 Mo. 351, refusing to entertain writ of error to correct the decision of lower court claimed to be contrary to evidence, because if error, it was error in fact; M'Courry v. Doremus, 10 N. J. L. 249, holding refusal of lower court to continue cause not error, for which writ of error will lie; Crawford v. Railroad Co., 28 N. J. L. 482, holding refusal to grant leave to amend as to matters of substance not assignable error; Law v. Merrills, 6 Wend. 278, refusing to reverse judgment for refusal to grant a new trial. Cited, generally, in Ringgold's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 9.

Distinguished in Jones v. Van Zandt, 5 How. 224, 12 L. 126, entertaining jurisdiction of cause on certificate of division of opinion in Circuit Court, where division not upon questions urged as reasons for new trial; United States v. Chicago, 7 How. 191, 12 L. 663, entertaining jurisdiction on certificate of division where question of right involved in determining motion for preliminary injunction; Goldsby v. Robertson, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 22, holding refusal to grant motion for new trial assignable as error where new trial was a matter of right; Gilliland v. Rappleyea, 15 N. J. L. 143, holding writ of error did lie where, after order granting plaintiff a new trial, he was non prossed and judgment subsequently entered for defendant; different rule announced in Sorrel v. St. Julien, 4 Mart. (O. S.) (La.) 509, where the Supreme Court of Louisiana entertained appeal from order denying new trial on ground that it was a court of appeals, not merely a court of error.

Instruction to jury.— Court is not bound to construe testimony at the request of the jury, p. 191.

Equity jurisdiction.— United States Supreme Court, following practice in Virginia and Kentucky, will take jurisdiction as court of equity of suit setting up equitable against legal land title, p. 223.

Cited and doctrine applied in Brush v. Ware, 15 Pet. 105, 10 L. 677, where court went behind patent and examined equitable title, in view of peculiar system of Virginia, Kentucky and Ohio; Lorman v. Clarke, 2 McLean, 575, F. C. 8,516, holding, when a right created by statute existed in Michigan enforceable only in equity, the Federal court would take equitable jurisdiction to give effect thereto; Reed v. Bullock, Lit. Sel. Cas. 514, 12 Am. Dec. 349, holding entry for land gave an equitable right which could be set up in a court of chancery; Davis v. Fletcher, 11 La. Ann. 506, holding court had jurisdiction to quiet title in equitable owner against one who held legal title; Ludelling v. Vester, 20 La. Ann. 436, holding court could go behind patent and investigate validity of conflicting titles from their inception; Stephenson v. Smith, 7 Mo. 619, where court of equity took jurisdiction of bill to enjoin ejectment where equitable title set up against legal title of defendant which was alleged to be based on fraud; Lamont v. Stimson, 3 Wis. 556, 62 Am. Dec. 701, holding equity could go behind patent and decree legal title to person having equitable right; Taylor v. Brown, 5 Cr. 255, 256, 3 L. 94, where court took jurisdiction where equitable set up against legal title.

Denied in M'Clung v. Hughes, 5 Rand. 475, holding that in absence of fraud court would not go behind patent to determine title. Distinguished in Maguire v. Tyylor, 40 Mo. 439, denying jurisdiction of court of equity, where junior patent based on confirmation in 1810, attempted to be set up against elder patent based on claim filed in 1806.

Equity.— In all cases in which a court of equity takes jurisdiction it will exercise that jurisdiction in conformity with the settled principles of a court of chancery, p. 223.

Cited and principle applied in Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 210, 8 L. 100, dissenting opinion, contending that exercise of jurisdiction conferred by congress on Federal courts should be in conformity with settled principles of common law, equity, and admiralty, not with the usages, principles and practice of State courts; Hall v. Mining Co., 1 Woods, 547, F. C. 5,955, holding that a Georgia statute providing equitable relief could not be administered by a Federal court, because the mode of proceeding prescribed by the statute was a legal proceeding; Brown v. Buck, 75 Mich. 278, 13 Am. St. Rep. 441, 42 N. W. 828, holding unconstitutional a statute which attempted to transfer the cognizance of equitable questions to a jury; Pittsburgh Co. v. Keokuk Co., 68 Fed. 21, 46 U. S. App. 530, holding that the existence of a legal remedy by State law does not oust Federal court in such State of its equitable jurisdiction when by the settled principles of equity the question is an equitable one; Cropper v. Coburn, 2 Curt. 472, F. C. 3,416, holding that State law by providing a legal remedy cannot deprive parties entitled to come into Federal courts of a remedy which would otherwise exist in equity.

Statutes.— Federal courts conform to State decisions, respecting State laws, p. 222.

Approved and followed in Green v. Neal, 6 Pet. 296, 8 L. 404, where United States Supreme Court conformed to decision of State court upon State statute of limitations; Prentice v. Zane, 19 Fed. Cas. 1272, in argument to support decision that Federal court in Pennsylvania should adopt construction of State statute by State court; Lorman v. Clarke, 2 McLean, 575, F. C. 8,516, where a right created by statute in Michigan was enforceable only in equity there, the Federal court took equitable jurisdiction to give effect thereto; Vaughan v. Phebe, Mart & Y. 24, 17 Am. Dec. 779, holding construction of Virginia law by Virginia court authority for Tennessee court.

Virginia-Kentucky compact.— There is no violation of the compact if laws be neither made nor expounded for the purpose of depriving those protected thereby of their rights, p. 223.

Public lands.— Only such reasonable certainty of entry required as will enable subsequent locator by exercise of due judgment and diligence to locate his own lands on the adjacent residuum, p. 224.

Cited and rule applied in McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 314, in determining conflicting boundaries.

Public lands.— Where description in entry of land claim begins on a road and calls for a distance from a given point on the same road the distance must be measured according to the meanders of the road and not in a straight line, p. 226.

Rule applied in Preeble v. Vanhoozer, 2 Bibb, 120, construing entry to determine boundary where claims conflicting.

Public lands.— In Kentucky where an entry calls for a quantity of land on given side of a road, it is to be surveyed in a square with road as one side, p. 226.

Public lands.— Where one call in an entry is vague and uncertain, but there is enough that is certain to determine the location, the vague part will be discarded, but the certain part will not be vitiated by it, p. 228.

Equity — Public lands.— Where survey of lands in Kentucky upon prior entry confirmed by patent, through inadvertence, includes lands not contained in such entry, but included in subsequent entry and patent, court of equity will decree conveyance of such lands to subsequent locator, p. 234.

Public lands.— Certificate of surveyor is sufficient evidence that warrant was in hands of surveyor at the time of survey, when made under Virginia military land warrants, p. 242.

Cited and affirmed in Craig v. Radford, 3 Wheat. 597, 4 L. 468, holding surveyor's certificate sufficient evidence that warrant was in his possession when survey made; Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 699, 32 L. 569, 9 S. Ct. 206, holding courts have no power to correct surveys except by a direct proceeding; Cohas v. Raisin, 3 Cal. 448, holding that where alcalde of San Francisco granted lands during war with Mexico, grant presumed to be regular; Lambourn v. Hartswick, 13 S. & R. 122, to the effect that where survey regularly returned and party has been in possession for a time analogous to statute of limitations, presumption is in favor of regularity of proceedings.

Public lands.— Virginia act of 1748, requiring surveyor to record survey within two months, is directory merely, and failure so to do does not invalidate title, p. 242.

Affirmed in Craig v. Radford, 3 Wheat. 597, 4 L. 468, holding the same act directory as to the provision therein requiring the surveyor "to see the land plainly bounded by natural bounds or marked trees;" Stringer v. Lessee, etc., 3 Pet. 339, 340, 7 L. 699, 700, holding subsequent Virginia act containing similar provision merely directory and legal title not affected by failure to comply therewith; Garrard v. Silver Peak Mines, 82 Fed. 590, holding a location and record of the survey, though not within time specified by act of congress, valid against one who attempts to acquire adverse title twenty years afterwards; County v. Riddle, 51 Tex. 366, holding survey not forfeited when return not made as required by statute.

Public lands.— It is not necessary under Virginia statute, that the deputy surveyor who made the survey should make out the plat and certify it, it may be done from his notes by his principal, p. 247.

Affirmed in Craig v. Radford, 3 Wheat. 597, 4 L. 468, holding principal surveyor could legally make and certify plat of survey made by his deceased deputy.

Public lands.— Title commences with the survey which is the appropriation, p. 254.

Cited and principle applied in Ashley v. Cramer, 7 Mo. 102, holding title never acquired, where survey never made; McAfee v. Keirn, 7 Smedes & M. 789, 45 Am. Dec. 333, holding patent related back to equitable title acquired by settlement and entry; Silver, etc., Co. v. Clark, 5 Mont. 423, 5 Pac. 581, and Talbot v. King, 6 Mont. 108, 9 Pac. 442, holding junior patent related back to prior location; Wardwell v. Paige, 9 Or. 524, where location made under State law on United States public lands before selection by State, and subsequently and after selection defendant obtained legal title, held that he was trustee for first locator. See also Stark v. Mather, 12 Am. Dec. 568, note.

Equity.— Where one watches for accidental mistakes of others to take advantage of them, equity will not enforce the advantage gained, p. 256.

Cited and applied in Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 700, 32 L. 569, 9 S. Ct. 206, dismissing petition where plaintiffs, discovering error in survey, obtained grant describing land by quantity, township and section and sought to recover from parties holding under old erroneous survey; Deweese v. Reinhard, 165 U. S. 393, 41 L. 760, 17 S. Ct. 343, dismissing bill to enjoin ejectment where plaintiff with knowledge of defendant's possession sought to take advantage of an error.

Equity jurisdiction.— Equity will entertain jurisdiction to establish prior equitable title against subsequent legal title, p. 254.

Principle applied in Stephenson v. Smith, 7 Mo. 619, entertaining jurisdiction of bill to establish equitable against legal title where latter claimed to have been founded on fraud; McAfee v. Keirn, 7 Smedes & M. 789, 45 Am. Dec. 333, holding equitable title acquired by settlement, and patent related back to it; McArthur v. Phoebus, 2 Ohio, 420, when court went behind elder patent and examined equities of parties.

Denied in Virginia by M'Clung v. Hughes, 5 Rand. 476, holding patent established title in absence of fraud; also by French v. Co., 5 Leigh, 666, refusing to entertain bill setting up equitable title against patent. Distinguished in Maguire v. Tyler, 40 Mo. 439.

Local adjudication.— In questions respecting title to real estate Federal courts will follow decisions of State courts, p. 255.

Cited and applied in Prentice v. Zane, 19 Fed. Cas. 1272, where decisions of Pennsylvania courts construing Pennslyvania statute regarded as authority; Vaughan v. Phebe, Mart & Y. 24, holding Virginia court's construction of Virginia statute authority in Tennessee; Green v. Neal, 6 Pet. 296, 8 L. 404, overruling former decision construing Tennessee statute of limitations to conform to subsequent construction of Tennessee court.

Public lands.— Survey not vitiated by including surplus land, p. 253.

Cited in Vanderslice v. Hanks, 3 Cal. 43, holding a grant from Mexican government not vitiated because survey contained surplus; Houston v. Pillow, 1 Yerg. 488, holding title not vitiated, because survey included too much.

Modified in Coan v. Flagg, 123 U. S. 126, 31 L. 111, 8 S. Ct. 51, holding survey fraudulently including more than warrant calls for does not give title against United States, and fraud presumed from very large excess.

Pleading.— Upon demurrer judgment must be against the party who committed the first error in pleading, p. 261.

Principle applied in Morton v. Kirk, 79 Fed. 291, where bill dismissed for substantial defect upon demurrer to response; Stoney

v. McNeile, 1 McCord, 87, where defect in plea was fatal on demurrer to replication; Potter v. Titcomb, 7 Me. 323, adjudging replication bad for failure to allege fraud; Hall v. Williams, 8 Me. 436, holding plea bad on general demurrer to rebutter; Will v. Mattherson, 2 G. Greene, 186, where, on demurrer to replication, plea held bad because statute of limitations pleaded, which was not a bar; Anderson v. Barry, 2 J. J. Marsh. 269, where sufficiency of declaration examined on demurrer to plea.

Distinguished in Aurora, etc. v. West, 7 Wall. 93, 19 L. 46, where objection as to mere matter of form not fatal to replication on demurrer to rejoinder; Jackson v. Rundlet, 1 Wood. & M. 383, F. C. 7,145.

Pleading.— A plea of performance of condition of a bond, without oyer, is bad on demurrer, p. 261.

Cited in Anderson v. Barry, 2 J. J. Marsh. 278, in argument of court that declaration was good, notwithstanding want of profert, to show that oyer may be craved, nevertheless; Clancy v. Dickey, 2 Hawks (N. C.), 515, arguing that bond is not in the record, though profert made, if no oyer craved. See also Polk, etc. v. Bull, 1 Harr. 437, note.

Distinguished in State v. Mayugh, 13 Md. 378, holding such defect can be availed of only by special demurrer.

5 Cr. 262–280, 3 L. 96, HEPBURN v. AULD.

Deed.— After long possession in severalty a deed of partition will be presumed, p. 276.

Principle applied in Scott v. Evans, 1 McLean, 489, F. C. 12,529, holding where statute of limitations was not applicable by reason of nonresidence, plaintiff's title was nevertheless barred by lapse of time; Beardslee v. French, 7 Conn. 128, 18 Am. Dec. 88, where long nonuser of highway held evidence of abandonment; Gaines v. Com, 2 J. J. Marsh. 107, where conveyance presumed from thirty years' possession by purchaser who held bond for title; Kingston v. Leslie, 10 S. & R. 391, holding admissible, evidence of long possession upon which to presume conveyance; Hanes v. Peck, Mart. & Y. 233, where title presumed from more than thirty years' possession.

Distinguished in Ransdale v. Grove, 4 McLean, 284, F. C. 11,570, where mere possession for long time held not ground for the presumption when inconsistent with the evidence.

Specific performance.— Equity will not decree specific performance of part of contract for sale of land where vendor fails to give good title to the rest and it is not fit subject for compensation, p. 278.

Cited and principle applied in Wood v. Mason, 2 Cold. 253, holding vendee of land entitled to rescission where vendor failed to give good title to a part; Lewis v. Yale, 4 Fla. 438, where court refused to give compensation because it was not a case where specific performance could have been granted; Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 139, holding court could not decree compensation where portion of consideration had failed by burning of house on land; Gregoire v. Bulow, Rich. Eq. Cas. 244, where court refused to decree specific performance or grant compensation where there was title outstanding to one-twelfth of the whole tract; Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. 299, 4 L. 244, where court refused to grant relief because neither party able to give good title as to whole of his tract.

Equity.— In equity time may be dispensed with when not material and vendor may compel specific performance of contract for sale of land if able to give good title to the whole thereof at the date of decree, though he could not have done so at proper time for performance, p. 378.

The citations show that a large number of subsequent cases have affirmed and applied this proposition, as follows: Langworth v. Taylor, 1 McLean, 401, F. C. 8,490, holding where vendor guilty of negligence himself and had acquiesced in delays of vendee, time not material and court entertained bill for specific performance; Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. 304, 4 L. 246, note discussing authorities; Wilson v. Tappan, 6 Ohio, 174, holding complainants entitled to specific performance if they could make good title any time before decree; Linn v. McLean, 80 Ala. 368, holding plaintiff, vendor, could make good title any time before date of decree on bill in the nature of specific performance; Chrisman v. Partee, 38 Ark. 60, where a mistake had been made in description of property in deed tendered before trial, held plaintiff entitled to specific performance if he tendered good deed before decree; Brackenridge v. Dawson, 7 Ind. 387, holding offer of performance by vendor when both parties in default and in absence of stipulation making time material entitles him to decree when vendee brings suit for rescission; Tewksbury v. Howard, 138 Ind. 111, 37 N. E. 358, holding vendor entitled to specific performance where good title made out before decree; Lancaster v. Roberts, 144 Ill. 225, 33 N. E. 30, holding, where time expressly made material in contract to sell but subsequently waived by both parties and vendor subsequently makes good title he is entitled to specific performance; Steele v. Branch, 40 Cal. 11, holding where plaintiffs, vendees, agreed to pay off mortgage on land when due, a short delay in paying, granted by mortgagees, did not deprive them of right to specific performance; Mathews v. Gillis, 1 Iowa, 254, holding plaintiff, vendee, entitled to specific performance where, though plaintiff guilty of laches, defendant has not acted on the contract as forfeited; Manning v. Brown, 10 Me. 52, principle applied where held under agreement to convey land on payment of notes at maturity, when plaintiff sued on notes he waived stipulation as to time in agreement to convey; Barnard v. Lee, 97 Mass. 94, holding plaintiff, vendee, entitled to specific performance though he did not tender payment till some days after time fixed by contract; Davidson v. Moss, 5 How. (Miss.) 686, where rescission denied when asked for on ground of failure to give title, when title was made good before decree; Rodman v. Zilley, 1 N. J. Eq. 327, holding vendor entitled to specific performance though deed not tendered till after day named in contract; Oakey v. Cook, 41 N. J. Eq. 364, 7 Atl. 503, where incumbrances on property at time of contract in violation thereof no bar to specific performance if cleared off before decree; Fletcher v. Wilson, 1 Sm. & M. Ch. 389, holding that though vendor could not give title at time of contract and sale, vendee not entitled to rescission when title perfected by time of hearing; Wiswall v. McGowan, 1 Hoff. Ch. 134, holding plaintiff entitled to specific performance where defendant had extended time by parol; Gregoire v. Bulow, Rich. Eq. Cas. 242, where court of equity took jurisdiction of suit for specific performance, notwithstanding plaintiff could not give good title at time of contract; Seymour v. Delancy, 3 Cow. 519, 15 Am. Dec. 284, holding failure to give title on day when contract was to be performed not a bar to specific performance. See note to Johnson v. Evans, 50 Am. Admiralty.—When statute authorizing forfeiture is repealed pending appeal, there can be no decree of condemnation pronounced without special reservation in the statute, p. 283.

Cited in United States v. Four Cases of Lastings, 10 Ben. 374, F. C. 15,145, as an authority on the main proposition, but section 13 of Revised Statutes modified this rule by providing that repeal of statute shall not release any penalty unless it expressly so provides. Statutory construction.—After expiration or repeal of a law no penalty can be enforced or punishment inflicted for violations of law committed while it was in force, p. 284.

The following citing cases affirm this principle and apply it in various ways: Assessor v. Osbornes, 9 Wall. 575, 19 L. 751, holding where jurisdiction depends on statute, suits brought pending its existence abate with its repeal; Maryland v. Baltimore, 3 How. 552, 11 L. 722, if a State repeal a law imposing a penalty, it constitutes a remission of penalty already incurred; Union Iron Co. v. Pierce, 4 Biss. 332, F. C. 14,367, repeal of penal statute defeats pending actions for penalties; United States v. Mann, 1 Gall. 182, F. C. 15,718, penalties incurred under the embargo act are abrogated by the repeal of the embargo; United States v. Van Vliet, 22 Fed. 643, a penal statute cannot be enforced after repeal, though offense was committed before repeal; Moore v. United States, 85 Fed. 468, 56 U. S. App. 477, a conviction under a penal statute applicable to territories cannot be had after abrogation of the statute by admission of the territory, where offense was committed as a State; State v. Tombeckbee Bank, 1 Stew. 349, penalties incurred under statute, though before repeal, cannot be recovered afterwards; Pope v. Lewis, 4 Ala. 489, affirming the foregoing case, a common informer cannot recover penalty where statute has been repealed; George v. State, 39 Ala. 677, a person cannot be convicted of offense committed while a slave under law applicable only to slaves, when law has been since repealed by abrogation of slavery, First National Bank v. Henderson, 101 Cal. 310, 35 Pac. 900, where defense in nature of penalty is erroneously disregarded, repeal of statute pending appeal cures the error; Bank v. State, 12 Ga. 491, 493, right to a penalty is not vested, but may be defeated by repeal of statute before judgment; Western Union v. Smith, 96 Ga. 571, 23 S. E. 900, judgment for a penalty will be set aside where statute is repealed after judgment and order denying new trial but before expiration of time allowed by law to except to the order; Coles v. Madison County, Breese, 158, 12 Am. Dec. 165, county has no vested right in a penalty which may not be taken away before judgment by repeal of statute creating the penalty; Thompson v. Bassett, 5 Ind. 536, to the same effect; Commonwealth v. Cain, 14 Bush (Ky.), 536, an indictment for embezzling funds of bank will be quashed where, pending proceedings, the act creating the penalty expires by limitation; Speckert v. Louisville, 78 Ky. 290, repeal of statute defeats suit for penalty; State v. Baltimore R. R. Co., 12 Gill & J. 437, 38 Am. Dec. 324, repealing of statute defeats suit for penalty; Keller v. State, 12 Md. 326, 71 Am. Dec. 597, repeal of statute creating offense defeats criminal action at any time prior to final affirmance; Saco v. Gurney, 34 Me. 14, repeal of statute defeats suit for penalty; State v. Edward, 5 Mart. (O. S.) 475, judgment of forfeiture will be reversed if statute creating forfeiture is repealed pending proceedings; Teague v. Mississippi, 39 Miss. 520, repeal of statute defeats suit for penalty; Globe v. State Bank, 41 Neb. 181, 59 N. W. 684, rule applies to suit to enforce any obligation imposed solely by statute; Lewis v. Foster, 1 N. H. 62, repeal after judgment and before review defeats action for penalty and judgment will be set aside in higher court; Belvidere v. Warren R. R. Co., 34 N. J. L. 199, repeal of tax statute imposing 12 per cent. penalty for delinquency, prevents recovery of amount of penalty, although original assessment may be enforced; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 229, the right to a defense of usury may be taken away by repeal of statute pending proceedings; Hartung v. People, 22 N. Y. 101, 109, repeal of criminal statute imposing penalty, after conviction, entitles defendant to reversal on appeal; Allen v. Farrow, 2 Bail. 587, repeal defeats a qui tam action; State v.

Cole, 2 McCord (S. C.), 3, repeal of statute releases penalty imposed; Mahoney v. State, 5 Wyo. 524, 63 Am. St. Rep. 67, 42 Pac. 14, repeal of criminal statute, after conviction, pending appeal, entitles defendant to dismissal of action; Sheppard v. State, 1 Tex. App. 524, 28 Am. Rep. 423, where a penal statute is repealed pending appeal, action must be dismissed. The rule is applied by analogy in Hunt v. Jennings, 5 Blackf. 196, 33 Am. Dec. 466, where statute from which court derives jurisdiction in particular case is repealed, the court cannot proceed under repealed statute even in suits pending at the time of repeal unless repealing statute contains saving clause; Butler v. Palmer, 1 Hill, 330, identical with foregoing; G. & O. R. R. Co. v. Patton, 9 W. Va. 658, where procedure is changed pending proceedings should conform to the new law.

Distinguished in Tinker v. Van Dyke, 1 Flipp. 527, F. C. 14,058, distinguishing between penalties imposed and rights conferred by statute; Taylor v. Rushing, 2 Stew. 162, but where penalty has accrued to a private individual he has a vested right, which is not impaired by repeal of statute before recovery of judgment (which was afterwards overruled in Pope v. Lewis, 4 Ala. 493); United States v. Barr, 4 Sawy. 254, F. C. 14,527, rule has been changed by section 13 of revised statutes, so that even a crime may be punished, notwithstanding subsequent repeal of the statute constituting the act a crime; State v. Crusius, 57 N. J. L. 282, 31 Atl. 236, holding that a similar rule of construction has been enacted in New Jersey; Hargrove v. Chambers, 30 Ga. 602, rule has no application to liability of directors of bank imposed as penalty for violation of their charter, such a penalty subsists after expiration of the bank's charter; State v. Taylor, 2 McCord (S. C.), 490, where a statute has been repealed, persons may be punished for offenses committed before its repeal; Nicholas v. Commonwealth, 91 Va. 816, 22 S. E. 508, where jurisdiction to try cases has been taken away after conviction, court is not deprived of power to fix day for carrying sentence into effect, it being merely the execution of an existing judgment. Qualified in State v. Addington, 2 Bail. 519, 23 Am. Dec. 152, holding a repeal after judgment will not defeat execution of the sentence.

Admiralty.— On appeal in admiralty the cause is tried de novo, p. 283.

Cited with approval, Anonymous, 1 Gall. 24, 25, F. C. 444, permitting amendment in Circuit Court; Jay v. Olney, 1 Wood. & M. 271, F. C. 7,236, Circuit Court may increase damages awarded by District Court; The Philadelphian, 60 Fed. 426, 21 U. S. App. 90, additional proof may be introduced in Circuit Court of Appeals; Nelson v. White, 83 Fed. 217, and The M. M. Morrill, 48 U. S. App. 660, holding record on appeal to Circuit Court of Appeals must contain all the evidence so that case may be tried de novo.

The Beeche Dene, 55 Fed. 527, 13 U. S. App. 211, suggests that in prize cases the cause is tried de novo in Supreme Court, in others the practice has been modified by rule. On this point see the following: Gedney v. L'Amistad, 10 Fed. Cas. 151; Vanderheyden v. Reid, 1 Hopk. Ch. 412; Clarke v. Manchester, 56 N. H. 506; Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 647, 22 Pac. 30; Kennon v. Duties.—Where the intention of congress was to distinguish between raw and manufactured copper, copper plates turned up at the edge are exempt from duty, though imported as "raised bottoms," pp. 286, 287.

Cited and applied in Hartranft v. Wiegmann, 121 U. S. 615, 30 L. 1014, 7 S. Ct. 1243, where shells cleaned by acid and ground on an emery wheel were exempt from duty as "shells of every description, not manufactured;" Patton v. United States, 159 U. S. 509, 40 L. 237, 16 S. Ct. 92, holding wool, which had actually undergone the process of scouring, properly classified as imported scoured, although not known commercially as scoured wool; New Orleans v. N. O. Coffee Co., 46 La. Ann. 89, 14 So. 503, holding a corporation producing "brands" of coffee, though a secret, nonpatented, roasting and cooling process, is not a manufacturer, nor exempt as such from the payment of a license.

5 Cr. 287–288, 3 L. 103, RUSH v. PARKER.

Appeal and error.— United States courts will grant time to produce affidavits as to the value of the matter in dispute, p. 287.

Cited in Richmond v. City of Milwaukee, 21 How. 392, 16 L. 72, holding affidavits as to the value shall not be filed after the case has been heard and dismissed for want of jurisdiction, nor at all, if the value of the property appears in the pleadings; The Grace Girdler, 6 Wall. 442, 18 L. 790, to the point that the value of the matter in dispute may be shown by affidavits filed when the question of jurisdiction is raised and holding a liberal practice warranted in admiralty cases; Cattle Co. v. Needham, 137 U. S. 634, 34 L. 800, 11 S. Ct. 209, holding where the nature of the action requires the value of the thing demanded to be stated in the pleadings, affidavits will not be received to vary the value appearing in the record; Davie v. Heyward, 33 Fed. 94, holding where defendant applied for citation in writ of error without stating the value of his interest, while plaintiff's affidavit in opposition showed the amount, the question of the jurisdictional amount must be left to the Supreme Court; in Ringgold's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 24, holding that affidavits shall be received, as to the value of the matter in dispute, when that fact does not appear in the record, in order to fix the amount of appeal bond. Cited approvingly in Harman v. Lynchburg, 33 Gratt. 40.

Federal courts — Jurisdiction.—A Circuit Court has jurisdiction in a suit in equity to stay proceedings upon judgment at law between same parties, though subpœna be served on defendant in another district, pp. 288, 289.

Followed in Jones v. Andrews, 10 Wall. 333, 19 L. 937, affirming jurisdiction of Circuit Court of a bill in equity to enjoin garnishee proceedings at law irrespective of the residence of the parties; French v. Hay, 22 Wall. 252, 22 L. 858, holding in a case removed from a State to the Circuit Court, the Circuit Court may enjoin the complainant from proceeding in any other court; Christmas v. Russel, 14 Wall. 81, 20 L. 763, holding when no party to the original suit had any connection with filing the bill, such bill is original and the Circuit Court has no jurisdiction between citizens of the same State; Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 281, 28 L. 147, 4 S. Ct. 29, holding where goods are attached by process of the Circuit Court, a third party claiming title to the same may file a bill upon equity side of the court, which proceeding will be considered auxiliary; Hatch v. Dorr, 4 McLean, 113, F. C. 6,206, holding a creditor's bill for discovery not an original proceeding and not affected by defendant's change of residence; Cortez Co. v. Thannhauser, 20 Blatchf. 61, 9 Fed. 227, holding suits in equity, brought to stay the prosecution of suits at law, dependent and supplementary merely; McBee v. Railroad Co., 48 Fed. 246, holding the jurisdiction of the court unaffected in an original bill in equity supplementary to an ancillary foreclosure suit which it seeks to oppose; Maitland v. Gibson, 79 Fed. 138, holding a bill filed to enforce the payment of costs against the plaintiff in an equity suit, may be treated as a dependent proceeding; McDonald v. Seligman, 81 Fed. 756, holding a bill in equity to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment obtained in the Circuit Court, is ancillary, and maintainable without diversity of citizenship; Towne v. Smith, 1 Wood. & M. 120, F. C. 14,115, denying to assignee of insolvents a perpetual injunction against attachment issuing out of the Circuit Court; Dunlap v. Stetson, 4 Mason, 361, F. C. 4,164, holding suit for relief upon judgment an auxiliary proceeding; Clarke v. Navigation Co., 1 Story, 540, F. C. 2,859, sustaining jurisdiction of Admiralty Court in proceeding in rem irrespective of residence of claimants; Williams v. Byrne, Hemp. 473, F. C. 17,718, holding a bill to enjoin judgment in Circuit Court not an original bill. Cited in general discussion, Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. 460, 16 L. 752, and approved; Bank v. Leland, 17 Fed. Cas. 60, arguendo; 76 Am. Dec. 223, note; Davis v. Packard, 10 Wend. 55.

Appearance — Courts.— The entering of an appearance by defendant is an admission of a due and effectual service, p. 288.

Cited and rule followed in Segle v. Thomas, 3 Blatchf. 15, F. C. 12,633, holding that a defendant appearing and answering a bill in equity cannot object upon the hearing that he was not served with process; Flanders v. Insurance Co., 3 Mason, 160, F. C. 4,852, holding a corporation, having entered a general appearance in a suit brought in another State, waived objection to the service; Harrison v. Rowan, 1 Pet. C. C. 491, F. C. 6,140, holding eleventh section of judiciary act not a denial of jurisdiction but a grant of a privilege to defendant, which he waives by voluntary appearance; Winans v. Railroad Co., 6 Blatchf. 219, F. C. 17,862, holding where defendant corporation removed a case to the Circuit Court, and entered an appearance thereon, it waived the question of service; Reinstadler v. Reeves, 33 Fed. 310, holding defendants, by formal appearance in another State, waive right to service in district in which they reside; Shainwald v. Davids, 69 Fed. 702, denying sufficiency of service upon law firm in an original proceeding; Lee v. Ætna Ins. Co., 15 Fed. Cas. 141, holding process of the court served upon a corporation in another State, effectual where such corporation has filed a consent that process shall be valid if so served; Wilson v. Pierce, 30 Fed. Cas. 154, to the point that right to be served in district of residence is personal and may be waived by general appearance. Cited in note to Hilton v. Miller, 14 Ind. 588,

5 Cr. 289–302, 3 L. 104, HARRISON v. STERRY.

Conflict of laws.— While the law of the place where contract is made is, generally speaking, law of the contract, right of priority is a privilege dependent on the place where the property lies, p. 299.

This case is the leading case on this subject, and its doctrine has been followed by the courts, as well as extended by analogy. It is cited and the principle applied in Smith v. Union Bank, 5 Pet. 523, 8 L. 214, and Bank v. Smith, 4 Cr. C. C. 35, 37, F. C. 14,362, holding priority of decedent's debts to be determined by law of place where property is found; Burrows v. Hannegan, 1 McLean, 316, F. C. 2,206, lex loci applies to assignments; Le Prince v. Guillemot, 1 Rich. Eq. 213, marriage settlement constituting lien in France is valid contract here, but the lien gives no priority over American creditors; The Trenton, 4 Fed. 665, sale of vessel under proceedings in rem, extinguishes lien acquired in another jurisdiction; Underwriters' Wrecking Co. v. The Katie, 3 Woods, 186, F. C. 14,342, mortgage on vessel in home port has priority over a previous lien in foreign jurisdiction; Donald v. Hewitt, 33 Ala. 545, 546, 73 Am. Dec. 433, lien of attaching creditor in one State preferred to prior lien in foreign State; Crowell v. Skipper, 6 Fla. 583, although contract is construed according to lex loci contractus, property rights under it are subject to the regulations of the country into which the property affected may be brought; Hardeman v. Downer, 39 Ga. 438, held by analogy, that homestead and exemption laws do not impair obligation of contract, quoting and approving this case at length; Lee v. Creditors, 2 La. Ann. 604, foreign lienholder accorded no priority in local insolvency proceedings; Corbett v. Littlefield, 84 Mich. 35, 22 Am. St. Rep. 684, 47 N. W. 582, subsequent attachment takes priority over foreign chattel mortgage; Saunders v. Williams, 5 N. H. 215, subsequent attachment preferred to foreign assignment in insolvency; Dalton v. Currier, 40 N. H. 248; and also Dunlap v. Rogers, 47 N. H. 287, 93 Am. Dec. 435, holding same as preceding case; Johnson v. Hunt, 23 Wend. 90, property taken by absconding debtor to foreign State and then transferred to citizen of that State will not be affected by involuntary subsequent assignment in State from which he fled nor can it be seized if brought again within its jurisdiction; Hall v. Harris, 11 Tex. 310, lien acquired by wife by marriage contract in Louisiana will be deferred to lien acquired subsequently by trustee under law of Texas. Cited, generally, in discussion in In re Sun Ins. Co., 22 Fed. 115; Handrick v. Andrews, 9 Port. 27, collecting authorities; Weinstein v. Freyer, 93 Ala. 261, 9 So. 286; Leake v. Gilchrist, 2 Dev. 80; Dow v. Rowell, 12 N. H. 50; Hardeman v. Downer, 39 Ga. 428; Sherill v. Hopkins, 1 Cow. 108.

Some courts have ruled adversely to the foregoing: Watts v. Kilburn, 7 Ga. 350, holding removal of property to foreign State and voluntary sale there will not defeat previously acquired judgment lien if property is brought back to State from whence removed; Colt v. O'Callaghan, 2 La. Ann. 985, where a vendor acquires no privilege under the law of the place of sale he acquires none by translation of the property to a place where law gives such privilege to contracts made there. The principal case is distinguished in Taylor v. Boardman, Jr., 25 Vt. 591, holding that lien acquired by chattel mortgage upon personal property in foreign State will be enforced where property has been wrongfully removed from State, even as against attaching creditors.

Bankruptcy.— The United States are entitled to priority independent of whether claim proved or not, p. 299.

Cited in Lewis v. United States, 92 U. S. 622, 23 L. 514, holding United States need not prove claim, in bankruptcy proceedings; Thelluson v. Smith, 1 Pet. C. C. 198, F. C. 13,878, United States takes priority over judgment creditors; United States v. Lewis, 26 Fed. Cas. 925. See S. C., 13 Bank. Reg. 33, United States need not prove debt in insolvency prior to filing bill to enforce priority; Commonwealth v. Lewis, 6 Binn. 274, and Willing v. Bleecker, 2 S. & R. 228, United States takes priority over foreign attachment, where no right of property has been acquired. Cited, in general, discussion in note to United States v. Howland, 4 Wheat. 120, 4 L. 530; in dissenting opinion, Merrill v. Nat. Bk. of Jacksonville, 173 U. S. 177, as to distribution of dividends of bankrupt national bank.

Insolvency.— In case of a contract made with foreigners in a foreign country, the bankrupt laws of the foreign country are incapable of operating a legal transfer of property in United States, p. 302.

Cited and principle applied in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 361, 6 L. 657, holding discharge in insolvency not a bar against action by citizen of another State in Federal courts; In re Klein, 1 How.

280, 11 L. 132, 14 Fed. Cas. 717, discharge in one sovereignty is not recognized in another except upon principles of comity; Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 337, 15 L. 170, discussing effect of assignment under foreign law; Security Trust Co. v. Dodd Mead, 173 U. S. 629, holding assignment under Minnesota insolvent law unavailing to prevent attachment of Massachusetts personalty by a New York creditor; Towne v. Smith, 1 Wood. & M. 131, 137, F. C. 14,115, States held foreign within the rule; Betton v. Valentine, 1 Curt. 172, F. C. 1,370, holding assignee in Massachusetts not authorized to represent creditors in Rhode Island for the purpose of setting aside conveyance void as to them; The Watchman, 1 Ware, 237, F. C. 17,251, local attaching creditor has priority over foreign assignee for benefit of creditors; Perry Mfg. Co. v. Brown, 2 Wood. & M. 454, 465, 466, 467, F. C. 11,015, right of attachment exists until assignee takes possession; Woodhull v. Wagner, 1 Bald. 301, F. C. 17,975, discharge in one State does not protect from arrest in another; McCarty v. Hall, 13 Mo. 483, State will not suffer property to be withdrawn under foreign laws of administration which may be necessary to satisfy debts due its citizens; Abraham v. Plestoro, 3 Wend. 549, 559, 562, 20 Am. Dec. 742, 751, 753, foreign assignment in insolvency does not operate to transfer title to goods on the high seas at the time, even as against bankrupt, it not appearing that the vessel carrying them belonged to the foreign country in question (reversing Plestoro v. Abraham, 1 Paige Ch. 237); Lehmer v. Herr. 1 Duv. (Ky.) 362; Willitts v. Waite, 25 N. Y. 586, collecting authorities and holding foreign assignee in bankruptcy takes property subject to claims of local attaching creditors; Milne v. Moreton, 6 Binn. 364, 371, 372, 6 Am. Dec. 471, 478, 479, collecting authorities; Goodsell v. Benson, 13 R. I. 247, 250, insolvency laws have no extra-territorial effect, collecting and reviewing authorities; In re Bugbee, 4 Fed. Cas. 610, 9 Bank. Reg. 261, attaching creditor has priority over foreign assignee; Pugh v. Bussel, 2 Blackf. 401, discharge in insolvency has no extra-territorial effect as to contracts not made and to be performed there or citizens of other States; Olivier v. Townes, 2 Mart. (La.) (N. S.) 101, local attachment prevails over prior assignment unaccompanied by delivery, although such assignment would have been valid by the law of the assignor's domicile; Fox v. Adams, 5 Me. 254, local attachment has priority over previous foreign assignment in insolvency; Carrier's Case, 2 Bland Ch. 497, 498, property of decedent may be detained in country where situated in opposition to foreign administration or bankrupt laws; Blake v. Williams, 6 Pick. 309, 310, 17 Am. Dec. 378, 380, local attachment has priority over foreign assignment in bankruptcy; Cross v. Brown, 19 R. I. 238, 33 Atl. 153, local attaching creditor preferred to foreign assignee in bankruptcy; Topham v. Chapman, 1 Mill. 286, 12 Am. Dec. 629, holding similarly.

Cited in general discussion in Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 330, 12 L. 459; Brooks v. Marbury, 11 Wheat. 102, note; 6 L. 430; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 362, 6 L. 657; Meeker v. This case has been distinguished on this point by some courts; Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. 627, 21 L. 437, the property of bankrupt being a vessel on the high seas at time of assignment, held title passed to assignee in State to which vessel belonged (reversing Kelly v. Crapo, 45 N. Y. 91, 6 Am. Rep. 37); Ex parte Norwood, 3 Biss. 512, F. C. 10,364, receiver under foreign jurisdiction may prove debt in another jurisdiction; criticised in In re Republic Ins. Co., 20 Fed. Cas. 549, receiver of corporation allowed to prove debt in foreign insolvency proceedings; Robinson v. Rapelye, 2 Stew. 101, assignment for benefit of creditors in New York, held valid in Alabama against local attaching creditor; Wilson v. Matthew, 32 Ala. 346, where court of Alabama gave effect to insolvency, discharge obtained in Louisiana as against a resident of Louisiana who participated in the insolvency proceedings; Frank v. Bobbitt, 155 Mass. 115, 29 N. E. 210, where prior foreign assignment was upheld to exclusion of subsequent attachment of foreign creditor; questioned on this point by Chancellor Kent, in Holmes v. Remsen, 4 Johns. Ch. 488, 8 Am. Dec. 596, which was afterwards disapproved on this point in Holmes v. Remsen, 20 Johns. 266, 11 Am. Dec. 280; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 344, receiver of insolvent corporation may sue in foreign State where he does not come into conflict with creditors resident in that State; Long v. Girdwood, 150 Pa. St. 418, 24 Atl. 711, domestic court will not give foreign attaching creditor priority over foreign assignment. Commented on Lehmer v. Herr, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 362; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 350; Weider v. Maddox, 66 Tex. 376, 59 Am. Rep. 620, 1 S. W. 170; but a voluntary assignment made in foreign State, valid according to the laws of State where property is situated had it been made there, will be upheld; Dana v. Lull, 17 Vt. 395, one of two partners may not assign all the property of the firm for the benefit of its creditors and then put an end to the firm; Peck v. Hibbard, 26 Vt. 704, 62 Am. Dec. 609, discharge by insolvency proceedings in the country where an obligation is created is a valid defense to the obligation wherever sued upon; Hanford v. Paine, 32 Vt. 456, 78 Am. Dec. 591, distinguishing between voluntary and involuntary assignment, and holding former valid even as against local attaching creditors; Mowry v. Crocker, 6 Wis. 331, a foreign voluntary assignment is valid as against attaching creditor of same foreign State.

Fraudulent conveyance.— An instrument executed in contemplation of insolvency and in fraud of the bankrupt act is void, p. 301.

Cited in Kahn v. Salmon, 10 Sawy. 198, 20 Fed. 811, assignment for the benefit of creditors held void when, by confessing judgment, assignor had previously put the bulk of his property out of his possession; Receivers, etc. v. Paterson Bank, 10 N. J. Eq. 18, assignment of notes in contemplation of insolvency for the purpose of preferring one creditor, held void.

Bankruptcy.— Where bankruptcy proceedings are against one only of two partners assignee acquires only his interest in partnership property, p. 302.

Cited in Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. 406, 22 L. 805, holding in bankruptcy against individual partner only his interest in partnership property passes; Clarke v. Stanwood, 166 Mass. 381, 44 N. E. 537, discussing, generally, rights of creditors where one partner only is insolvent. Cited, arguendo, Winship v. Bank, 5 Pet. 576, 8 L. 233.

Equitable assignment.— Equity will support an equitable assignment, p. 300.

Cited in Houston v. Nowland, 7 Gill & J. 493, holding an equitable assignment of an interest in lands which leaves nothing but the dry legal title in the assignor is valid to defeat an attachment of the land in suit against the assignor.

Contracts.— Right of priority is no part of a contract. It is extrinsic and dependent on the lex fori, p. 298.

Cited and approved in McLure v. Menton, 24 S. C. 568, 58 Am. Rep. 276, where it is held that law changing the priority of payment of decedent's debts did not impair the obligation of a contract; Baldwin v. Buswell, 52 Vt. 64, nor a law changing right of priority under attachment.

Partnership.— One partner may make a valid assignment in bankruptcy of the partnership effects, when the other is absent from the country, p. 300.

Approved and principle applied in Forbes v. Scannell, 13 Cal. 288; Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 1 N. Mex. 68; dissenting opinion, collecting authorities and holding partner may make general assignment in absence of other partner; Egberts v. Wood, 3 Paige Ch. 525, 24 Am. Dec. 242, partner may make valid assignment preferring one partnership creditor without concurrences of his partners; Mabbett v. White, 12 N. Y. 454, partner may sell all partnership property to creditor in payment of debt without consulting other partners; Clafflin Co. v. Evans, 55 Ohio St. 192, 60 Am. St. Rep. 689, 45 N. E. 4, partner may make assignment when he is "managing" partner; Deckard v. Case, 5 Watts, 24, 30 Am. Dec. 289, may make assignment of all partnership property if transaction is bona fide; Hennessy v. Western Bank, 6 Watts & S. 311, 40 Am. Dec. 562, holding two partners have power to make assignment of partnership property in absence of third partner; White v. Union Ins. Co., 1 Nott & McC. 560, 9 Am. Dec. 727, surviving partner may assign effects of firm to third person for purpose of paying firm debts; Robinson v. Crowder, 4 McCord, 537, 17 Am. Dec. 766, partner may make valid assignment for purpose of paying debts. Cited in passing, Gordon v. Cannon, 18 Gratt. 404, as to authority of partner to execute such assignment; Rumery v. McCulloch, 54 Wis. 572, 12 N. W. 68, partner has authority to execute assignment for benefit of creditors where other partner has departed the country. Cited in general discussion, in Bohler v. Tappan, 1 McCrary, 135, 1 Fed. 470; Robards v. Waterman, 96 Mich. 235, 55 N. W. 663; Moore v. Stevens, 60 Miss. 816; Boswell v. Green, 25 N. J. L. 396. And see 48 Am. Rep. 359, note; Stegall v. Coney, 49 Miss. 770.

Distinguished in Bowen v. Clark, 1 Biss. 132, F. C. 1,721, holding rule not applicable where other partner has given express notice that he will not be bound; Ex parte Hartz, 11 Fed. Cas. 723, decree in bankruptcy cannot be rendered on voluntary petition of partner, unless all unite; qualified in Kirby v. Ingersoll, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 185, holding rule does not apply when other partner is on the ground and can be consulted; Kirby v. Ingersoll, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 486, 490, 501, affirming the preceding case on appeal and collecting authorities; Havens v. Hussey, 5 Paige, 32, partner has not authority to make general assignment without consent of copartners; Hutchinson v. Smith, 7 Paige, 26, but he may not assign partnership property in preference of individual creditor after death of one of the partners; Mabbett v. White, 12 N. Y. 460, dissenting opinion, limiting rule to partial assignments, the other partner being absent from the country; Sloan v. Moore, 37 Pa. St. 223, partner may not assign all of partnership property pending dissolution, the other party being accessible and not assenting; In re Daniels, 14 R. I. 501, limiting rule to case where partner not uniting in assignment is inaccessible; Sibley v. Young, 26 S. C. 419, 2 S. E. 317, holding by analogy that partner is not bound by sealed instrument executed by his partner.

Federal courts.— The courts of the United States have jurisdiction over suits between citizens of the same State, when plaintiffs are nominal plaintiffs for the use of an alien, p. 303.

The following citing cases affirm and apply this principle: McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 14, 15, 11 L. 161, holding citizens of other States entitled to sue upon sheriff's bond in Federal courts sitting in Mississippi, though such suits are required to be taken in the name of the governor; Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. 499, 15 L. 196, holding that in a suit between States to establish their boundary, the attorney-general may intervene on behalf of the United States; Wood v. Davis, 18 How. 469, 15 L. 461, where the real parties at interest resided out of the State, and the nominal parties were mere special agents; Rice v. Houston, 13 Wall. 67, 20 L. 484, holding executors or administrators to be real parties in interest and entitled as such to maintain actions against citizens of other States; Walden v. Skinner, 101 U. S. 589, 25 L. 968, holding jurisdiction of the Circuit Court not defeated because joined with the defendant as nominal parties, are the executors of a deceased trustee, citizens of the same State as complainant; Maryland v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 491, 28 L. 823, 5 S. Ct. 279, holding a suit on an administrator's bond taken in the name of the State is to be regarded, for purposes of jurisdiction, as taken in the name of the party for whose benefit it is brought; Stewart v. Railroad Co., 168 U. S. 449, 42 L. 539, 18 S. Ct. 106, holding the administrator of a deceased person but a nominal party to a suit for damages for the benefit of the widow; Patterson v. Mater, 26 Fed. 32, where goods in possession of a marshal were taken by State process, and bond given for their return, holding marshal may maintain an action in the Federal courts irrespective of the question of citizenship between himself and obligors; Sioux City Ry. Co. v. Chicago Ry. Co., 27 Fed. 772, holding a sheriff and other officials, named as joint defendants in an equity bill, are to be considered mere nominal parties in absence of averments to the contrary; Wade v. Wortsman, 29 Fed. 757, holding a marshal having no interest in a suit save the proper performance of his official duty, not a party in interest, and his residence in no way material; Ferguson v. Ross, 38 Fed. 163, holding a suit brought by an individual in his official capacity as shore inspector against a citizen of another State, might not be removed from the State court, the real plaintiff being the State of New York; Goodnow v. Leichfield, 47 Fed. 753, 4 McCrary, 216, where a petition for removal alleged that plaintiff, a citizen of same State as defendant, was only a nominal party; Carver v. Trust Co., 73 Fed. 12, holding a defendant dropped from the case, in the State court, as having no interest in it is to be regarded as a mere formal party; Missouri v. Bowles Mill. Co., 80 Fed. 161, suit on attachment bond in name of State a nominal party, held not to oust Circuit Court's jurisdiction.

Cited also in Governor v. Ball, Hemp. 545, F. C. 530, holding action upon administration bond payable to the governor by name, must be brought in the name of the governor for the time being; Middlebrooks v. Insurance Co., 14 Conn. 310, applies this rule where the secretary of a foreign corporation, who was temporarily within the State, was served with summons — held, that he was not real party in interest, and the corporation might not be sued in State court; Clarey v. Marshall, 4 Dana, 97, it appearing from the record that the court had jurisdiction, no exception can be taken after verdict; Cooke v. Bank, 52 N. Y. 113, 11 Am. Rep. 678, holding a suit might be removed to Federal court upon the application of one defendant, the others not being necessary parties; Hadley v. Dunlap, 10 Ohio St. 6, holding right of defendants to remove cause into the Circuit Court, cannot be taken away by joining with them an unnecessary defendant, resident in State where suit is brought. Cited in Sands v. Smith, 1 Dill. 294, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 372, F. C. 12,305, discussing removal of causes; Heriot v. Davis, 2 Wood. & M. 223, F. C. 6,404, as to whether those voluntarily appearing are to be regarded as parties for jurisdictional purposes; Foss v. Bank, 1 McCrary, 477, 3 Fed. 187, arguendo; Goodnow v. Litchfield, 4 McCrary, 216, 47 Fed. 753, approving the rule; In re Barry, 42 Fed. 122, F. C. 1,059, discussing Circuit Court jurisdiction.

Commented upon and explained, and question of when parties are nominal parties discussed in Coal Co. v. Blatchford, 11 Wall. 176, 177, 20 L. 181, holding trustees suing for benefit of others form no exception to the rule, and must be considered as parties in interest; Knapp v. Railroad Co., 20 Wall. 123, 22 L. 331, holding suit by trustees for bondholders of a railroad company cannot be removed to the Circuit Court, the defendant being a corporation resident in same State as trustees; New Orleans v. Gaine's Administrator, 138 U. S. 607, 34 L. 1106, 11 S. Ct. 431, holding one pursuing an equitable right, based upon her own claims and by subrogation by operation of law, stands upon her own citizenship irrespective of the citizenship of the persons to whose rights she is subrogated.

The principal case is distinguished in Irvine v. Lowry, 14 Pet. 300, 10 L. 465, holding in suit for payment of "office notes," jurisdiction is determined by the citizenship of the parties to the record, even though the contract may have been assigned; United States v. Myers, 2 Brock. 523, F. C. 15,844, holding a nominal party to be one to whom nothing is due — in this case action was upon unpaid custom duties and the plaintiff is a party in interest; Dodge v. Perkins, 4 Mason, 438, F. C. 3,954, holding where an administrator sues as such, and is a citizen of the same State as the defendant, the court has no jurisdiction, although intestate was a citizen of another State; Ward v. Arredondo, 1 Paine, 412, F. C. 17,148, holding one receiving a deed in trust to be delivered at his discretion upon the payment of a sum of money, is a party in interest in a suit to compel delivery of the deed; Texas v. Lewis, 12 Fed. 3, holding in a suit by a State against an individual who was merely a nominal party, the real parties at interest being aliens might remove the case to the Circuit Court; in same case, upon rehearing, 14 Fed. 67; in Harper v. Norfolk & W. R. R. Co., 36 Fed. 103, 104, holding an administrator a real party to a suit, and question of jurisdiction determined by his residence, and not intestate's; Reinach v. Railroad Co., 58 Fed. 37, holding a suit to foreclose, brought by an alien mortgage bondholder, is maintainable in a Federal court although the legal title is in a citizen of the same State as some of the defendants; Shipp v. Williams, 62 Fed. 6, 22 U. S. App. 380, holding no jurisdiction in Federal courts, of a bill by beneficiary under a deed of trust, against debtor and trustee to foreclose the deed, where trustee and debtor are citizens of the same State; Calderwood v. Braly, 28 Cal. 99, holding that all defendants must be aliens or citizens of another State or cause cannot be removed to Circuit Court; Vimont v. Railway Co., 64 Iowa, 517, 518, 17 N. W. 32, 33, 64 Iowa, 524, 21 N. W. 12, distinguishes principal case, asserting the plaintiff there to be a mere conduit, through whom the parties aggrieved were to seek their remedy, and holding a trustee the real party in interest; Miller v. Sunde, 1 N. Dak. 4, 44 N. W. 302, holding the citizenship of an administrator determines the question of diverse citizenship on which Federal jurisdiction depends; Robb v. Parker, 3 S. C. 70, where assignees of a bond sued thereon in a State court, in their own names, holding question of Federal jurisdiction depends upon the citizenship of assignees; Geyer v. Life Ins. Co., 50 N. H. 233, 9 Am. Rep. 187, holding a suit brought by an administrator against a citizen of the same State cannot be removed to the United States courts; Dunn v. Waggoner, 3 Yerg. 59, holding trustees in whom the legal interest is vested are parties in interest so as to oust the Federal courts of jurisdiction. Criticised and rule denied in dissenting opinion, McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 24, 26, 11 L. 165, 166, holding jurisdiction not affected by joinder of nominal parties. Cited in Gill v. Stebbins, 2 Paine, 419, F. C. 5,431, as being overruled in Osborne v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 856, 6 L. 232, where the rule is laid down that the jurisdiction is determined by the relative situation of the parties named on the record.

Federal courts.—Although plaintiff be described as an alien, yet defendant must be expressly stated to be a citizen of a particular State to give Federal courts jurisdiction, p. 304.

Cited in dissenting opinion, McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 22, 11 L. 164, majority holding fact that governor and party sued on bond are citizens of the same State will not oust court of jurisdiction; dissenting opinion, Marshall v. Railroad Co., 16 How. 340, 13 L. 964, majority holding citizen of one State can sue in Federal courts a corporation averred to have been created in another; Shaw v. Mining Co., 145 U. S. 447. 36 L. 770, 12 S. Ct. 936, holding, under act of March 3, 1887, a corporation incorporated in one State cannot be compelled to answer in the Circuit Court held in another State, where its usual place of business is, to a suit by a citizen of a different State; The Fideliter, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 579, 1 Sawy. 156, F. C. 4,755, holding libel defective for not alleging a seizure; Donaldson v. Hazen, Hemp. 424, F. C. 3,984, holding jurisdictional facts must be set forth in the pleadings; Blair v. Manufacturing Co., 7 Neb. 154, holding jurisdictional facts as to citizenship must appear on the record; Herndon v. Insurance Co., 107 N. C. 195, 12 S. E. 242, holding fact that defendant is a foreign corporation does not render unnecessary the allegation of the citizenship of the plaintiffs.

Distinguished in Commercial Bank v. Green, 2 Flipp. 182, F. C. 3,059, holding service upon defendant as citizen of one State when, in fact, he was citizen of another, did not oust jurisdiction.

Federal courts.— Jurisdiction of, is limited by the Constitution, p. 304.

Approved and applied in In re Barry, 136 U. S. 609, 34 L. 508, holding District Court has no authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus to restore an infant to father, unlawfully detained by grandparents; Florence S. M. Co. v. Machine Co., 110 Mass. 81, holding suit in which a defendant and plaintiff are citizens of the same State cannot be removed; Pooley v. Lucco, 72 Fed. 561; Orosco v. Gagliardo, 22 Cal. 85, and Roberts v. Knight, 7 Allen, 451, all holding Federal courts without jurisdiction of suits between aliens.

Amendment.— Record, defective for not showing defendants citizens of some particular State, was amended by consent, p. 304.

Cited in Glover v. Shepperd, 11 Biss. 580, 15 Fed. 838, holding if requisite citizenship actually exists, petition may be amended.

5 Cr. 304–311, 3 L. 108, KEENE v. UNITED STATES.

Duties.— Jurisdiction of District Court over causes of seizure does not attach unless there has been an open seizure by one with authority, p. 310.

Rule applied in The Fideliter, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 578, 1 Sawy. 155, F. C. 4,755, dismissing libel.

Duties — Seizure.— Court of district in which a seizure is made on land has jurisdiction to try question of forfeiture, p. 310.

Principle applied in United States v. Bark Reindeer, 2 Cliff. 69, F. C. 16,144, holding vessel could be condemned by court of district where she was seized; The Washington, 29 Fed. Cas. 338, holding to authorize District Court to condemn, the first seizure must be within its district. Cited in Tug May, 6 Biss. 249, note, F. C. 9,330, and dissenting opinion, Slocum v. Wheeler, 1 Conn. 448.

Miscellaneous.— Cited in Blanchard v. Sprague, 3 Sumn. 284, F. C. 1,517.

5 Cr. 311–313, 3 L. 110, UNITED STATES v. RIDDLE.

Certificate of probable cause.— A doubt concerning the construction of a law of seizure may authorize a certificate of probable cause, p. 313.

Cited in Averill v. Smith, 17 Wall. 92, 21 L. 616, and Stacey v. Emery, 97 U. S. 646. 24 L. 1036, holding trespass will not lie against a collector of internal revenue, where a certificate of probable cause has been granted; United States v. Ship Recorder, 2 Blatchf. 121, F. C. 16,130, granting certificate, where seizure was under construction of act given by attorney-general; The Active, Deady, 176, F. C. 33, allowing certificate where seizure was within the letter of the act; Schooner Friendship, 1 Gall. 112, F. C. 5,125, holding a doubt of the law is proper cause for a certificate of probable cause; United States v. Rings, 1 Sprague, 298, F. C. 16,572, granting certificate of reasonable cause, for doubts of the law; Ship La Manche, 2 Sprague, 215, 224, F. C. 8,004, holding captors not liable, where vessel presents probable cause for capture; United States v. Cable, 27 Fed. Cas. 266, giving certificate where seizure was made in good faith in the belief that the law was being violated; United States v. Reindeer, 27 Fed. Cas. 768, granting certificate, where there were doubts as to the construction of the law; United States v. Cloth, 28 Fed. Cas. 108; and United States v. Horse, 22 Vt. 657, allowing certificate where seizure was under circumstances warranting suspicion.

Revenue laws.— The attempt, not the intention, to defraud is punishable, p. 312.

Affirmed and applied in United States v. Packages, Gilp. 325, F. C. 16,561, holding making up of a false invoice, at place of exportation, is not an offense, until followed up by an actual attempt; United States v. Batchelder, 24 Fed. Cas. 1037, holding declaration defective, because it did not allege that the defendant made the entry upon the false invoice.

5 Cr. 313–320, 3 L. 111, HIMELY v. ROSE.

Appeal and error.— Upon an appeal from proceedings under a mandate, directed to a lower court, nothing is before the court, but the proceedings subsequent to the mandate, p. 314.

The following citing cases affirm and variously apply this principle: The Santa Maria, 10 Wheat. 442, 446, 6 L. 361, 362, holding interest or damages could not be given by Circuit Court in the execution of a mandate, where same had not been decreed by Supreme Court upon the original appeal; Boyce v. Grundy, 9 Pet. 290, 9 L. 132, holding Circuit Court could not, in carrying out the decree, allow interest, where court in affirming decree allowed none;

Ex parte Sibbald v. United States, 12 Pet. 492, 9 L. 1169, holding inferior court can examine mandate for no other purpose than execution; Washington B. Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. 424, 425, 11 L. 663, 664, holding Supreme Court has no power to review its own decision in a cause; Corning v. Factory, 15 How. 466, 14 L. 775, dismissing appeal, where court below had not acted on the mandate; Roberts v. Cooper, 20 How. 481, 15 L. 974, and Supervisors v. Kennicott, 94 U. S. 499, 24 L. 260, holding writ of error brings up for revision nothing but the proceedings subsequent to the mandate; Tyler v. Maguire, 17 Wall. 284, 21 L. 583. holding this court could examine into the sufficiency of the reason of the State court for not executing its mandate; Stewart v. Salamon, 97 U. S. 362, 24 L. 1045, dismissing appeal from decree of Circuit Court passed in exact accordance with the mandate of this court upon a previous appeal; Clark v. Keith, 106 U. S. 465, 27 L. 302, 1 S. Ct. 569, and Chaffin v. Taylor, 116 U. S. 572, 29 L. 729, 6 S. Ct. 520, holding whatever was examined here on writ of error cannot be re-examined upon a subsequent writ; In re W. & G. R. R. Co., 140 U. S. 97, 35 L. 342, 11 S. Ct. 674, where affirming judgment said nothing about interest, judgment on mandate should not have allowed it; Metcalf v. Watertown, 68 Fed. 861, 34 U. S. App. 107, holding where judgment on mandate determines questions not covered thereby, it is subject to review; Republican Min. Co. v. Mining Co., 79 Fed. 735, 48 U. S. App. 218, holding appellate court is not bound to consider any of the questions, which were before it on the first writ of error; Fortenberry v. Frazier, 5 Ark. 202, 39 Am. Dec. 374, holding after a case has been remanded and is again brought before the Supreme Court, nothing is before the court for adjudication but proceedings subsequent to the mandate; Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Cal. 83, and Davenport v. Kleinschmidt, 8 Mont. 480, 20 Pac. 826, holding decision of Supreme Court cannot be reviewed; Roberts v. Haggart, 4 Dak. 212, 29 N. W. 656, holding a rehearing cannot be granted after final judgment and adjournment of term; Semple v. Anderson, 4 Gil. (Ill.) 562, holding court will not go behind its former adjudication even though it appear of record that the court acted without jurisdiction; Dodge v. Gaylord, 53 Ind. 369, holding second appeal brings up for review only proceedings subsequent to the reversal; Hey v. Schooley, 7 Ohio (2d pt.), 49, holding a final decree to sell mortgage premises is not opened by an appeal from decree affirming sale; Overton v. Bigelow, 10 Yerg. 53, holding that rehearing of cause cannot be allowed at a subsequent term, although cause was retained for taking an account; Chambers v. Hodges, 3 Tex. 529, holding, after close of term, court cannot revise decree; Silva v. Pickard, 14 Utah, 251, 47 Pac. 146, holding that decision of Supreme Court will not be reviewed; dissenting opinion, State v. Circuit Court, 71 Wis. 610, 38 N. W. 199, majority holding lower court can grant a new trial, though denial of previous motion for new trial has been affirmed by Supreme Court. Cited in Bissell, etc., Co. v. Goshen, etc., Co., 72 Fed. 553, 43 U. S. App. 47; Poole v. Nixon, 9 Pet. App. 780, 9 L. 309, F. C. 11,270, and Sanderson v. Sanderson, 20 Fla. 299; note to 21 Am. Dec. 119, on general subject, collecting authorities.

Distinguished in Hastings v. Foxworthy, 45 Neb. 692, 63 N. W. 960, holding where the case on first appeal was remanded generally for a new trial, the appellate court on second appeal may reverse its rulings in the first; Teaff v. Hewitt, 1 Ohio St. 520, 59 Am. Dec. 637, holding appeal from final decree opens up the whole merits of cause.

Appeal.— Exception to auditor's report unnecessary where error appears on its face, p. 317.

Admiralty if property ordered to be restored is sold, interest is not to be paid unless specially ordered by the decree, p. 317.

Practice.— Supreme Court will not compel a hearing, unless the citation be served thirty days before the first day of the term, p. 321.

Cited in National Bank v. Bank, 99 U. S. 609, 25 L. 362, holding the meaning of the statute is not that the citation be served thirty days before the return-day, but that the defendant shall have thirty days' notice before he shall be compelled to answer; Cox v. McGarrahan, 131 U. S. 100, 19 L. 500, denying a motion to rescind an order advancing a cause, founded upon the fact that the writ of error to judgment below was allowed less than thirty days before the first day of the term. Bills and notes.— Under Virginia law, indorsee of promissory note may recover directly from a remote indorser in equity, p. 333.

This holding is approved and the principle applied in Bank of United States v. Weisiger, 2 Pet. 347, 7 L. 447, and Smith v. Harley, 8 Mo. 560; Dorsey v. Hadlock, 7 Blackf. 115, approves and extends rule to suit by assignee of non-negotiable note against remote assignor; Turneys v. Hunt, 8 B. Mon. 407, 408, if immediate indorser is insolvent it furnishes even a stronger ground for equity; Watson v. Hahn, 1 Colo. 495, this right will support an express promise to pay, enforceable at law. Cited arguendo, Walker v. Henry, 36 W. Va. 110, 14 S. E. 443.

Ct. 549, holding that a mere assignee of a chose in action cannot sue in equity without some particular fact existing, bringing the case within the cognizance of a court of equity, and holding in this case that the fact that assignee could not sue in his own name at law would not entitle him to sue in equity if the assignor had not refused to permit him to use his name; Walker v. Brooks, 125 Mass. 245, applies the same doctrine.

Distinguished in Clifford v. Keating, 3 Scam. 252; Long v. Pence, 93 Va. 587, 25 S. E. 594, and Watson v. Hahn, 1 Colo. 495, on ground that under statute in some States indorsee may sue remote indorser directly at law in the following: McCarthy v. Rhea, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 55; Dunn v. Price, 11 Leigh (Va.), 209, and Drane v. Schofield, 6 Leigh, 396, Long v. Pence, 93 Va. 587, on ground that indorsee may sue remote indorser in name of assignor.

Bills and notes.— Indorsement of promissory note is prima facie evidence of indorsement for full value, p. 332.

Cited with approval on this point and doctrine followed and applied in Moses v. Lawrence County Bank, 149 U. S. 302, 303, 37 L. 745, 3 S. Ct. 901; Cowles v. Harts, 3 Conn. 522; Canal Co. v. Templeton, 20 La. Ann. 142, 96 Am. Dec. 386; Labadie's Executor v. Chouteau, 37 Mo. 421; Morton v. Rogers, 14 Wend. 586. Cited without particular application in Worthington v. Curd, 15 Ark. 506.

Warranty.— Quære whether sale of chattel under bill of sale containing warranty of title would not entitle subsequent assignee to sue original warrantor, p. 332.

Cited, Boyd v. Whitfield, 19 Ark. 461, as showing that covenants of warranty do not pass from one vendee to another by mere sale of chattel.

Bills and notes.— Where indorser of promissory note is sued by remote indorsee, he may set up any defense which would have been available against his immediate indorsee, p. 331.

Equity.— Where estate has been distributed or executor is insolvent, a creditor may sue the legatees in chancery, p. 604.

Cited and principle applied in Davis v. Vansands, 45 Conn. 604; Trescot v. Trescon, McCord Chan. (S. C.) 433; Buchanan v. Pue, 6 Gill. (Md.) 118, executor may sue legatees to recover estate distributed before insufficiency of assets was known; Hammond v. Hammond, 2 Bland Ch. 348, where executor is dead or insolvent creditor may sue heirs and devisees; Gregory v. Forrester, 1 McCord Chan. (S. C.) 326, holding similarly; applied in Chewett v. Moran, 17 Fed. 821, and Continental Bank v. Heilman, 81 Fed. 42, to suit against heirs to charge lands in their hands with ancestor's debts.

But held in McCollum v. Hinckley, 9 Vt. 149, creditor must not have been guilty of laches.

Equity will make that party immediately liable who is ultimately liable at law, p. 332.

Approved in Gaines v. New Orleans, 4 Woods, 221, 222, 17 Fed. 20, and applied to suit against a grantor for rents and profits received by his grantees; United States v. Aborn, 3 Mass. 129, 131, F. C. 14,418, applied to suit against sureties on probate bond of insolvent executor; Dickinson v. Hoomes, Admr., 8 Gratt. 405, covenant of warranty running with land may be enforced in equity against remote warrantor; Rodney v. Shankland, 1 Del. Ch. 46, 12 Am. Dec. 74, reviewing authorities, applying rule to suit by cestui que trust to enforce trust; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 36, F. C. 14,164, equity will not put cestui que trust to circuity of action to enforce trust; Henshaw v. Freer, Bailey Eq. 316, applied to suit against estate for services rendered deceased executor for benefit of estate which would have been entitled to recover from the estate. Bills and notes.— Under Virginia law indorser is not liable unless plaintiff show maker is insolvent, or that he has brought suit and it has proved fruitless, p. 334.

Cited in Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. 533, 11 L. 713, holding the ascertainment of the notorious insolvency answers the demand of due diligence; Drane v. Schofield, 6 Leigh (Va.), 390, 398, holding if holder elects to pursue maker into an adjoining State, and then fails to commence or prosecute his suit, he has no recourse against assignor.

5 Cr. 335–343, 3 L. 117, YEATON v. FRY.

Admiralty.— Voyage from neutral to blockaded port with notice of blockade incurs liability to capture and condemnation as prize, pp. 342, 343.

Cited in The Circassian, 2 Wall. 151, 17 L. 800 (affirming S. C., 5 Fed. Cas. 712), applying principle where blockaded port was not immediate but ultimate destination; The Pearl, 19 Fed. Cas. 54, where blockaded port ultimate, not immediate destination; United States v. One Hundred and Twenty-nine Packages, 27 Fed. Cas. 286, where vessel had not even left port but was prepared to proceed, held vessel and whole cargo contraband and otherwise liable to seizure.

Marine insurance.— Policies of insurance are generally liberally construed in order to effect the intention of the parties, but exceptions are construed against insurer, p. 342.

Cited and applied in Northwest Trans. Co. v. Boston Ins. Co., 41 Fed. 801, holding exception of perils from want of ordinary skill, etc., in navigation strictly construed against insurer; Koons v. La Fonciere Compagnie, etc., 71 Fed. 983, construing language of exception of less than 50 per cent. of value, against insurer; Hernandez v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 6 Blatchf. 325, F. C. 6,415, holding whole policy should be read together in arriving at intention of parties; Palmer v. Warren Ins. Co., 1 Story, 364, 366, 368, F. C. 10,698, holding visit to port during excepted period does not exonerate from liability for loss after expiration of period; Canton Ins. Co. v. Woodside, 90 Fed. 305, 306, holding policy on personal effects with stipulation " warranted free from all average," does not exempt insurer from liability for articles totally lost because a few others are saved; Greenleaf v. St. Louis. Ins. Co., 37 Mo. 29, deciding navigation of excepted waters does not preclude recovery upon subsequent loss elsewhere; Grant v. Lexington, etc., Ins. Co., 5 Ind. 26, 61 Am. Dec. 77, holding violations of exceptions do not preclude recovery when violation has ceased and loss is from cause not affected thereby; Parkhurst v. Gloucester, etc., Ins. Co., 100 Miss. 302, 97 Am. Dec. 102, holding policy against usual marine risks to cover loss by barratry of master; Hoffman v. Ætna Fire Ins. Co., 32 N. Y. 414, 88 Am. Dec. 345, holding transfer of interest in partnership goods from one partner to another does not avoid policy under proviso against assignments; Paul v. Travelers Ins. Co., 112 N. Y. 479, 8 Am. St. Rep. 762, 20 N. E. 349, holding accidental death from suffocation by gas not within exceptions of policy; Wilkins v. Insurance Co., 30 Ohio St. 336, 339, 27 Am. Rep. 457, 459, holding recovery not precluded where policy permitting navigation of certain waters, vessel navigates others, returns safely and is subsequently destroyed; Webster v. Insurance Co., 53 Ohio St. 564, 53 Am. St. Rep. 660, 42 N. E. 547, construing liberally representation of insured that property was owned jointly by himself and wife; United States Mut. Acc. Assoc. v. Newman, 84 Va. 59, 3 S. E. 808, construing strictly against insurer words of exception where insured died from suffocation by gas; Blumer v. Insurance Co., 45 Wis. 641, holding statement in application for insurance that persons slept in mill insured does not preclude recovery if persons subsequently cease to sleep there under circumstances of case; Wakefield v. Insurance Co., 50 Wis. 536, 7 N. W. 649, construing strictly against insurer continuing warranty that house shall not be left vacant; Warren v. Springfield, etc., Ins. Co., 13 Tex. Civ. App. 469, 35 S. W. Rep. 811, holding representation in policy as to ownership of house by a husband sufficiently satisfied by proof that he built it, though on wife's land. C. 15,597, admitting documents under seal of Portuguese notary in Africa, certified to by Portuguese consul in Brazil, forwarded under signature of American consul there; Thompson v. Stewart, 3 Conn. 181, 8 Am. Dec. 171, reconciling leading case and admitting document under seal of foreign Vice-Admiralty Court certified by deputy registrar; Lincoln v. Battelle, 6 Wend. 484, where document refused because only a copy of a copy; Stoddard v. Sloan, 65 Iowa, 685, 22 N. W. 926, where court took judicial notice of notary public's seal. Cited in general discussion in Tibbetts v. Shaw, 19 Me. 209, deciding appellate court had no jurisdiction where statute gave lower court authority to determine upon its own seal and it had done so.

Distinguished in Williams v. Wilkes, 14 Pa. St. 230, holding United States Circuit Court not being a foreign tribunal its seal proves itself.

Evidence.— One party cannot except to deposition taken before commissioners on his own behalf for failure to prove notice to other party; admission of notice by latter sufficient to enable him to use deposition, p. 343.

Approved and applied in Andrews v. Graves, 1 Dill. 110, F. C. 376; Lawrence v. Graves, 5 N. B. R. 281, 15 Fed. Cas. 72, holding deposition admissible when both sides represented when taken; Stewart v. Hood, 10 Ala. 608, holding such deposition admissible where party introducing was present and cross-examined; Greene v.

Chickering, 10 Mo. 111, holding party taking deposition would not object to its admissibility on account of his own irregularity; Devinney v. Jelly, Tappan (O.), 128, where plaintiff permitted to read defendant's deposition, but held he waived objections and notice by so doing.

Criticised in Sexton v. Brock, 15 Ark. 352, 353, excluding deposition of opposite party where introducing party was notified, but did not attend taking.

5 Cr. 344–350, 3 L. 120, OWINGS v. NORWOOD'S LESSEE.

Jurisdiction.— Supreme Court has jurisdiction of cases arising under treaties; but an action of ejectment where defendant sets up an outstanding title, alleged to be protected by treaty, is not such a case, p. 348.

Cited in Fisher v. Cockerell, 5 Pet. 257, 8 L. 117, denying jurisdiction where party claiming title under compact between Virginia and Kentucky did not show it on the record; Crowell v. Randell, 10 Pet. 392, 9 L. 468, denying jurisdiction where nothing apparent from the record bringing cases within twenty-fifth section of judiciary act; Henderson v. Tennessee, 10 How. 323, 13 L. 439, denying jurisdiction where outstanding title in third person under treaty set up as defense in ejectment; Wynne v. Morris, 20 How. 5, 15 L. 801, denying jurisdiction because claim made was not under any Federal statute; Verden v. Coleman, 1 Black, 474, 17 L. 162, denying jurisdiction where outstanding title under treaty in third person set up as defense, and jurisdiction claimed thereon; Long v. Converse, 91 U. S. 113, 23 L. 235, denying jurisdiction when outstanding title of Federal assignee in bankruptcy who was not a party set up as defense against officers of State court; Miller v. Lancaster Bank, 106 U. S. 544, 27 L. 290, 1 S. Ct. 537, 538, denying jurisdiction where petition by parties in possession to enjoin execution of writ is based on claim that title has never passed out of a corporation not a party, on account of inability of defendant under Federal banking act to acquire title; Giles v. Little, 134 U. S. 650, 33 L. 1064, 10 S. Ct. 625, applying by analogy denying jurisdiction where outstanding title in person not a party under judgment of Federal courts set up as ground thereof; Connor v. Scott, 4 Dill. 246, F. C. 3,119, collecting cases, where Federal Circuit Court took jurisdiction of suit to enforce lien where defendant claimed under Federal assignee in bankruptcy.

The general doctrine as to treaties is applied in United States v. Old Settlers, 148 U. S. 469, 37 L. 525, 13 S. Ct. 667, holding that court has jurisdiction to determine rights under Indian treaty, but cannot go behind treaty to pass on matters settled thereby; Crystal, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, 82 Fed. 120, denying jurisdiction where both parties claiming under treaty with Mexico, there was no controversy over construction thereof; Gill v. Oliver, 11 How. 549, 13 L. 808, arguing in dissenting opinion that court has jurisdiction where both parties claim under treaty, though treaty itself not subject of construction; Baker v. Shy, 9 Heisk. 92, protecting right of Frenchman to convey land in Tennessee under treaty and statute; Nashville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 86 Fed. 182, applying by analogy and holding Federal question involved where party not allowed equal privileges with all others under State tax laws; Opinion of Judge Davis, 44 Me. 592, holding question of right of suffrage of free colored persons not Federal question. See also Mathews v. Zane, 7 Wheat. 208, note, 5 L. 436.

Distinguished in Henderson v. Tennessee, 10 How. 327, 13 L. 441, dissenting opinion.

Confiscation.— Acts of confiscation passed by State during Revolution, vested titles in State where complete legal title was previously vested in British subject, p. 353, note.

Cited to this point in Atherton v. Johnson, 2 N. H. 35.

British treaty of 1794.— Interest by debt intended to be protected by the treaty must be an interest, holden as a security for money at time of the treaty; and the debt must still remain due, p. 347.

5 Cr. 351–358, 3 L. 123, MOSS v. RIDDLE.

Estoppel.—A bond cannot be delivered to the obligee as an escrow, p. 357.

Cited and principle applied in Blewitt v. Railway Co., 49 Fed. 127, holding deed cannot be delivered to grantee in escrow; United States v. Hammond, 4 Biss. 285, F. C. 15,292, holding good a plea of surety that bond delivered to principal obligor was not to be delivered until cosurety joined and plaintiff had notice; Bibb v. Reid, 3 Ala. 91, holding good similar pleas of sureties; Firemen's, etc., Co. v. McMillan, 29 Ala. 161, holding where plea alleged delivery in escrow, presumption is of delivery to obligee and plea is demurrable; Morgan v. Smith, 29 Ala. 286, where delivery of bill of sale to vendee held to convey title; State v. Chrisman, 2 Ind. 132, sustaining demurrer to plea admitting signing and not denying delivery of bond to obligee, but averring it was done on condition that others should sign; Deardorff v. Foresman, 24 Ind. 483, holding, in absence of notice to payee, signing and delivery of promissory note by sureties to maker on condition others will join before delivery to payee and condition not performed, sureties liable; Hubble v. Murphy, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 280, holding, when maker delivers to payee, latter's failure to perform agreement to obtain another on note no defense; Neely v. Lewis, 5 Gilm. (Ill.) 32, holding delivery to obligee for execution by another surety not an escrow; Brown v. State, 18

Tex. App. 328, holding agreement that there should be another surety on bail bond no defense when delivered to sheriff; Miller v. Fletcher, 27 Gratt. (Va.) 412, 21 Am. Rep. 362, collecting cases and holding no escrow when bond delivered to obligee on condition; Johnson v. Branch, 11 Humph. 522, holding delivery of bond to obligee upon condition not an escrow; Lambert v. McClure, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 579, 34 S. W. 974, holding delivery of deed to grantee with oral conditions an absolute delivery; Pope v. Latham, 1 Ark. 74, holding delivery of bond to County Court clerk for sheriff an absolute delivery.

Fraud.— Fraud consists in intention, which must be averred, p. 357.

Cited and applied in Brooks v. O'Hara, 2 McCrary, 649, 8 Fed. 532, sustaining demurrer to bill for not averring fraud with sufficient particularity; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 528, 12 Am. St. Rep. 164, 21 Pac. 985, holding where fraudulent intent not alleged, fraud cannot be set up as defense in suit to declare a trust; Woodroof v. Howes, 88 Cal. 190, 26 Pac. 113, holding allegation of fraud and intent in terms sufficient; Ross v. Webster, 63 Conn. 68, 26 Atl. 478, holding "earnest solicitation" on part of plaintiff not fraud; Robson v. Harwell, 6 Ga. 614, refusing to infer fraud from averment of parol agreement declaring trust and failure to execute it; Gray v. Earl, 13 Iowa, 190, holding inadmissible evidence of fraud where not alleged; Savage v. Davis, 7 Wend. 225, holding averment of fraud and intent in plea material averment.

Distinguished in Carter v. Carter, 5 Tex. 99, holding rule to be in that State that fraud need not be expressly pleaded.

Pleading.— Traverse cannot be of matters of inducement or conclusions of law, pp. 357, 358.

Cited in Finley v. Quirk, 9 Minn. 201, 86 Am. Dec. 97, where defendant attempted to avail himself of new matter under a denial of allegations of complaint; Griggs v. St. Paul, 9 Minn. 234, sustaining demurrer to complaint where no traversable facts alleged.

Error.— Refusal to allow amended plea to be filed after plea held bad is not ground for reversal, p. 358.

Cited in Romaine v. Norris, 8 N. J. L. 82, holding refusal to hear motion for nonsuit out of regular order not error because in discretion of court.

Delivery.— Delivery to one of several obligees constituting a partnership is delivery to all, p. 357.

Miscellaneous.— Cited erroneously in Boyd v. Whitfield, 19 Ark. 461.

5 Cr. 358–361, 3 L. 125, BRENT v. CHAPMAN.

Statute of limitations.— Five years' adverse possession of slave by Virginia statute gives title, on which may be maintained action for recovery, p. 361.

Subsequent cases have relied extensively upon this holding. It is approved and the doctrine applied in Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. 371, 6 L. 497, holding where title to slave vested in vendor by statute in Virginia by adverse possession, it was available defense for vendee in Tennessee; Mitchell v. Wilson, 3 Cr. C. C. 249, F. C. 9,672, holding possession of slave during period of limitation gave title; Sims v. Canfield, 2 Ala. 561, holding title to slave acquired by adverse possession of defendant executor and his testator all together for more than six years; Goodman v. Munks, 8 Port. 95, holding bar of South Carolina statute of limitations an available defense in Alabama against recovery on note made in South Carolina (overruled, Jones v. Jones, 18 Ala. 253); Sadler v. Sadler, 16 Ark. 643, holding peaceable possession of slave for more than five years, vested title under Arkansas statute; Hicks v. Flint, 21 Ark. 465, holding possession of horse in Arkansas during period of limitation vested title and action maintainable to recover lien; Paschal, Admr., v. Davis, 3 Ga. 265, holding title to slave vested in vendee by possession during period of statute of limitation where slave belonged to vendor's intestate; Wynn v. Lee, 5 Ga. 232, holding title to slave acquired by possession in Mississippi during period of statute may be set up in Georgia; Stanley v. Earl, 5 Litt. 282, 15 Am. Dec. 67, holding title was acquired by adverse possession of slave for five years and recovery may be had upon such title from former owner; Cook v. Wilson, Litt. Sel. Cas. 439, holding adverse possession of slave for twenty years, gave title upon which to base action for recovery; Bunce v. Bidwell, 43 Mich. 546, admitting instructions to jury that adverse possession of land for twenty years gave perfect title; Alexander v. Burnet, 5 Rich. 209, dissenting opinion, holding that possession of slave during statutory period would give title, though party claiming thereunder held in another State; Kegler v. Miles, Mart. & Y. 430, 17 Am. Dec. 822, holding adverse possession of slave for three years, vested title upon which recovery could be had; Morris v. Lyon, 84 Va. 334, 4 S. E. 735, holding adverse possession of breast-pin more than five years, vested title; Hall v. Webb, 21 W. Va. 325, holding where title once vested to land, through adverse possession, subsequent repeal of statute of limitations cannot disturb title; Thornburg v. Bowen, 37 W. Va. 543, 16 S. E. 827, holding subsequent purchaser for value of horses acquired title by five years' possession, notwithstanding original fraud of vendor; Sprecher v. Wakeley, 11 Wis. 440, holding, after expiration of statute of limitations, subsequent statute cannot renew right to bring ejectment for lands; Hamilton v. Cooper, Walker, 544, 12 Am. Dec.

590, holding plea good of title acquired to slaves by adverse possession in another State; Huffman v. Alderson, 9 W. Va. 623, arguing that right to be released from payment of note is vested by statute of limitations expiring and cannot be divested by new statute.

Distinguished in Townsend v. Jemison, 9 How. 419, 13 L. 199, holding a statute of limitations which merely bars recovery on contract not available in another jurisdiction; Powell v. Wragg, 13 Ala. 164, holding possession founded upon bill of sale in fraud of rights of vendor's creditors does not give title; Jones v. Jones, 18 Ala. 253, deciding though recovery on contract barred by Georgia statute not available defense in Alabama, overruling Goodman v. Munks, supra; Moseby v. Williams, 5 How. (Miss.) 524, holding possession, not adverse, for five years, did not give title in Tennessee; Smoot v. Wathen, 8 Mo. 524, holding adverse possession did not appear; Moore v. State, 43 N. J. L. 205, 39 Am. Rep. 560, holding rule does not apply to prevent prosecution for crime barred by statute, after statute repealed. Modified in Alexander v. Burnett, 5 Rich. 203, 204, holding possession of slave during statutory period does not avail when party claiming thereunder held in another State. Distinguished in Hunt v. Fay, 7 Vt. 189, dissenting opinion, arguing New Hampshire creditor of deceased barred by New Hampshire statute may present claim to ancillary administrator in Vermont; Coleman v. Holmes, 44 Ala. 126, 4 Am. Rep. 122, holding valid an enactment in 1865, omitting time from 1861 to 1865, in computing statute of limitations; Cunningham v. Frandtzen, 26 Tex. 41, where court refused to decide whether rule applied under Texas statute.

Practice.— Supreme Court will entertain writ of error where case decided upon agreed statement, p. 358.

Cited approvingly in Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How. 434, 15 L. 980, in general discussion upon methods of getting facts in record for appellate court. Approved in Derby v. Jacques, 1 Cliff. 433, F. C. 3,817, holding court will hear case on agreed statement; United States v. Eliason, 16 Pet. 301, 10 L. 972, where Supreme Court entertained writ of error to Circuit Court in District of Columbia from judgment rendered on agreed statement; Holbrook v. Allen, 4 Fla. 101, where Florida Supreme Court entertained appeal from judgment upon agreed statement.

Miscellaneous.— Cited in Atherton v. Johnson, 2 N. H. 35.

5 Cr. 361–363, 3 L. 126, AULD v. NORWOOD.

Fraudulent loan.— Four years' adverse possession of chattel cannot be connected with four years' previous possession by another under owner to constitute a fraudulent loan within Virginia statute, p. 363.

Cited in Lightfoot v. Strother, 9 Leigh, 454, holding where loanee of slave sold her, purchaser could not add his subsequent possession to possession of loanee to make loan fraudulent.

5 Cr. 363–368, 3 L. 126, SLACUM v. SIMMS & WISE.

Incompetent tribunal.— Discharge of insolvent debtor who is in custody by magistrate who is surety on his bond is void for incompetency of tribunal, p. 368.

Cited in Eldridge v. Bush, Smith (N. H.), 297, holding discharge void because obtained by fraud, and sureties on bond liable.

Distinguished in Tappan v. Bellows, 1 N. H. 108, holding sheriff not liable for escape of prisoner for debt for giving him liberty of yard upon his giving bond with two sufficient sureties.

5 Cr. 368–372, 3 L. 128, UNITED STATES v. VOWELL.

Duties.— Duties on imports accrue on arrival at port of entry and not before, p. 372.

This holding has been largely affirmed and relied upon in the following citing cases: Arnold v. United States, 9 Cr. 120, 3 L. 676, holding duty did not accrue until arrival at port of entry; Meredith v. United States, 13 Pet. 494, 10 L. 262, holding duties on goods constituted personal debt against importer from arrival at port of entry; Saltonstall v. Russell, 152 U. S. 631, 38 L. 577, 14 S. Ct. 734, holding assessment of duties on cargo at first port of entry final; United States v. Dodge, Deady, 126, F. C. 14,973, where salt discharged at Astoria and subsequently written entry made, held duty accrued at time of arrival; United States v. Boyd, 24 Fed. 694, holding where fraudulent attempt made to land goods free, duty accrued immediately upon arrival with intent to unlade; McLean v. Hager, 31 Fed. 606, holding seizure for nonpayment of duties illegal where ship entered San Francisco for purpose of transferring cargo without landing; United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason, 499, F. C. 15,647, holding duty was due from importer immediately upon arrival; United States v. Segars, 27 Fed. Cas. 1017, holding duties a personal liability accruing at time of arrival, which cannot be deducted from amount of appraisement; United States v. Sugar, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 423, note, F. C. 16,555, quoting opinion in United States v. Segars, supra; United States v. Arnold, 1 Gall. 353, 354, 358, F. C. 14,469, holding duties did not accrue until arrival at port of entry; Prince v. United States, 2 Gall. 208, F. C. 11,425, holding prize brought in before, but not condemned till after, act reducing duty on prize goods not entitled to benefit of act; Enders v. Breene, 4 Rand. 445, holding duties a personal debt against importer from arrival at port of entry, and his bondsmen who have paid them money be substituted as creditors in equity in place of government.

Importation.— Importation is complete when vessel arrives at port of entry and not before, p. 372.

Cited and principle applied in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 453, 6 L. 690, holding State license tax on importers of foreign goods unconstitutional because external commerce does not cease until introduction of goods into country; Harrison v. Vose, 9 How. 381, 13 L. 183, holding when vessel merely touched at Kingston for advices not an arrival; United States v. Cigars, 2 Curt. 437, F. C. 16,450, holding arrival at port of entry with intent to unlade an importation and without manifest incurrs forfeiture; United States v. Dodge, Deady, 126, F. C. 14,973, where cargo of salt held imported from time when brought within port of entry with intent to unlade, and not from time of subsequent written entry at customhouse; The Gertrude, 3 Story, 71, 2 Ware, 180, F. C. 5,370, holding where vessel driven on shore by stress of weather, goods not imported; The Cargo ex Lady Essex, 39 Fed. 767, holding where cargo unladen on account of stress of weather not a violation of law; Kidd v. Flagler, 54 Fed. 369, where applied by analogy, holding exportation complete when goods landed in foreign territory; Flagler v. Kidd, 78 Fed. 344, reversing Kidd v. Flagler, holding exportation not complete if goods landed temporarily with intent to return; The Coquitlam, 77 Fed. 751, 48 U. S. App. 116, holding a casual entry of foreign vessel into United States waters to transfer cargo when not bound to United States not an arrival within revenue laws; The Mary, 1 Gall. 209, F. C. 9,183, holding not an importation where vessel driven into port by stress of weather; United States v. Merriam, 26 Fed. Cas. 1239, holding act providing penalty for false entry not repealed by act providing penalty for illegal importation because latter completed before former can be done; Enders v. Brune, 4 Rand. 445, holding importation was complete upon arrival in port of entry; United States v. Arnold, 1 Gall. 358, F. C. 14,469, holding importation not complete until arrival at port of entry. Approved arguendo in dissenting opinion, Keck v. United States, 172 U. S. 463, arguing as to meaning of word "smuggle."

Distinguished in Waring v. Mayor, 8 Wall. 120, 19 L. 345, holding where port of Mobile permanently obstructed by shoals, importation took place when cargo delivered to lighters outside.

*3] *February Term, 1810.

SCOTT v. NEGRO BEN.

The right to freedom, under the act of Maryland which prohibits the bringing of slaves into that state, is not acquired by the neglect of the master to prove to the satisfaction of the naval officer, or collector of the tax, that such slave had resided three years in the United States, although such proof be required by the act.

ERROR to the judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington, upon a petition for freedom filed by Negro Ben, against Sabrett Scott, who claimed the petitioner as his slave.

The ground upon which the petitioner claimed his freedom was, that he had been imported into the state of Maryland contrary to the act of assembly of that state, passed in the year 1783, entitled, "An act to prohibit the bringing of slaves into this state;" by which it is enacted, "That it shall not be lawful, after the passing this act, to import or bring into this state, by land or water, any negro, mulatto or other slave, for sale, or to reside within this state; and any person brought into this state as a slave contrary to this act, if a slave before, shall thereupon immediately cease to be a slave, and shall be free; provided that this act shall not prohibit any person, being a citizen of some one of the United States, coming into this state with a bona fide intention of settling therein, and who shall actually reside within this state for one year at least, to be computed from 4*] *and next succeeding his coming into the state, to import or bring in any slave or slaves which before belonged to such person, and which slave or slaves had been an inhabitant of some one of the United States, for the space of three whole years next preceding such importation; and the residence of such slave in some one of the United States, for three years as aforesaid antecedent to his coming into this state, shall be fully proved, to the satisfaction of the naval officer, or collector of the tax, by the oath of the owner, or some one or more credible witness or witnesses."

Upon the trial the defendant below took two bills of exceptions.

The first was to the opinion of the court that it was incumbent on the defendant (Scott), in order to bring himself within the proviso contained in the first section of the act of 1783, to show to the jury that it has been fully proved to the satisfaction of the naval officer, or collector of the tax, by the oath of the owner, or some one or more credible witness or witnesses, that the petitioner was a resident of some one of the United States for three years antecedent to his coming into the state of Maryland; and that it was not sufficient for the defendant to prove, on the trial, to the satisfaction of the jury, that the defendant, being a citizen of some one of the United States, and coming into the state of Maryland with a bona fide intention of settling therein, and who actually resided within the said state for one year at least, computed from and next succeeding his coming into the state, imported the petitioner, who then belonged to the defendant, and that the petitioner had been an inhabitant of some one of the United States for the space of three whole years next preceding such importation.

The second bill of exceptions was to the refusal of the court to admit, as evidence, two certificates made during the trial, the one by the collector of the customs and naval officer of the United States, *for the district and [*5 port of Georgetown in the District of Columbia, and the other by a collector of taxes, appointed by the levy court for the county of Washington, in that district; the purport of which certificates was, that Scott had, on that day (16th June, 1807), by his own oath, proved, to the satisfaction of each of those officers respectively, that Ben "was a resident of the state of Virginia, one of the United States, three whole years next preceding the time when the said Mulatto Ben was brought into the state of Maryland."

The cause was argued by C. Lee and Jones, for the plaintiff in error, and by Swann and F. S. Key, for the defendant.

February 7. Marshall, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

In this case three opinions were given by the Circuit Court, to each of which the defendant in that court excepted. These opinions were, in substance,

1. That the master of a slave imported into the state of Maryland, while the act, passed in the year 1783, entitled, "An act to prohibit the bringing slaves into this state," was in force, could not be admitted to prove the fact that such slave had resided three years, previous to his importation into Maryland, in some one of the United States, unless he could show that this fact had been proved to the satisfaction of the naval officer, or collector of the tax.

2. That a certificate made by the naval officer and collector of the port of Georgetown, dated on the 16th day of June, in the year 1807, certifying that this fact was proved to his satisfaction on that day, did not satisfy the law.

3. That a similar certificate given by the collector *of the tax for the county of Wash- [*6 ington did not satisfy the law.

The correctness of these opinions is to be tested by comparing them with the act under which the plaintiff in the court below claimed his freedom.

The enacting clause of that law prohibits the importation of slaves into the state of Maryland, and gives freedom to such as shall be imported contrary to that act. A proviso excepts from the operation of the enacting clause those slaves which, having resided for three years within some one of the United States, and being the property of the importer, should be imported into the state of Maryland by a person intending to become a resident thereof, and who should actually reside therein for the space of twelve months thereafter. The act then adds—and the residence of such slave in some one of the United States for three years as aforesaid, antecedent to his coming into this state, shall be fully proved to the satisfaction of the naval officer, or collector of the tax, by the oath of the owner, or some one or more credible witness or witnesses.

By the plaintiff in error it is contended, that this part of the law is directory; that it prescribes a duty to the importer of a slave within the description of the proviso, but does not make his title to that slave dependent on the performance of this duty.

By the defendant it is contended, that this clause forms a part of the proviso, and that the fact of previous residence within some one of the United States can be proved by no other testimony, if that which is here prescribed be wanting.

The act, in its expression, is certainly ambiguous, and the one construction or the other may be admitted, without great violence to the words which are employed.

The great object of the proviso certainly was 7*] to *permit persons, actually migrating into the state of Maryland, to bring with them property of this description which had been within the United States a sufficient time to exclude the danger of its being imported into America for the particular purpose. The great object of the provision was, that the fact itself should accord with this intention. The manner in which that fact should be proved was a very subordinate consideration. Certainly the provisions of the law ought not to be so construed as to defeat its object, unless the language be such as absolutely to require this construction.

It would be a singular and a very extraordinary provision that a naval officer, or the collector of a tax, should be made the sole judge of the right of one individual to liberty, and of another to property. It would be equally extraordinary that the oath of one of the parties, probably in the absence of the other, should be conclusive on such a question. It would be not less strange that the manner in which this quasi judge should execute his duty should not be prescribed, and that not even the attempt should be made to preserve any evidence of his judgment.

These considerations appear to the court to have great weight; and the language of the law ought to be very positive to deprive them of their influence.

Upon an attentive consideration of that language, the majority of the court is of opinion, that the property of the master is not lost by omitting to make the proof which was directed, before the naval officer, or the collector of the tax, and that the fact on which his right really depends may be proved, notwithstanding this omission.

The words of this part of the section do not appear to the court to be connected, either in their sense, or in their mode of expression, with the proviso. It is a distinct and a substantive regulation. In legislation, the conjunction "and" is very often used when a provision is made in no degree dependent *on that [*8 which precedes it; and, in this case, no terms are employed which indicate the intention of the legislature, prescribing this particular duty, to make the right to the property dependent on the performance of that duty.

It is, then, the opinion of the majority of the court, that the fact of the residence of the plaintiff below within the United States was open for examination, even had his master omitted entirely to make the proof of that residence before the naval officer, or collector of the tax, and, consequently, that the Circuit Court erred in refusing to admit testimony respecting that fact.

The opinion of the court on this point renders a decision on the other exceptions unnecessary.

FIELD AND OTHERS v. HOLLAND AND OTHERS.

The report of auditors, appointed by consent of parties in a suit in equity, is not in the nature of an award by arbitrators, but may be set aside by the court, although neither fraud, corruption, partiality, or gross misconduct, on the part of the auditors, be proved.

Without expressly revoking an order of reference to auditors, the court may direct an issue to be tried.

A court of equity may ascertain the facts themselves, if the evidence enables them to do it, or may refer the question to a jury, or to auditors. After an issue ordered, a court of equity may proceed to a final decree, without trying the issue, or setting aside the order.

The answer of a defendant is evidence against the plaintiff, although it be doubtful whether a decree can be made against such defendant.

The answer of one defendant is evidence against other defendants claiming through him.

The plaintiffs cannot avail themselves of the answer of a defendant, who is substantially a plaintiff; it is not evidence against a co-defendant.

If neither the debtor, nor the creditor, has made the application of the payments, the court will apply them to the debts for which the security is most precarious.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia, in a chancery suit, in which Field, Hunt, Taylor and Robeson were complainants, and Holland, Melton, Tigner, Smith, Cox and Dougherty were defendants.

The decree of the court below dismissed the bill as to all the defendants.

The bill stated that, on the 21st of July, 1787, Micajah Williamson obtained from the state of Georgia a grant of 12,500 acres in Franklin county, in that state. On the 9th of July, 1788, Williamson conveyed to Swepson, who, on the 23d of July, 1792, conveyed NOTE.—The right of a debtor making a payment to direct the application of such payment, must be exercised at the time the payment is made. Am. Lead. Cas., 294; Harding v. Tifft, 75 N. Y., 461; Allen v. Culver, 3 Denio, 284.

If he makes a payment without directing at the time as to its appropriation, the money becomes absolutely the property of the creditor, and he may to Cox, who, on the 3d of September, 1794, conveyed to Naylor, who, on the 18th of December, 1794, conveyed to the complainant 9] Field, and one *Harland, as tenants in common, and that Harland afterwards conveyed his undivided interest to the other complainants.

That the defendants, Melton, Tigner and Smith, claim title to the land in virtue of a sale made by the sheriff to the defendant Melton, upon two writs of fieri facias, founded upon judgments obtained by the defendant Holland against the defendant Cox; one in the year 1793, for 1,556*l.*, the other in 1794, for 3,000*l.*, which executions were levied, and sales made thereon, in 1799. That the complainants were ignorant of those judgments at the time of their purchase. That the judgments, or the greater part thereof, were paid and discharged by Cox before the executions issued thereon; but the sheriff, well knowing the same, proceeded to levy and sell, &c.

That John Gibbons, the complainants' agent, exhibited to the sheriff an affidavit stating that the executions had issued illegally, on which it became the duty of the sheriff to return the same into court, and discontinue ministerial proceedings thereon until the judgment of the court whence the executions issued was first had and obtained in the premises, according to the provisions of the act in such case made and provided. The affidavit of Gibbon stated, that the executions were illegal because they had not beeen credited with a partial payment made by Cox.

The bill states that the sheriff's sale was fraudulently made with a view to get the land at a very low price; the sale being for 300 dollars, and the land worth 25,000. That the purchaser Melton, at the time of his purchase, knew of the complainant's title, and indemnified the sheriff for proceeding in the sale, and agreed that he should participate in its benefits.

Melton's answer states, that in the year 1787, having land warrants, he surveyed three tracts of 920 acres each, on what he then supposed was vacant land, but which appears now to be 10] within Williamson's *elder grant, of which he had no intimation till the year 1797, when he had sold parts of his surveys. Finding that Naylor had Williamson's title, and being desirous of protecting the titles of so much of the land as he had sold, he purchased of Naylor 4,505 acres. That, with the same view, he afterwards purchased a judgment against Naylor, which he discovered was prior to Naylor's deed to him; upon this judgment, he caused an execution to be issued, and levied upon the land, which he bought in at a fair sale, under the execution, for 300 dollars. That afterwards, finding that the land had been sold for taxes, and purchased by George Taylor, he purchased Taylor's claim, and paid him 300 dollars for it. That in June, 1799, he first heard of the claim of the complainants, and made a verbal agreement with Gibbons, their agent, for the purchase thereof, at a dollar an acre; but finding Holland had a prior judgment against Cox which bound the land, and which he was about to enforce by an execution and sale of the land, and Gibbons having failed to compromise with Holland, or otherwise to stop the sale, he (Melton) agreed with Holland that he (Melton) should become the purchaser at the sale, and would pay Holland 1,500 dollars for the land without regard to the sum at which it might be struck off to him, which sum he has paid. That this was done without any fraudulent intention, and to secure his title; being fully satisfied that the lands were liable to the judgments.

The answer of Dougherty, the sheriff, denies all fraud, combination, and interest in the transaction, and avers that he acted merely in the discharge of his official duty; and that the sale was fair and bona fide.

Smith's answer is immaterial, as it relates only to 75 acres of the land which he claimed under a title prior to the complainants.

Tigner answers merely as to 357 acres, which he purchased of the defendant Melton in the year 1797.

*Holland's answer states, that subse- [11 quent to the two judgments, he made large advances to Cox in goods, and took his obligations.

It states sundry payments and negotiations made by Cox, particularly three drafts, or inland bills of exchange, given by Cox to Holland in February, 1795, and payable in May, June, and July following, for which Holland gave the following receipt: "Washington, 21st February, 1795. The rule settled in the Supreme Court of the United States is that the debtor, or party paying the money, may, in case he chooses to do so, direct its appropriation; if he fail, the right devolves upon the creditor; if the latter fail, the law will make the application according to its own notions of justice. 5th and 15th instant, for twenty thousand dollars, payable in Philadelphia, which, when paid, will be on account of my demand against said Cox."

That in September, 1796, a settlement took place between Cox and Holland, of all their transactions distinct from, and independent of, the two judgments, and Holland took Cox's note for 18,000 dollars for the balance, and gave a receipt, with a stay of execution upon the two judgments for three years.

That the judgments "never were dormant, but have been regularly kept alive and remain unsatisfied."

That it was an established rule between Cox and Holland, that all payments made were to go to the discharge of running and liquidated accounts, independent of the judgments, and that mode of settlement was adopted on their last settlement in 1796.

The answer of Cox states, positively, that the judgments were paid and satisfied, as early as the 14th of September, 1796, by settlement of that date, when the parties passed receipts in full of all past transactions.

That the three bills of exchange, amounting to 20,000 dollars, were by him delivered to Holland on account of the two judgments, and that the bills have been duly paid and discharged.

That the settlement of the 14th of September, 1796, was a final settlement of all accounts prior to that day, including judgments, bonds, 12] notes, and *all demands whatever up to that time, and particularly the judgments in question. That they exchanged receipts in full, ("which receipt the defendant has lost or mislaid.") That, upon the settlement being made, Holland promised and verbally engaged to enter up satisfaction upon the said judgments.

The evidence on the subject of the payment of the judgments consisted principally of Mr. Vaughan's deposition, and the letters and receipt of Holland for the bills for 20,000 dollars.

Mr. Vaughan stated, that although he had no particular knowledge how Holland and Cox settled, yet when a new advance was made by Holland to Cox, after the 14th of September, 1796, he understood the old concern was settled. In a letter from Holland to Vaughan of the 18th of April, 1795, enclosing the bills for 20,000 dollars, he says, "you will oblige me much by procuring the payment of these bills. I have delayed the execution and sale of Mr. Cox's property to the great injury of my own affairs, and I request you may assure him that should the bills not be paid immediately, the consequence must be an assignment of the judgment against him, the result of which will be an immediate sale of his property, which I will not be able to prevent, unless his punctuality in this instance steps forward." "The late stoppage of Mr. Morris and Nicholson, I am fearful may affect them, but as they, together with Mr. Greenleaf, are concerned with Mr. Cox, in the valuable property which my execution is upon, I expect they will for their own sakes see me satisfied, and these drafts paid, to prevent worse consequences." He afterwards says, "I have not security by judgment to the extent of my debt against him." He also urges Mr. Vaughan to obtain security from Cox in case the bills should not be paid. In a letter of May 29, 1795, Holland again says, "I hope you will be able to make some arrangement for the payment of the 18,000 dollars, as I feel a reluctance in pushing the execution I have against the property of *Mr. Cox, although by [13 doing so I would make some thousands."

It appeared from Mr. Vaughan's account with Cox, as stated in his deposition, that the bills for 20,000 dollars, and also a draft on I. Nicholson for 2,570 dollars, and 10 per cent. damages on the 20,000 dollars, excepting a balance of about 1,500 dollars, had been paid before the 6th of February, 1796; and Mr. Vaughan had given up to Cox his drafts of 18,000 dollars, and 1,000, and 3,000 dollars, all of which had been given to Holland on account of prior claims. On the 23d of December, 1803, it was agreed by the parties to this suit, that W. W., I. W., and J. C., or any two of them be appointed auditors, with power to examine all papers and documents relative to payments made by Zachariah Cox, in satisfaction of judgments obtained by Holland against him, and charged in the bill to be satisfied.

On the 21st of April, 1804, the auditors reported that they were of opinion, from the papers laid before them by both parties, that the judgments had been satisfied by payments made prior to February, 1796.

Upon exceptions being taken to this report, it was set aside on the 14th of May, 1804, and G. A., I. P. W., and E. S. were appointed auditors by the court, to report whether the judgments were really satisfied; and that they report a statement of the payments made on the judgments.

On the 7th of December, 1804, those auditors reported that they were of opinion that no payments appear to have been made on the judgments, no vouchers having been produced to that effect.

To this report exceptions were filed on the 14th of December, 1804. It does not appear upon the record that any order was taken either respecting the report or the exceptions to it.

*On the 17th of May, 1805, the court [14 decreed, that the bill should be dismissed with costs as to Melton, Dougherty, Smith and Tigner; and that Holland should bring an action of debt upon the judgments against Cox, who was to appear by attorney and plead payment, upon the trial of which issue, the bill, answers, exhibits, and testimony in this cause was to be considered as evidence.

No other notice is taken of the order for an issue at law, and on the 15th of May, 1807, the court passed the following decree:

"This cause is involved in much obscurity, but, upon mature deliberation, we are of opinion that there is sufficient ground for us to decree upon. The defendant Holland is in possession of a judgment against Cox, which the latter contends is satisfied, and one of the objects of this bill is to have satisfaction entered of record upon the said judgment. The only difficulty arises upon the application of sundry payments which the complainants contend extinguished the judgment, but which the defendant Holland replies were applicable to other demands. The principle on which the court has determined to decree is this; that all payments shall be applied to debts existing when they were made, and as it appears that there were sundry demands of Holland's on Cox which were not secured by judgment, that those sums shall be first extinguished, and the balance only applied to judgments.

"This application of those payments is supported by general principles, as well as the particular circumstances of the case.

"1. The payer had a right at the time of payment to have applied it to which debt he pleased where a number existed, but if he neglects to do so, generally, it rests in the option of the receiver to make the application. In this case Cox takes his receipts generally. Even 15] when the large payment *of 20,000 dollars was made, he takes a receipt on account.

"2. It appears that the application of those payments has actually been made in the manner we adjudge; for from a letter of Mr. Vaughan, through whom most of the payments were made, he intimates that he had given up the evidences of several debts to Cox, because they had been satisfied. Such an act could only have been sanctioned by a knowledge on his part that the money paid through him was in part applicable to those debts.

"The sums which we adjudge to have been due to Holland are the following, viz.:

"Upon the foregoing data, the register will state the account between the parties, calculating interest upon the whole amount bearing interest to the time of payment, and applying the payments according to their dates."

The register having, upon these principles, 16] stated *an account, by which a balance of 11,086 dollars remained still due on the judgments, the court, by a final decree, dismissed the bill; and the complainants sued out their writ of error.

Jones and Harper, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the court below erred in setting aside the report of the auditors who had been appointed by consent. Their report was like an award, which cannot be set aside but for fraud, or partiality, or gross mistake.

2. In not having decided upon the exceptions taken to the second report of the auditors.

3. In not enforcing or setting aside the order to try an issue.

4. In dismissing the bill as to the purchasers, and retaining it as to Holland. The purchasers had notice of the payment of the judgments. The plaintiffs, at the time of the sale, could not be presumed to have known the full extent of the payments made. It was sufficient that the purchasers had notice of the complainants' claim, and that the validity of the sale would be disputed.

The 20,000 dollars, in bills, ought to be applied to the judgments, because that is most beneficial to the payer, as no other debt was then bearing interest. The receipt is upon account of Holland's demand; evidently alluding to the single demand on the judgments. If it had been intended as a general payment, it would have been on account of his demands, in the plural.

The object of the bill is to set aside the sheriff's sale to Melton. He is the only real defendant. Hollaud is only incidentally interested. It would have been no cause of demurrer if he had not been made a party. Nor is Cox a necessary party.

*It is true that the answer of one defend- [17
ant cannot be taken as evidence against another. If one defendant wishes to avail himself of the testimony of another, he must take out a commission and examine him as a witness. Holland's answer is no more evidence in favor of Melton than Cox's answer is evidence against him. Holland's answer is only evideuce for himself, and no decree is sought against him. If, then, the answers of Cox and Holland are both excluded, the only evidence is Vaughan's deposition, aud Melton's answer. If Holland's and Cox's answer be both admitted, the result will be the same, for one destroys the other. Cox is not discredited by Vaughan's deposition. The only facts proved are the two judgments and the payment of 20,000 dollars.

If money be paid on account, it is to be applied, in equity, most beneficially for the debtor. It is not now in the power of the creditor to apply it to which demand he pleases. If neither party, at the time of payment, made the application, it is the province of the court of equity to make it now. The court is to judge, from all the circumstances of the case, what was the intention of the parties, and what application of the money would be most beneficial to the debtor.

Vaughan considered it as a settlement of all accounts.

Notice that the judgment was satisfied was not necessary; the purchaser was bound to take notice—caveat emptor. But if notice was necessary, enough was given to put the purchaser upon inquiry.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. Can the sheriff, in Georgia, sell the whole of a large tract for a small debt? or must he confine himself to the sale of enough to pay the debt?

Harper. An objection has been made to the copy of the deed from Williamson to Sweepson, that it does not appear that the origiual deed was recorded in due time.

But this objection comes too late in the Appellate Court. Not having been made in the court below, it must be considered as having been waived.

The first report of the auditors was pursuant to their authority, and can only be impeached for corruption, or gross impropriety of conduct, or mistake appearing upon the record.

F. S. Key and C. Lee, contra.

The report made by auditors, under an order made by consent, may be set aside as well as a report made by auditors under a reference made by the simple order of the court.

This report was excepted to because the auditors report only their opinion generally, that the judgments were satisfied, and do not report the payments in particular which had been made upon them.

LIVINGSTON, J. It does not appear what was done with those exceptions.

Key. It is to be presumed that they were properly disposed of. The cause was afterwards fully heard.

The second report states, that no payments appear to have been made upon the judgments. The exceptions to this report were abandoned.

As to the issue ordered to be tried, it was a mere interlocutory order, which the court was not bound to pursue; but might, if they thought 19] proper, proceed *to a final hearing without trying the issue, or setting it aside formally.

No notice that the judgments were satisfied, is averred or proved. The payments were not made upon the judgments, and have been properly applied to other accounts.

If Cox did not at the time direct to which account the payments should be applied, Holland might apply them to which account he pleased. If neither party has applied them, the court will apply them to claims not secured by judgments.

Every debt due to Holland from Cox made but one demand. The notes due to Holland were payable in May; the bills for 20,000 dollars did not become due until after May, although drawn in February. If the bills were given on account of the judgments, there would have been a stay of execution until the bills became payable. When arrested in Philadelphia, Cox did not allege that the judgments had been satisfied; nor is it averred in his answer.

No good title is shown from Williamson. The original deed is not produced, and it does not appear from the copy whether the original was recorded in due time.

The first auditors exceeded their authority; they were only authorized to do a ministerial act, but they assumed to act judicially.

The report of the second auditors was correct; they were competent to say that no payments had been made upon the judgments. Cox's answer is no evidence against Holland. If the complainants wished to avail themselves of Cox's testimony, they ought to have taken out a commission and examined him.

But Holland's answer is evidence for him and 20] *those claiming under him, and is conclusive unless contradicted by two witnesses.

Cox's answer is discredited in a material point, viz., the payment of the judgments.

This court decided in the case of the Mayor & Commonalty of Alexandria v. Patton & others, (ante, v. 5, p. 1,) that if the debtor do not, at the time of payment, direct to which account it shall be applied, the creditor may at any time afterwards apply it to which account he pleases. In equity, all debts bear interest.

February 12. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In this case some objections have been made to the regularity of the proceedings in the Circuit Court, which will be considered before the merits of the controversy are discussed.

In May term, 1803, the following order was made:

"By consent of parties, it is agreed, that William Wallace, James Wallace and John Cumming, or any two of them, be appointed auditors, who shall have power to examine all papers and documents relative to payments made by Zachariah Cox, in satisfaction of judgments obtained by said Holland against said Zachariah, and charged in said bill to be satisfied, and that the testimony of John Vaughan, taken by complainants before Judge Peters, and now in the clerk's office, may be produced by them to said auditors. And it is further agreed, that said auditors may meet at any time after the first day of April next, and not before, on ten days' notice given to the adverse party."

The auditors returned the following report:

"We are of opinion, from the papers laid before *us, by both parties, that the judg- [21 ments in the above case have been satisfied by payments made prior to February, 1796."

On exceptions this report was set aside.

By the plaintiffs in error it is contended, that the order under which the auditors proceeded was equivalent to a reference of the cause by consent, and that their report is to be considered as an award obligatory on all the parties, unless set aside for some of those causes which are admitted to vitiate an award. But this court is unanimously of opinion, that the view taken of this point by the plaintiffs is incorrect. The order in question bears no resemblance to a rule of court referring a cause to arbiters. It is a reference to "auditors," a term which designates agents or officers of the court, who examine and digest accounts for the decision of the court. They do not decree, but prepare materials on which a decree may be made. The order in this case, so far from implying that the decision of the auditors shall be made the decree of the court, does not even require, in terms, that the auditors shall form any opinion whatever. They are merely directed to examine all papers and documents relative to payments made in satisfaction of the judgments.

From the nature of their duty they were bound to report to the court, and to state the result of their examination, but this report was open to exception, and liable to be set aside. In the actual case the report was a very unsatisfactory one, and was, on that account, as well as on account of the objections to its accuracy, very properly set aside.

The cause was again referred to auditors, who reported that no evidence had been offered to them of payments to be credited on the judgments alleged by the plaintiffs to have been discharged.

The defendants insist that this report ought to *have terminated the cause. But the [22 court can perceive no reason for this opinion. If there were exhibits in the cause which proved that payments had been made, the plaintiffs ought not to be deprived of the benefit of those payments, because the auditors had not noticed the vouchers which established the fact.

The court, without making any order relative to this report, directed an issue for the purpose of ascertaining, by the verdict of a jury, the credits to which the plaintiffs were entitled.

It was completely in the discretion of the court to ascertain this fact themselves, if the testimony enabled them to ascertain it; or, if it did not, to refer the question either to a jury, or to auditors. There was, consequently, no error, either in directing this issue or in discharging it.

But, without trying the issue, or setting aside the order, the court has made an interlocutory decree, deciding the merits of the case by specifying both the debits and credits which might be introduced into the account, and directing their clerk to state an account in conformity with that specification.

This interlocutory decree is undoubtedly an implied discharge of the order directing an issue, and is substantially equivalent to such discharge. Had the issue been set aside, in terms, in the body of the decree, or by a previous order, it would have been more formal, but the situation of the case and of the parties would have been essentially the same. The only real objection to the proceeding is, that the parties might not have been prepared to try the cause in court, in consequence of their expectation that it would be carried before a jury. There is, however, no reason to believe that this could have been the fact. Had there been any objection to a hearing on this ground, it would certainly have been attended to, and, if overruled, would have been respected by this court. But no objection appears to have been made, 23] and *the inference is, that the cause was believed to be ready for a trial.

These preliminary questions being disposed of, the court is brought to the merits of the case.

The plaintiffs claim title to a tract of land in the state of Georgia, under several mesne conveyances from Micajah Williamson, the original patentee. In the year 1793, while these lands were the property of Zachariah Cox, one of the defendants, two judgments were rendered against him in favor of John Holland, also a defendant, for the sum of 4,556*l.* sterling. These judgments remained in force until the year 1799, when executions were issued on them, which were levied on the lands of the plaintiffs held under conveyances from Cox, made subsequent to the rendition of the judgments. John Gibbons, the agent of the plaintiffs, objected to the sale, because the judgments were satisfied either in whole or in part, but as he failed to take the steps prescribed in such case by the laws of Georgia, the sheriff proceeded, and the lands were sold to Melton and others, who are also defendants in the cause.

This bill is brought to set aside the sale and conveyance made by the sheriff; and it also contains a prayer for general relief.

As the judgments constituted a legal lien on the lands in question, and the title at law passed to the purchasers by the sale and conveyance of the public officer, the plaintiffs must show an equity superior to that of the persons who hold the legal estate. That equity is, that the legal estate was acquired under judgments which were satisfied, and that sufficient notice was given to the purchasers to put them on their guard.

If the facts of the cause support this allegation, the equity of the plaintiffs must be acknowledged; but it is incumbent on them to make out their case.

*In the threshold of this inquiry, it be- [24 comes necessary to meet an objection suggested by the plaintiffs relative to the testimony of the cause. It is alleged that neither Holland nor Cox are necessary or proper parties, and that their answers are both to be excluded from consideration.

The correctness of this position cannot be admitted. The whole equity of the plaintiffs depends on the state of accounts between Holland and Cox. They undertake to prove that the judgments obtained by Holland against Cox are satisfied. Surely to a suit instituted for this purpose, Holland and Cox are not only proper but nccessary parties. Had they been omitted, it would be incumbent on the plaintiffs to account for the omission by showing that it was not in their power to make them parties. Not only are they essential to a settlement of accounts between themselves, but, in a possible state of things, a decree might have been rendered against one or both of them. Neither is it to be admitted that the answer of Holland is not testimony against the plaintiffs. He is the party against whom the fact, that the judgments were discharged, is to be established, and against whom it is to operate. This fact, when established, it is true, affects the purchasers also, but it affects them consequentially, and through him. It affects them as representing him. Consequently, when the fact is established against or for him, it binds them.

The plaintiffs themselves call upon Holland for a discovery. They aver that the judgments were discharged, and expressly require him to answer this allegation. They cannot now be allowed to say that this answer is no testimony.

The situation of Cox is different. Though nominally a defendant, he is substantially a plaintiff. Their interest is his interest: their object is his object, He, as well as the plaintiffs, endeavors to show that the judgments were satisfied. He is not to be considered as really a defendant, nor does the *bill charge [25 him with colluding to defraud the plaintiffs, or require him to answer the charge of contributing to the imposition alleged to have been practiced on them. It is not in the power of the plaintiffs, in such a case, to avail themselves of the answer of a party who is, in reality, though not in form, a plaintiff.

The answer of the defendant Holland, then, where it is responsive to the bill, is evidence against the plaintiffs, although the answer of Cox is not testimony against Holland.

The evidence in the cause, then, is the answer of Holland, the deposition of Vaughan, and the various exhibits and documents of debt which are found in the record. Does this testimony support the interlocutory decree which was rendered in May term, 1805?

That decree specifies the debits and credits which are to be allowed, and directs a statement to be made showing how the account will stand, allowing the specified items.

To this order two objections may be made.

1. That it ought to have been more general. If this be overruled,

2. That its principles are incorrect.

Upon the first objection it is to be observed, that a court of chancery may, with perfect propriety, refer an account generally, and, on the return of the report, determine such questions as may be contested by the parties; or it may, in the first instance, decide any principle which the evidence in the cause may suggest, or all the principles on which the account is to be taken. The propriety of the one course or of the other depends on the nature of the case. Where items are numerous, the testimony questionable, the accounts complicated, the su-
26*] perior *advantage of a general reference, with a direction to state specially such matters as either party may require, or the auditors may deem necessary, will readily be perceived.

Where the account depends on particular principles which are developed in the cause, the convenience of establishing those principles before the report is taken will also be acknowledged.

The discretion of the judge will be guided by the circumstances of the case, and his decree ought not to be reversed because he has pursued the one course or the other, unless it shall appear either that injustice has been actually done, or that there is reason to apprehend it has been done.

In this case it might, perhaps, have been more satisfactory had the parties been permitted to lay all their claims and all their objections before auditors, so that the precise points of difference between them, and the testimony upon those points, might be brought in a single view before the court.

But it is to be observed that two orders of reference had before been made, on neither of which was a satisfactory report obtained. That an issue had been directed, which had, for several terms, remained untried. The probability is, that the controversy depended less on items than on principles, and that all parties were desirous of obtaining from the court a decision of those principles. That no debits nor credits were claimed but those which were stated in the papers, and that all parties wished the opinion of the court on the effect and application of those items. Under such circumstances, a judge would feel much difficulty in withholding his opinion.

In such a case the justice of the cause could be defeated only by the exclusion of some item which ought to be admitted, or by an erroneous direction with respect to those items which were introduced.

27*] *This court perceives in the record no evidence of any credit to which the defendant Cox might be entitled, which is not comprehended in the recapitulation of credits allowed him in the Circuit Court, and they are the more inclined to believe that no such omission was made, as the fact would certainly have been suggested by the counsel for the plaintiffs, and the circumstances under which they claimed the item disallowed by the court, would have been spread upon the record. It is true, an additional credit is claimed in the assignment of errors; but the testimony in the record does not support this claim.

The majority of the court, therefore, is of opinion, that there is no error in the interlocutory decree, unless it shall appear that the principles it establishes are incorrect.

The items claimed by Holland, and allowed by the court, are supported by documents, the obligation of which has not been disproved.

There is, then, no question on the merits but this. Were the payments properly applied by the court, or were they applicable, to the judgments?

The principle that a debtor may control, at will, the application of his payments, is not controverted. Neither is it denied that, on his omitting to make this application, the power devolves on the creditor. If this power be exercised by neither, it becomes the duty of the court; and, in its performance, a sound discretion is to be exercised.

It is contended by the plaintiffs that if the payments have been applied by neither the creditor nor the debtor, they ought to be applied in the manner most advantageous to the debtor, because it must be presumed that such was his intention.

The correctness of this conclusion cannot be conceded. When a debtor fails to avail himself of the power which he possesses, in consequence of which *that power devolves [28 on the creditor, it does not appear unreasonable to suppose that he is content with the manner in which the creditor will exercise it. If neither party avails himself of his power, in consequence of which it devolves on the court, it would seem reasonable that an equitable application should be made. It being equitable that the whole debt should be paid, it cannot be inequitable to extinguish first those debts for which the security is most precarious. That course has been pursued in the present case.

But it is contended, that bills for 20,000 dollars were received, and have been applied in discharge of debts which became due two months afterwards.

If the receipt given for these bills purported to receive them in payment, this objection would be conclusive. If an immediate credit was to be given for them, that credit must be given on a debt existing at the time, unless this legal operation of the credit should be changed by express agreement. But the receipt for these bills does not import that immediate credit was to be given for them. They are to be credited when paid. The time of receiving payment on them is the time when the credit was to be given; and, consequently, the power of application which the creditor possessed, if no agreement to the contrary existed, was then to be exercised. It cannot be doubted that he might have credited the sums so received to any debt actually demandable at the time of receiving such sum, unless this power was previously abridged by the debtor.

It is contended that it was abridged; and that this is proved by the form of the receipt. The receipt states, that the bills, when paid, are to be credited on account of the demand of Holland against Cox, and the plaintiffs insist that the words import a single demand, and one existing at the time the receipt was given.

This court is not of that opinion. The whole *debt due from one man to the other, [29 may well constitute an aggregate sum not improperly designated by the term demand, and the receipt may very fairly be understood to speak of the demand existing when the credit should be given.

If the principles previously stated be correct, there is no evidence in the cause which enables this court to say that there was not due, on the judgments obtained by Holland against Cox, a sum more than equal to the value of the lands sold under execution. If so, the plaintiffs have no equity against the purchasers of those lands, whose conduct appears to have been perfectly unexceptionable; and the bill, both as to them and Holland, was properly dismissed.

It is the opinion of the majority of the court, that there is no error in the proceedings of the Circuit Court, and that the decree be affirmed.

THE MARYLAND INSURANCE COMPANY v. WOODS.

In an action upon a policy on property warranted neutral, "proof of which to be required in the United States only," a sentence of condemnation in a foreign court of admiralty, upon the ground of breach of blockade, is not conclusive evidence of a violation of the warranty.

Quære, whether breach of blockade, by a vessel not warranted neutral, would discharge the underwriters.

If a vessel sail to a port within the policy, with intent to go to a port not within the policy, in case the former should be blockaded, this is not a deviation. A vessel might lawfully sail for a port in the West Indies, known to be blockaded, until she was warned off, according to the British orders of April, 1804. She was not bound to make inquiry elsewhere than of the blockading force.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant, upon two policies of insurance, one upon the schooner William & Mary, Travers, master, and the other upon her cargo, "from Baltimore to Laguira, with liberty of one other neighboring port, and at and from them, or either of them, back to Baltimore." The policy contained the following clause: "Confessing ourselves paid the consideration due unto us for the assurance of the said assured, or his assigns, after the rate of seven and one half per cent. on cargo, by said vessel warranted by the assured to be American property, and that the vessel is an American bottom, proof of which to be required in the United States only. Insured 30] against all risks, the *assured binding himself to do all in his power, in case of capture, for the defense of the property, and, if condemned, that he will enter an appeal if practicable."

Upon the trial of the issue of non infregit, seven bills of exceptions were taken. The first was by Woods, the plaintiff below, in whose favor the judgment was rendered, and is, therefore, unimportant, excepting that it states the facts which each party offered evidence to prove, and is referred to in all the other bills of exceptions.

It states, that the plaintiff gave evidence that he was a citizen of the United States, and sole owner of the vessel and cargo, of the value insured, and made insurance thereupon, according to the policies. That the vessel arrived in safety off the port of Laguira, on the 29th of March, but was refused permission to enter the port, except upon terms, as to the sale of his cargo, which the master deemed too disadvantageous to be accepted. That he remained with his vessel off the port, endeavoring to obtain permission to enter it on more advantageous terms, until the 31st of March, when, finding that such permission could not be obtained, he sailed with the vessel and cargo towards the port of Amsterdam, in the island of Curraçoa, with a view and intention of ascertaining, by inquiring from British ships of war, or other ships, or by actual inspection, or other proper means, whether the said port was in a state of blockade, and of entering it, if he should find it not blockaded. That about four months before, he had been informed in Baltimore, that an American vessel, bound to that port, had been warned off by the British blockading force; and a report, which he had heard in Baltimore before he sailed, that the island was still blockaded, induced him to suppose, at the time of sailing towards Amsterdam, that that port might still be in a state of blockade, (he then being ignorant of that fact, and not having been able to obtain information relative thereto off Laguira,) and to resolve to make *inquiry as aforesaid, before he [31 attempted to enter the port. That on the first of April, on his passage to Amsterdam, being then about 28 or 30 miles distant therefrom, he discovered a ship, distant about 21 miles, and immediately changed his course and stood towards her, for the purpose of inquiring whether Amsterdam was still blockaded. The ship was the British ship of war "Fortune," and was then supporting alone the blockade of the port of Amsterdam. While standing towards her, she seized and captured the schooner as prize, under pretense of an attempt to break the blockade, and sent her to Jamaica, where the vessel and cargo were condemned as good prize, whereby they were totally lost to the plaintiff. That the distance of Amsterdam from Laguira was about 147 miles, which may be run in fifteen or twenty hours. That the plaintiff, upon the first intelligence of the capture, offered to abandon, and demanded payment of the loss.

That the British minister, on the 12th of April, 1804, informed the government of the United States that the siege of Curraçoa was converted into a blockade, which notification the government of the United States did not at any time make known. That the British government had issued an order to their commanders, and to their admiralty courts in the West Indies, "not to consider blockades as existing, unless in respect to particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports, unless they shall have previously been warned not to enter them." That this order was in force at the time of the capture, and had been notified by the British government to the government of the United States, and immediately published in the gazettes of the United States.

That to the eastward of Laguira, on the Spanish Main, the first port is New Barcelona, at the distance of about 57 leagues from Laguira. That it is a small port only entered by small vessels. That *the next port to [32 the eastward of Laguira, on the Spanish Main, is Cumana, at about the distance of 70 leagues. That about the time of the voyage aforesaid, no vessel could enter the port of New Barcelona without having obtained permission therefor at Cumana. That the next port on the Spanish Main, from Laguira, westward, is Porto Cabello, under the same jurisdiction, and at the distance of about 18 leagues; that no vessel could enter that port without having obtained permission therefor at Laguira. That the next port on the Spanish Main, to the westward of Laguira, is Maracaibo, at the distance of about 93 leagues, and about two and a half degrees further west from the port of Amsterdam. That the usual course of trade for vessels from Baltimore with cargoes for Laguira, assorted for the Spanish Main, is to proceed to the port of Amsterdam, if refused permission to enter Laguira. That vessels in such cases never proceed to Cumana or New Barcelona. That except Amsterdam, and the said ports on the Spanish Main, the nearest port to Laguira, used for the purposes of trade, is in the island of Porto Rico, distant more than 120 leagues. But that Carthagena, on the Spanish Main, although more distant than Porto Rico, may be reached from Laguira in a shorter time, being more in the course of the winds. That there is no port in the island of Bonaire, except a small roadstead on the west side of the island, where there is a small battery and military post. That a vessel bound from Laguira to Amsterdam could not touch at the said roadstead without going about five leagues out of her way, and being delayed three or four hours, and that there is no other place in the neighborhood of Laguira or of Amsterdam, except Porto Cabello, where information could then have been had respecting the continuance of the blockade.

The defendants then offered evidence to the jury, that when Travers sailed from Baltimore, and when he arrived at Laguira, and when he sailed from thence and arrived near the island of Curraçoa, he had reason to believe, and did [*33] know, that that island *was actually blockaded and attempted to enter the port of Amsterdam. That when the insurance was effected, a vessel might enter Cumana and Porto Cabello without first obtaining permission elsewhere. That the Spanish government was a party in the war. That it has been usual and customary for vessels sailing from Baltimore, having cargoes suitable to the markets on the Spanish Main, to proceed direct to either of the ports of Cumana, New Barcelona, Porto Cabello, Maracaibo, or Carthagena, without first calling at Laguira for permission.

Whereupon the plaintiff prayed the direction of the court to the jury, that if they believe the matters so offered in evidence by him, then the proceeding towards the port of Amsterdam for the purposes and in the manner so by the plaintiff stated and offered in evidence, doth not in operation of law deprive him of his right to recover for the said losses under the said policies.

But the court were of opinion, and so directed the jury, that if they shall be satisfied from the evidence in the case, that Travers, the master of the schooner, had reason to believe that the island of Curraçoa was actually blockaded at the time when he sailed from Laguira, and when he arrived near the said island, and that he attempted to enter the port of Amsterdam, then the plaintiff cannot maintain the present action.

To which opinion the plaintiff excepted.

The 2d bill of exceptions stated that the defendants, in addition to the evidence by them offered as stated in the first bill of exceptions, gave in evidence that Captain Travers might have obtained information at Laguira of the blockade of Curraçoa, (it being well and generally known there,) if he had made the inquiry; but that he made no such inquiry.

That there is a small island to the eastward of *Curracoa, called Bonaire, and about [*34] 20 miles distant therefrom on the direct and usual route to Curracoa, and where Captain Travers might also have received information of the blockade, but he sailed past the island without stopping thereat, or taking any measures whatever to learn whether the blockade existed or not. That after Travers found he could not sell his cargo to advantage at Laguira, he determined to proceed to Porto Rico, and as Curacoa was very little out of the course, to ascertain whether the blockade still continued. That on the 12th of April, 1804, the blockade of Curracoa was notified by the British minister to our government, and that there had been no notification of a discontinuance thereof. That when the schooner left Baltimore, it was generally reported and understood that Curracoa was blockaded. They also offered in evidence the record and proceedings of the Admiralty Court at Jamaica, and that the schooner was condemned on the ground of an attempt to violate the blockade.

Whereupon the plaintiff offered in evidence all the matters by him offered in evidence as stated in the first bill of exceptions, which bill of exceptions is referred and made part of this bill of exceptions, and also offered in evidence that the matters by the defendants stated in this and the foregoing bill of exceptions are untrue; and also that Travers, while lying off Laguira, did inquire whether the blockade of Curracoa still continued, and could obtain no information on that subject; and also that at the time he discovered the ship of war, he might have proceeded to, and entered into, the port of Amsterdam without being intercepted by the frigate.

Upon which aforesaid statement of facts, so given in evidence, the defendants pray the court to instruct the jury that the said Travers was not justified in sailing from Laguira and passing the island of Bonaire without inquiring there whether the port of Amsterdam was blockaded, and that in consequence thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

*But the court were of opinion, that if [*35] the jury shall be satisfied, from the evidence in the case, that Travers sailed from Laguira for Amsterdam, with intent to enter that port if not actually blockaded, but if blockaded not to attempt to enter, but to sail for the island of St. Thomas; and if the jury shall be satisfied, from the evidence, that Travers did not attempt to enter the said port, but was captured on his way thither, at the distance of 29 or 30 miles therefrom, the court directed the jury that such conduct of Travers was not unlawful, and that, notwithstanding such conduct, the plaintiff can maintain the present action.

The 3d bill of exceptions stated that the defendants, upon all the matters in the preceding bills of exceptions contained, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they believe that the blockade was notified by the British government to the American government, in a reasonable time before Travers sailed, and that it was generally known in Baltimore before he sailed, and that he had been informed of it, and knew of the general report and belief, and under these circumstances sailed from Laguira to the port of Amsterdam, without making due inquiry at Laguira, whether the blockade subsisted at Amsterdam, and passed Bonaire without making such inquiry, to the place where he was captured, then he was not justifiable in proceeding on the said voyage to Curracoa, there to make inquiry, not having first made the inquiry in the neighboring ports of Laguira and Bonaire.

The court refused to give the instruction as prayed, but repeated the instruction stated in the second bill of exceptions; to which the defendants excepted.

The 4th bill of exceptions stated that the defendants prayed the court to direct the jury, that if they shall be of opinion that there are three ports on the Spanish Main, viz., Port Cabello, at the distance of 21 leagues from Laguira, [*36 Maracaibo at 93 leagues *from Laguira, and about 2 1-2 degrees further west than Amsterdam, and Carthagena, at the distance of 185 leagues from Laguira, to the westward, and that the prevailing winds there are generally from the eastward, and that a voyage may be performed with more facility from Laguira to Porto Cabello than to Curracoa, and from Laguira to Maracaibo and Carthagena, than to the island of St. Thomas, or Porto Rico. That those ports are situated on the Spanish Main, and under the government and jurisdiction of the King of Spain. That vessels sailing from the ports of the United States, are in the habit of sailing direct to the said ports of Porto Cabello, Maracaibo and Carthagena without obtaining permission from the government at Laguira. That vessels leaving the United States with cargoes suited to the market on the Spanish Main, frequently sailed from Laguira, to one or other of the above-mentioned ports for the disposal of their cargoes. That the island of Curracoa belongs to the Dutch government, who were parties to the war. That there are two other ports on the Spanish Main, under the Spanish government, lying to windward of Laguira, viz., Cumana, 70 leagues, and New Barcelona, 57 leagues from Laguira, but the voyage from Laguira to those ports is more difficult than the voyage to Curracoa, which is 147 miles. That Curracoa was known to be blockaded, and so notified by the British government to that of the United States a reasonable time before Travers sailed, and that he knew the same at the commencement of the voyage; then Amsterdam was not a port to which he was entitled to go under the said policy. Which direction the court refused to give. And the defendants excepted.

The 5th exception stated that the defendants prayed the opinion of the court, upon the whole facts before stated, whether the insured had a right to proceed to Porto Rico, or St. Thomas, under the terms of the policy. That the court directed the jury that he had no such right, and that the defendants excepted.

*The 6th exception stated that the de- [*37 fendants, upon all the matters aforesaid, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they believe that the insured, after his arrival at Laguira, proceeded on a provisional voyage for the port of Amsterdam, or for Porto Rico, or for St. Thomas, with an intention to go to Amsterdam, if not blockaded, and to Porto Rico, or St. Thomas, if the port of Amsterdam was blockaded, he was not so entitled to do under the policies, and in consequence thereof, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. Which direction the court refused to give, but gave the following opinion.

The court having declared that the said Travers had a right to proceed from Laguira to Amsterdam, as is fully stated in their second opinion, to which they refer, they directed the jury that if they find that the said Travers intended, if the port of Amsterdam was blockaded, to go to the island of Porto Rico, or St. Thomas, that such his intention only will not affect the policies; and that notwithstanding such intention the plaintiff can maintain his action thereon. To which direction the defendants excepted.

The 7th bill of exceptions stated that the defendants upon all the matters in the preceding bills of exception stated, prayed the opinion of the court that if the jury believe that Travers sailed from Laguira, on a voyage to St. Thomas, or Porto Rico, but with an intention to procced a small distance out of the way to see if Amsterdam was blockaded, and in case it was not blockaded then to enter that port, and did so proceed to the port of Amsterdam, and was captured as aforesaid, then the defendants are not answerable; which opinion and direction the court refused to give, but gave the following opinion.

The court having declared that the said Travers had a right to proceed from Laguira to Amsterdam, as is fully stated in their second opinion, to which they refer, they are of opinion, and accordingly directed the jury, that if they find that the said Travers intended, if the port of Amsterdam was *blockaded, to [*38 go to the island of Porto Rico, or the island of St. Thomas, such his intention only will not affect the policies aforesaid, and that notwithstanding such intention, the plaintiff can maintain his actions on the said two policies. To which instruction the defendants excepted.

The verdict and judgment being in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants brought their writ of error.

P. B. Key, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the court ought not to have permitted parol evidence to be given of the intention of Captain Travers to break the blockade, because the sentence of condemnation was conclusive evidence of that attempt. Curraçoa was not a port within the policy, because the policy did not give leave to sail to a blockaded port.

2. A neighboring port means a port on the Spanish Main, under the same government as Laguira.

St. Thomas was not a neighboring port; if it was, he deviated in going to Curraçoa.

He sailed for Curraçoa with a knowledge that it was blockaded, and therefore the defendants are discharged.

Harper, contra.

The evidence is conflicting as to the knowledge of the captain of the blockade, and therefore upon that point this court can give no opinion. The only evidence of such knowledge is, that there was a blockade at a prior period, which had been notified to our government. But there is a difference between a blockade by notification and a blockade de facto. A vessel has a right to go and inquire of the blockading force. The British government had declared that no blockades should be considered as ex-

39*] isting *in the West Indies, except blockades de facto, and then not to capture them unless they should have been previously warned off. Under this order and declaration of the British government, Travers had a right to go and see whether the port was or was not actually blockaded. This court will not extend the principle of blockade farther than it has been extended by the British government.

The voyage, then, to Curraçoa, was lawful. Travers was in the due course of the voyage, and it was altogether immaterial whether he had any or what other port eventually in view.

Martin, in reply.

Travers had no right to sail for Curraçoa, knowing it to be blockaded. If there be in fact a blockade, no vessel knowing that fact has a right to go to the blockaded port for inquiry. If she does, she is not, by the law of nations, entitled to warning, but is good prize at once. Ille hostis est qui dat auxilium hostibus. If she sails to a blockaded port, knowing it to be blockaded, she assumes the hostile character, and is to be treated in all respects like an enemy. This was a blockade by notification as well as de facto. Our government had express notice, and all our citizens are to be presumed to have notice also.

The British treaty is not in force, but it is a correct exposition of the law of nations on the subject of blockade. (Fitzsimmons v. Newport Ins. Co., 4 Cranch, 199.)

The sentence is conclusive evidence of the breach of blockade, notwithstanding the clause in the policy that proof of the property being American is to be made here only. We admit the property was American—we admit everything that is to be proved under that clause. But it was not agreed that the question of breach of blockade should be tried here only. If the clause is to be so construed, it would place the insurance companies entirely in the power 40*] *of the insured, because all the persons on board are the agents of the assured, and interested to justify their own conduct.

It is the duty of the insured and his agents to do nothing to increase the risk, and to do all in his power to avoid loss; and their negligence or improper conduct will discharge the underwriters. Thus in the case of the ship Atlantic (Marshall, 321), want of a passport at first sailing, although obtained before capture, and although the capture was not for want of that paper, yet the underwriters were discharged. The insured is answerable for all the improper conduct of the master if it do not amount to barratry.

Travers knew that Curraçoa was blockaded; at least he had the strongest grounds of believing it; and if he was not certain, he ought to have inquired at Laguira, or at Bonaire. This neglect increased the risk and discharged the underwriters.

Curraçoa was not a neighboring port within the meaning of the policy. It means only a port on the Spanish Main. General expressions may be restrained by the nature of the case. Thus, in the case of Hogg v. Horner (2 Marshall, 397), the expression in a policy on a voyage from Lisbon to London, "with liberty to touch at any port in Portugal," was construed to mean any port to the northward of Lisbon only.

The fifth exception was taken to the opinion of the court, to show a repugnance between that and the opinion stated in the second bill of exceptions; for if it was unlawful to go to Porto Rico and St. Thomas, it was equally so to go to Curraçoa.

As to the sixth exception to the opinion that the intention to go to St. Thomas in case Curraçoa should be blockaded did not vitiate the policy.

There must, at the commencement of the voyage from Laguira, be a certain fixed [

41 terminus ad quem. Otherwise the door would be open to fraud upon the underwriters, as there could be no deviation. It ought to have been entered in the log book to what port they were bound.

Neutral property may be condemned for violation of blockade. (1 Rob., 144, Ship Neptunus.) We admit the property to be American, and neutral, but this American neutral vessel attempted to break the blockade.

A notified blockade is presumed prima facie to continue until the contrary be notified, or the blockade be removed de facto. (2 Rob., 92, 93, 106, 108; 1 Marsh., 65; 1 Rob., 131. The Columbia.) This vessel, having knowledge of the blockade, was not entitled to the privilege of being warned off.

As to the right to go to Curraçoa to inquire, he cited 1. Rob., 280.

Harper, contra.

The case cited of the voyage from Lisbon to London, was a mere question as to the meaning of the parties. The nature of the voyage was called in aid of the construction, and it was decided to mean any port in the course of the voyage.

The clause as to proof of the neutrality of the property applies to its neutral character throughout the whole voyage.

Travers had a right to proceed towards the blockaded port for inquiry, even upon British principles, prior to the order of 1804. But after that order there can be no doubt.

Although there are dicta that a vessel sailing for a blockaded port knowingly is liable to be condemned, yet in no case is it the direct and sole ground of condemnation. In the case of the Columbia, *the vessel was taken in *[

42 the actual attempt to brake the blockade. But this doctrine is overruled by the Court of Errors and Appeals in New York. (1 Caines' Cases in Error, 8; 1 Caines' N. Y. Term Rep., 12; 1 Johns., 256, Schmidt v. N. Y. Insurance Company.)

In 1 Rob., 280, 281. The Betsy, the limitations of the rule as to sailing for a blockaded port knowingly are stated by Sir William Scott.

The distance of the place from whence the vessel sails may excuse. So may also the nature of the blockade. In the West Indies the blockades were so short and uncertain as to form an exception to the general rule. (2 Rob., 95, The Neptunus.) But the British order of 1804 is decisive.

Martin, in reply.

The British order will not bear that construction. It has never received that construction in their courts. If it had this vessel would not have been condemned.

Nothing but the neutrality of the property is to be proved in this country; not that the vessel did not conduct herself as a neutral.

The case of Fitzsimmons v. The Newport Insurance Company, was a case of naked intention, without an act in pursuance of such intention. Sailing with that intention is an act.

February, 16. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the following opinion of the court, viz.:

This cause comes on upon various exceptions to opinions delivered by the Circuit Court of Maryland.

The first exception, having been taken by the 43] party *who prevailed in the cause, is passed over without consideration.

The 2d and 3d exceptions are so intimately connected with each other, that they can scarcely be discussed separately.

This action was brought by the owners of the cargo of the William & Mary, to recover from the Maryland Insurance Compauy the amount of the policy insuring the cargo of that vessel. The voyage insured was "from Baltimore to Laguira, with liberty of one other neighboring port, and at, and from them, or either of them, back to Baltimore." The cargo was warranted to be American property, and the vessel to be an American bottom, "proof of which was agreed to be required in the United States only."

Previous to the sailing of the William & Mary from Baltimore, the blockade of Curraçoa had been notified to the President of the United States, by the British government, and was generally known in Baltimore. The vessel arrived at Laguira, from which place she sailed for some other port, was captured within thirty miles of the port of Amsterdam, in Curraçoa, then actually blockaded, and was condemned for an attempt to break the blockade.

The proof whether the William & Mary sailed from Laguira for Curraçoa, or for St. Thomas's or Porto Rico, is not positive; and the evidence respecting the information which she sought, or might have received, at Laguira, respecting the blockade of Curraçoa, is contradictory. On the part of the plaiutiff below, evidence was given that, at Laguira, information of this fact was sought and could not be obtained. On the part of the underwriters, evidence was given, that no inquiry respecting it was made at Laguira, and further, that there was a small island called Bonaire, between Laguira and Curraçoa, not much out of the 44] track from the former place *to the port of Amsterdam, at which no inquiry respecting the blockade of Amsterdam was made.

The counsel for the underwriters prayed the court to instruct the jury, that, if they believed these facts, the plaintiff could not recover.

This instruction the court refused to give, but did instruct the jury "that if they shall be satisfied, in this case, that Captain Henry Travers, master of the said schooner, sailed from Laguira for the port of Amsterdam, in the island of Curraçoa, with intent to enter the said port, if not actually blockaded, but, if blockaded, not to attempt to enter, but to sail for the island of St. Thomas's, and if the jury should be also satisfied, from the said evidence, that the said Henry Travers did not attempt to enter the said port, but was captured on his way to the said port, at the distance of 29 or 30 miles therefrom, the court are of opinion, and accordingly directed the jury, that such conduct, on the part of the said Henry Travers, was not unlawful, and that, notwithstanding such conduct, the plaintiff can maintain the present action."

This opinion and direction of the Circuit Court asserts two principles of law.

1. That the sentence and condemnation of a foreign court of admiralty, condemning a vessel as prize for attempting to enter a blockaded port, is not conclusive evidence of that fact, in an action on this policy.

2. That, under the circumstances of the case, the sailing from Laguira, and the passing Bonaire, without making any inquiry, at either place, respecting the blockade of Amsterdam, were not such acts of culpable negligence as to discharge the underwriters.

1. Is the sentence of a foreign court of admiralty, in this case, conclusive evidence of the fact it asserts?

*This depends entirely on the construc- [45
tion given to the policy. The question respecting the conclusiveness of a foreign sentence was, some time past, much agitated throughout the United States, and was finally decided, in this court, in the affirmative. Pending this controversy, a change was introduced in the form of the policy, at several offices, by inserting, after the warranty that the property was neutral, the words, "proof of which to be required in the United States only."

By the underwriters it is contended that these words go to the property only, and not to the conduct of the vessel. By the assured it is contended that they apply to both.

The underwriters insist that the words themselves import no more than that proof respecting the property may be received in the United States, and that a more extended construction is not necessarily to be given to them in consequence of their connection with the warranty of neutrality, because a neutral vessel attempting to enter a blockaded port would thereby discharge the underwriters, although no warranty of neutrality should be found in the policy.

There is much force in this argument, and if the question shall ever occur on such a policy, it will deserve serious consideration. But whatever might be the law in such a case, the majority of the court is of opinion that, under this policy, the sentence of the foreign Court of Admiralty is not conclusive.

The contract of insurance is certainly very loosely drawn, and a settled construction, different from the natural import of the words, is given, by the commercial world, to many of its stipulations, which construction has been sanctioned by the decisions of courts. One of these is on the warranty that the vessel is neutral property. It is not improbable that, without such warranty, the attempt of a neutral 46*] *vessel to enter a blockaded port might be considered as discharging the underwriters. But no such decision appears ever to have been made; nor is the principle asserted, so far as is known to the court, in any of the numerons treatises which have been written on the snbject. On the contrary, the judgments rendered in favor of the underwriters, in such cases, have been uniformly founded on the breach of the warranty of neutrality, which, though in terms extended only to the property, has been carried, by constrnction, to the conduct of the vessel. It is universally declared that anti-neutral conduct forfeits the warranty that the vessel is neutral.

This being the construction put by the parties, and, in consequence thereof, by courts, on the warranty of neutrality, it is fair to consider the reservation of the right of giving proof in the United States, which, in direct terms, refers to the whole warranty, as intended by the parties to be co-extensive with the warranty itself; and, as the conduct of the vessel was, in legal construction, comprehended in the warranty of her neutrality, that the conduct of the vessel would, in legal construction, be comprehended in the reservation of a right to make proof in the United States.

The majority of the court, therefore, is of opinion, that the Circuit Court did not err in submitting the testimony respecting the conduct of the vessel, in this case, to the jury.

2. Are the nnderwriters discharged by the conduct of the captain?

This question is susceptible of several subdivisions.

1. Was the port of Amsterdam, in Curraçoa, a neighboring port, within the policy?

2. Did the intention to pass Amsterdam, if blockaded, discharge the underwriters?

47*] *3. Was an omission to inquire at Laguira or Bonaire, respecting the blockade of Amsterdam, such a culpable negligence as to discharge the underwriters?

It is the opinion of the court that the port of Amsterdam was a neighboring port within the policy. The distance between the two places is inconsiderable. It is not stipulated that the neighboring port shall be one under the Spanish government, nor is it to be implied from the natnre of the case. Indeed, the common usage of Baltimore, which was given in evidence, for vessels sailing with cargoes assorted for the Spanish Main to and from Laguira to Curraçoa, if refnsed admittance into the former port, wonld be conclusive on this point, if, in other respects, it conld be doubtful.

Neither was the intention to sail for some other port, on the contingency of finding Amsterdam blockaded, a deviation.

It is admitted that the voyage from Laguira must be certain, and that only a certain voyage would be within the policy. But the opinion of the Circuit Court was founded on the jury's believing that the voyage from Laguira was for Amsterdam, a voyage which the vessel had a right to make, and that the intention to sail to another port, should Amsterdam be blockaded, constituted no deviation while on the voyage to Amsterdam.

Certainly an intention, not executed, will not deprive the insured of the benefit of his contract in a case in which he would not have been deprived of it, had he executed his intention. Had Captain Travers, on the voyage to Amsterdam, sustained a partial loss, and, after entering that port, determined to go to Porto Rico, or St. Thomas's, it is certain that, after sailing from Amsterdam, the voyage would have been no longer within the policy, nor would the underwriters have been answerable for a subsequent loss. But it could never be contended, with any *semblance of reason, that this [*48 discharged them from the loss sustained on the voyage to Amsterdam.

3. The omission of the captain to make any inquiry respecting the blockade of Amsterdam, at Laguira, or to call, for that purpose, at Bonaire, comes next to be considered.

The notoriety of the blockade of Curraçoa, before Captain Travers sailed from Baltimore, must affect him, especially as the instruction given to the jury is not made dependent on their believing that he had no actual knowledge of the fact. It seems a reasonable duty, in ordinary cases, to make inquiry in the neighborhood, if information be attainable, respecting the continuance of a blockade known previously to exist.

It is true, that upon this point contradictory evidence was given; but the opinion of the court is predicated on the jury's believing that Captain Travers made no inquiry at Laguira. The correctness of that opinion, therefore, depends on its having been the duty of the captain to make this inquiry.

In an ordinary blockade, this, perhaps, might have been necessary; but it is contended, that blockades in the West Indies were so qualified by the British government, as to have dispensed with this necessity.

It was proved, that orders had been given by that government to its cruisers and courts of vice-admiralty, which orders were communicated to, and published by, the government of the United States, "Not to consider blockades as existing, unless in respect to particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports, unless they shall have been previously warned not to enter them."

On the motives for this order, on the policy which *dictated this mitigation of the [*49 general rule, so far as respected blockades in the West Indies, this court does not possess information which would enable it to make any decision, bnt it appears essentially to vary the duty of the masters of neutral vessels sailing towards a port supposed to be blockaded.

The words of the order are not satisfied by any previous notice which the vessel may have obtained, otherwise than by her being warned off. This is a technical term which is well understood. It is not satisfied by notice received in any other manner. The effect of this order is, that a vessel cannot be placed in the situation of one having a notice of the blockade until she is warned off. It gives her a right to inquire of the blockading squadron, if she shall not previously receive this warning from one capable of giving it, and, consequently, dispenses with her making that inquiry elsewhere. While this order was in force, a neutral vessel might lawfully sail for a blockaded port, knowing it to be blockaded, and being found sailing towards such port, would not constitute an attempt to break the blockade, until she should be warned off.

There is, then, no error in the opinions to which the second and third exceptions are taken.

The 4th exception is taken to the refusal of the court to give an opinion to the jury, that, under the circumstances stated by the defendants below, the port of Curraçoa was not a neighboring port within the policy.

The merits of this opinion have been essentially discussed in the view taken of the second and third exceptions, and need not be repeated. The port of Curraçoa is considered as a port within the policy, and, consequently, the Circuit Court ought not to have given the opinion prayed for by the plaintiffs in error.

50*] *The 5th exception presents the extraordinary case of an exception to an opinion in favor of the party taking it, and, consequently, need not be examined.

The 6th exception presents a case not essentially varying from the second and third, and will therefore be passed over without other observation than that it is decided in the opinion on those exceptions.

The 7th exception is to a different point. The counsel for the defendants below prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that if they believed the said Travers sailed from Laguira on a voyage to St. Thomas's, or Porto Rico, but with an intention to proceed a small distance out of the way to see if Amsterdam was blockaded, and in case it was not blockaded, then to enter that port, and did so proceed to the port of Amsterdam, and was captured as aforesaid, then the defendants are not answerable."

This opinion the court refused to give, and proceeded to repeat the instruction to which the second and third exceptions were taken.

If St. Thomas's, or Porto Rico, were not neighboring ports within the policy, as is most probably the fact, then the voyage from Laguira to either of those places was not insured. If they were neighboring ports, so that a voyage to either of them was within the policy, then going out of the way to see whether Amsterdam was blockaded was a deviation, and, of consequence, the underwriters are equally discharged.

The only doubt ever felt on this point, was, whether any testimony had been offered to the jury to establish this fact, which would authorize counsel to request the opinion of the court respecting the law. On examining the record, it appears that such testimony was offered. It is stated that the defendants below offered in evidence, that the captain, on finding he could not be permitted to dispose of his cargo at Laguira, but on terms which amounted to a total sacrifice of it, "determined to proceed to Porto 51*] *Rico, and, as Curraçoa was very little out of the course, to ascertain whether the blockade still continued."

This evidence might be disbelieved by the jury, but the defendants were certainly entitled to the opinion of the court declaring its legal operation if believed.

It is the opinion of the court, that, in refusing to give the opinion prayed in the seventh exception, the Circuit Court erred, for which their judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

YOUNG v. GRUNDY.

No writ of error or appeal lies to an interlocutory decree dissolving an injunction.

If the answer neither admits nor denies the allegations of the bill, they must be proved on the final hearing; but upon a question of dissolution of an injunction they are to be taken to be true.

THIS was an appeal from an interlocutory decree of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, dissolving an injunction.

E. J. Lee, for the appellant.

The decree dissolves the injunction with costs; which is a final decree as to the costs. (2 Wash., 200, Davenport v. Mason.)

The material facts of the bill are not denied nor admitted by the answer; they are, therefore, to be taken as true. The court below must, therefore, have proceeded on the ground that the original equity between the maker and payee of the note did not affect the indorsee.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. If the answer neither admits nor denies the allegations of the bill, they must be proved upon the final hearing. Upon a question of dissolution of an injunction they are to be taken to be true.

But the court has no doubt upon the question.

*No appeal or writ of error will lie to [52 an interlocutory decree dissolving an injunction.

WILSON EX PARTE.

The writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum does not lie to bring up a person confined in the prison bounds upon a ca. sa. issued in a civil suit.

WILSON petitioned the court for a writ of habeas corpus, and a certiorari to bring up the record of a civil cause in which judgment had been rendered against him, upon which a ca. sa. had issued, by which he was taken and was now in confinement within the prison bounds upon a prison bounds bond. His petition stated that the marshal had demanded of the creditor the daily allowance for the prisoner agreeably to the act of Congress concerning insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia (Laws U. S., vol. 6, p. 301, § 15), which the creditor had refused to pay, in consequence of which the marshal had no longer any authority to detain him.

The act of Congress provides that the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia shall, by a general order, fix the daily allowance for the support of prisoners in execution for debt in civil suits, and that "no person, taken in execution for debt or damages in a civil suit, shall be detained in prison therefor unless the creditor, his agent or attorney, shall, after demand thereof by the marshal, pay, or give such security as he may require, to pay, such daily allowance, and the prison fees.

The marshal refused to discharge the petitioner; and his counsel, E. J. Lee, now moved for a habeas corpus.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after consultation with the other judges, stated that the court was not 53*] satisfied *that a habeas corpus is the proper remedy, in a case of arrest under a civil process.

Habeas corpus refused.

ONEALE v. THORNTON.

The act of assembly of Maryland, which authorized the commissioners of the city of Washington to resell lots for default of payment by the first purchaser, contemplates a single resale only; and by that resale the power given by the act is executed. By selling and conveying the property to a third purchaser, the commissioners precluded themselves from setting up the second sale, and the second purchaser, by making this defense, affirmed the title of the third purchaser.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting in Washington, in an action of assumpsit upon a promissory note, dated August 6th, 1800, payable in nine months thereafter, and given by Oneale to William Thornton, surviving commissioner of the city of Washington, for the purchase money of lots No. 1 and 2 in the square No. 107 in that city.

The defense set up by Oneale was, that there was no consideration for the note, inasmuch as the superintendent of the city, who (by virtue of the act of Congress passed the 1st of May, 1802, entitled, "An act to abolish the board of commissioners in the city of Washington, and for other purposes,") (vol. 6, p. 126), succeeded to all the powers, duties, and rights, of the late commissioners, whose office was abolished by that act, had abandoned or rescinded the contract of sale, by having sold and conveyed the same lots to another person in fee simple.

The bill of exceptions taken at the trial, stated, in substance, the following case.

The states of Virginia and Maryland, having, in the year 1789, offered to the United States a cession of territory ten miles square for the permanent seat of government, the United States, by the act of Congress of the 16th of July, 1790 (vol. 1, p. 132), entitled, "An act for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the government of the United States," accepted the same, and authorized the President 54*] *to appoint certain commissioners for the purpose of carrying the act into effect. In the summer of 1791, the greater part of the proprietors of the land included within the present bounds of the city of Washington, conveyed the same to Thomas Beall, son of George, and John M. Gantt, in trust, to be laid out as a city, and that after deducting streets, avenues, and public squares for the use of the United States, the residue should be equally divided; one moiety to be reconveyed to the original proprietors, and the other to be "sold at such time or times, in such manner, and on such terms and conditions as the President of the United States for the time being, shall direct;" the purchase money to be paid over to the President as a grant of money, and to be applied for the purposes mentioned in the act of Congress of 16th July, 1790. The lots so sold were to be conveyed by Beall and Gantt to the purchasers. "And because it might so happen that by the death or removal of the said Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt, or from other causes, difficulties might occur in fully perfecting the said trust by executing all the said conveyances, if no eventual provision should be made, it was therefore agreed and covenanted between all the said parties, that the said Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt, or either of them, or the heirs of either of them, lawfully might, and that they, at any time, at the request of the President of the United States for the time being, would convey all or any of the said lands which should not then have been conveyed in execution of the trusts aforesaid, to such person or persons as he should appoint, subject to the trusts then remaining to be executed, and to the end that the same may be perfected—." [1]

*The legislature of Maryland, by an act [*55 passed at their November session, 1791 (c. 45), subjected all the lands in the city belonging to absentees, minors, married women, and persons non compos mentis, to the same terms and conditions as are contained in the deeds of trust from the other proprietors, and vested the legal estate thereof in Beall and Gantt; and after declaring the manner in which a division of the property should be made between the original proprietors and the commissioners, it declares, that "all persons to whom allotments and assignments of lands shall be made by the commissioners, shall hold the same in their former estate, and interest, and in lieu of their former quantity, and subject in every respect to all such limitations, conditions and incumbrances, as their former estate and interest were subject to, and as if the same had been actually reconveyed pursuant to the said deed in trust."

By the 4th section it is further enacted, that "all squares, lots, pieces, and parcels of land, within the said city, which have been or shall be appropriated for the use of the United States, and also the streets, shall remain and be for the use of the United States; and all the lots and parcels which have been or shall be sold to raise money as a donation as aforesaid, shall remain and be to the purchases, according to the terms and conditions of their respective purchasers." The same section then proceeds to quiet the titles of all persons claiming by purchase from or under original proprietors, who have been in possession in their own right for five years before the passing of the act.

By the act of 1793 (c. 58, § 1), the legisla-

1.—In consequence of this clause in the original deeds of trust, and by order of the President, the trustees, Beall and Gantt, transferred the trust to Gustavus Scott, William Thornton, and Alexander White, then commissioners of the city of Washington, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, by deed dated the 30th of November, 1796. This fact was omitted to be stated in the bill of exceptions, but the cause was argued as if it had been so stated.

ture of Maryland further provided, that "the certificates granted, or to be granted by the said commissioners, or any two of them, to purchasers of lots in the said city, with acknowledgment of the payment of the whole purchase money, and interest, if any shall have arisen thereon, and recorded, shall be sufficient to vest the legal estate in the purchasers, their 56] heirs *and assigns, according to the import of such certificates, without any deed or formal conveyance."

By the second section of the same act it is enacted, that "on sales of lots in the said city by the said commissioners, or any two of them, under terms or conditions of payment being made therefor at any day or days after such contract entered into, if any sum of the purchase money or interest shall not be paid, for the space of thirty days after the same ought to be paid, the commissioners, or any two of them, may sell the same lots at vendue, in the city of Washington, at any time after sixty days' notice of such sale in some of the public newspapers of Georgetown and Baltimore town, and retain, in their hands, sufficient of the money produced by such new sale, to satisfy all principal and interest due on the first contract, together with the expenses of advertisements and sale; and the original purchaser, or his assigns, shall be entitled to receive from the said commissioners, at their treasury, on demand, the balance of the money which shall have been actually received by them, or under their order, on the said second sale; and all lots so sold shall be freed and acquitted of all claim, legal and equitable, of the first purchaser, his heirs and assigns."

On the 29th of September, 1792, the President of the United States, by his order in writing, directed that the sale of lots in the city of Washington, to commence on the 8th of October then next, should be of such lots as the commissioners, or any two of them, should think proper. That the sale should be under their direction, and on the terms they should publish. And it was on the same day further ordered by the President, that any lot or lots in the city of Washington might, after the public sale which was to commence on the 8th of October, 1792, be sold and agreed for by the commissioners, or any two of them, at private sale, at such price, and on such terms, as they might think proper.

On the 24th of December, 1793, after the pas57] sing *of the above recited act of the Maryland legislature of November session, 1793 (c. 58), Robert Morris and James Greenleaf entered into a contract with the commissioners for the purchase of six thousand lots in the city of Washington; payable in seven annual installments. The lots to be selected by Morris and Greenleaf in the manner described in the contract. They selected, among others, the two lots sold afterwards to Oneale, and for the purchase of which by Oneale the note was given upon which the present suit was brought.

Morris and Greenleaf received conveyances for all the lots which they paid for under their contract, but having failed to pay some of the installments, the commissioners, by virtue of the act of Maryland, 1793 (c. 58), duly advertised for sale a large number of the lots contracted for by Morris and Greenleaf, including the lots in question. The terms of sale were, that the purchase money should be paid in three, six and nine months, and secured by good negotiable paper indorsed to the satisfaction of the commissioners. At this sale the defendant Oneale purchased lots No. 1 and 2 in the square No. 107, at a price considerably greater than the amount due thereon from Morris and Greenleaf, and gave his promissory notes therefor, upon one of which the present suit was brought.

By the act of Congress passed on the 1st of May, 1802 (vol. 6, p. 126), it is enacted, "That from and after the first day of June next, the offices of the commissioners appointed in virtue of an act passed on the 16th day of June, 1790, entitled, 'An act to establish the temporary and permanent seat of the government of the United States,' shall cease and determine; and the said commissioners shall deliver up to such person as the President shall appoint in virtue of this act, all plans, draughts, books, records, accounts, deeds, grants, contracts, bonds, obligations, securities, and other evidences of debt in their possession, which relate to the city of Washington, and the affairs heretofore under their superintendence *or [58 care." And it was further enacted, "That the affairs of the city of Washington, which have heretofore been under the care and superintendence of the said commissioners, shall hereafter be under the direction of a superintendent to be appointed by, and to be under the control of, the President of the United States; and the said superintendent is hereby invested with all powers, and shall hereafter perform all duties which the said commissioners are now vested with, or are required to perform, by or in virtue of any act of Congress, or any act of the general assembly of Maryland, or any deed or deeds of trust from the original proprietors of the lots in the said city, or in any other manner whatsoever." And it was further enacted, "That the said superintendent shall, prior to the first day of November next, sell, under the directions of the President of the United States, all the lots in the said city which were sold antecedent to the sixth day of May, 1796, and which the said commissioners are authorized by law to resell, in consequence of a failure on the part of the purchasers to comply with their contracts."

Under this act Thomas Munroe was appointed superintendent, and having given the notice required by the act of Maryland, 1793 (c. 58), and Oneale having failed to pay his notes, the superintendent proceeded to sell again the lots No. 1 and 2 in the square No. 107, and one Andrew Ross became the purchaser for a sum less than the amount due thereon from Morris and Greenleaf, the first purchasers. Ross assigned his interest in the lots to James Moore, to whom the superintendent afterwards conveyed the lots in fee-simple, by a deed which recites the contract between Morris and Greenleaf, and the commissioners for the purchase of six thousand lots; the selection of lots No. 1 and 2 in square No. 107, as part thereof; the failure of Morris and Greenleaf to pay the purchase money therefor; the sale by the superintendent to Ross, and the assignment by Ross to Moore; but takes no notice of the intermediate sale to Oneale. The money received *upon the [59 sale to Ross, was by the superintendent applied to the credit of Morris and Greenleaf, the original purchasers.

The first resale of lots by the commissioners, for default of payment by purchasers, took place on the 2d of May, 1797. Another resale of other lots took place on the 28th of August, 1797. At these resales none of the lots contracted for by Morris and Greenleaf were resold, and in every instance except one, the lots produced, at such resale, as much as was due thereon from the first purchaser, with interest and expenses of sale. On the 18th of October, 1797, the first resale of Morris and Greenleaf's lots commenced, and the commissioners then laid it down as a rule, and from which they never afterwards departed during the existence of their offices, that no lot should be resold for less than the amount due thereon from the first purchaser, with interest and expenses of sale.

The commissioners, at the time of their resale to Oneale, had a right to resell the lots for the default of Morris and Greenleaf. The notes given by Oneale for the purchase money, were indorsed by Basil Wood, but he indorsed only as security, and the only consideration for the notes and the indorsement was the sale of the lots.

Upon second resales of lots it was the universal practice of the commissioners to apply the money actually received therefor to the credit of the account of the first purchaser, taking no notice of the intermediate purchaser, and they always sold as for the default of the first purchaser, and all the deeds which they made to purchasers at such resales, recited the first contract only for the purchase of the lot, and the default of the first purchaser as the only cause of such resale; wholly pretermitting all intermediate purchasers.

Upon this statement of the evidence, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that 60] if they *should find, from the evidence, that the bargain between the plaintiffs and defendant for the sale of the two lots was understood and made by the parties to be upon the condition and contingency that if the promissory notes given for the purchase money should be punctually paid, it should become an absolute sale to the defendant, but if the promissory notes should not be punctually paid, the commissioners should have the option of annulling the bargain for the sale, and of reselling the lots as for the original default of Morris and Greenleaf, the first purchasers. And if the jury should further find, from the evidence, that the superintendent, in reselling to Ross, and conveying to Moore his assignee, did so resell and convey the lots as for the original default of Morris and Greenleaf, in disaffirmance of the bargain to sell them to the defendant, and in pursuance and exercise of such option reserved to the commissioners; the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the said purchase money in this action.

Which instruction the court refused to give.

The defendant then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that upon the evidence offered as above, if believed by the jury, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover any part of the purchase money bidden by the defendant for the lots as above mentioned. But the court refused this instruction also; whereupon the defendant took a bill of exceptions and sued out his writ of error.

P. B. Key and F. S. Key, for the plaintiff in error.

These lots were originally sold to Morris and Greenleaf by the Commissioners, who, upon the default of Morris and Greenleaf, sold them to the plaintiff in error. Upon his default the superintendent, who succeeded to the rights, powers and duties of the commissioners, sold them to Ross, who assigned his right to Moore, to whom the superintendent conveyed them by a deed which passed the *legal estate in [61 fee to Moore. The act of Congress, directing him to sell certain lots, does not affect the present question; for it only directs him to sell such lots as the commissioners were, at the time of passing that act, authorized by law to resell. The question then is, what were the rights and the authority which the commissioners then had respecting these lots?

We contend that the power of resale given to the commissioners by the act of Maryland, 1793 (c. 58, § 2), can be used but once, and expires in the using.

The evils intended to be remedied by that law, were these. Before that act was passed, whenever the commissioners had contracted to sell a lot, and the purchaser failed to pay the purchase money at the time stipulated, the commissioners could not enforce the payment by a resale of the lot without obtaining a decree for that purpose from a court of chancery. This was productive of great delay and expense, which became oppressive in proportion to the great number of sales which they were authorized to make. The expense would not only exhaust the funds intended to be raised from the donation of the lands, but the delay would defeat the object of the donors, which was to provide suitable buildings for the accommodation of the general government.

As the commissioners were public officers of the government, having no personal interest in the subject of their trust, it was deemed prudent and proper to confide to them a limited portion of the chancery jurisdiction, as to the sales of the public lots. Accordingly they are authorized by that act, in case the purchase money should not be paid in thirty days after it ought to have been paid, to sell the lots at vendue, upon sixty days' notice, and to retain sufficient of the money produced by such new sale, to satisfy all principal and interest due on the first contract, with the expenses of sale; and the original purchaser, or his assigns, was entitled to receive *the balance of the money [62 which should be actually received by them on the second sale; and such lots were to be freed of all claim, legal and equitable, of the first purchaser, his heirs and assigns.

This was a short and summary mode of foreclosing the equity of the first purchaser, and of collecting the purchase money. It was, in effect, a statutory decree for those purposes. It not only does not contain an authority to continue to resell as often as default should be made, but it contains expressions inconsistent with such a construction.

Thus the commissioners are to retain only sufficient to satisfy the first contract, and the surplus is to be paid to the original purchaser only. Whatever, therefore, might have been the sum received from the sale to Ross, Oneale could derive no benefit therefrom; if he would not have been entitled to the surplus, he cannot be chargeable with the deficieney, without attributing to the legislature the most palpable injustice; an imputation which can never be consistent with the true construction of a doubtful statute. Indeed, the statute does not contemplate the possibility of a deficiency; it makes no provision for such a case, and it speaks of the balance as being certainly in favor of the first purchaser in all cases. Nor does it contemplate the neeessity of a second resale. It seems to presume that the first resale would be for cash, and would certainly produce more than sufficient to satisfy the original purchase money, with interest and charges. If any person is liable for the deficieney it must be Morris and Greenleaf, who, by the express provisions of the act are entitled to the surplus. The legislature intended only to give a summary remedy against the lots, not to impose a new personal responsibility upon any third person for the deficieney of Morris and Greenleaf.

The commissioners, then, having a right to resell but once, and having actually resold to Ross, received from him the purchase money, 63] and conveyed *the legal estate to his assignee by a good deed in fee-simple, cannot deny it to be a valid resale, it is not for them to say that it is not the exeeution of the power granted them by the statute; they are estopped by their deed to deny their authority to make that resale. If that resale was valid (which they cannot deny), it must be beeause the intermediate eontract for resale was void, or at least voidable at their option; it is also evidenee that they had made their election under such option if they had it. Besides, the legal estate is gone to the assignee of Ross, who is a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice of Oneale's equity, if he ever had any, so that it is not now in the power of the commissioners specifieally to execute the contract on their part; and therefore they eannot elaim a eompliance with it on his.

The sale to Ross was made by the commissioners either in affirmance or disaffirmance of the sale to Oneale. If it was made in affirmance of the sale to Oneale, then it must have been sold as his property. The eommissioners ought to account with him for the proeeeds; he would be entitled to the surplus, and the commissioners would be authorized to retain in their hands suffieient of the money produced by such new sale to satisfy all principal and interest due on the second contract (i. e., the eontract to sell to Oneale).

But the statute only authorizes the commissioners to retain in their hands suffieient to satisfy the amount due on the first eontract (i. e., the contract with Morris and Greenleaf), and obliges them to pay over to them the balance.

And in conformity with these provisions of the statute, the commissioners always resold as for the default of the first purchasers, Morris and Greenleaf. They never pretended to retain more than the amount due from Morris and Greenleaf upon the first contract, and they always passed to their credit the surplus. The sale to Ross, therefore, could not have been in affirmanee, but must have been in disaffirmance 64] of the contract with Oneale. *Having then by their acts disavowed that contract, they cannot now set it up again, after they have sold and conveyed away to another the very subject of the contract, and received its value.

The consideration of the notes has totally failed. The legislature of Maryland might have granted to the commissioners a continuing power to resell upon each default, and each resale might have foreelosed the equity of all preeeding parties: but they have not done so, and have used a language wholly inconsistent with such a provision.

Rodney, Attorney General, and Jones, contra.

The grounds taken by the opposite counsel depend upon the construction of the act of Maryland; and even admitting them to be right in their construction, the notes are not void.

But we contend they are not right in that construction. The act of assembly authorizes a resale as often as default shall be made by any purchaser. The right to resell, is, ex vi termini, eo-extensive with the original power to sell. Every resale is a new sale, and within the statute. The terms, "new sale," "first eontract," "original purchaser," "second sale," and "first purchaser," are all relative terms. Oneale is the original purchaser, the first purchaser, as to Ross; and his eontract is, as to Ross, the first eontract.

The expression in the second section of the act is extensive enough to eomprehend all the resales. It is that "on sales of lots in the said city by the said commissioners, under terms or conditions of payment being made at a future day," &e., "and if the purchase money shall not be paid," &e., "the commissioners may sell the same lots at vendue," &e.

"On sales of lots," means "on any sales of lots;" a resale is as much a sale as the original sale; consequently, if upon a resale the purchase *money should not be paid, the [65 eommissioners would have as good a right to sell again as they had for the first default. It was clearly an error in them to credit the amount of sales to the account of Morris and Greenleaf. But if the commissioners could resell but once, the second resale to Ross was without authority, and void. The sale to Oneale remains good, and the notes are valid. In that case nothing passed to Ross by the deed to him: for the commissioners, being mere trustees, and having no interest, could convey only what they had authority to convey. But if the legal estate has passed to the assignee of Ross, that circumstanee does not invalidate the notes. It was the fault of Oneale himself, for he might have paid the purchase money according to his contract, and obtained a title. During the period of two years he could have availed himself of the eontract; he might have sold, or otherwise disposed of the lots. Before he can show the notes to be nuda pacta, he must show that there never was a consideration for them.

The act meant to give the commissioners the same right as to the sales of lots which a vendor of personal property has in England. If the purchaser does not pay for the goods on the day stipulated, the vendor may sell them again at the risk of the first vendee; and if they produce less, he may recover from him the difference; so that the sale to Ross may be valid, and yet Oneale liable for the difference between the sum paid by Ross, and the sum due from Morris and Greenleaf, upon the first contract.

P. B. Key, in reply, observed, that there must not only be a sufficient consideration for the notes at the time they were given, but there must be a consideration continuing up to the time of the trial.

As to the idea of charging Oneale with the difference between the amount due from Morris and Greenleaf, and the amount paid by Ross, 66 he asked, *who would pay that difference, if there had been, as there might be, according to the construction contended for on the other side, fifteen intermediate purchasers who had all failed to pay their notes? Would all the notes be valid? Or to which of them should the commissioners resort?

February 15. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit was instituted on a promissory note given by the plaintiffs in error, to the commissioners of the city of Washington, in payment for two lots originally sold to Morris and Greenleaf, and resold to the plaintiff in consequence of the failure of the original purchasers to pay the purchase money. The defendant having also failed to pay the purchase money, the lots were again resold by the superintendent, who succeeded to the powers of the commissioners, and were conveyed to the assignee of the third purchaser. Oneale, the defendant in the Circuit Court, contended that, by this subsequent sale and conveyance, a total failure of the consideration for which the note was given has been produced by the act of the creditor, and that he is consequently discharged from paying the note. This point having been decided against him, he has brought a writ of error to the judgment of the Circuit Court, and insists here, as in the court below,

1. That the consideration on which the note was given has totally failed, and that this failure is produced by the illegal conduct of the agent for the city.

In support of the judgment of the Circuit Court it is contended:

1. That the act of the legislature for the state of Maryland, under which both resales purport to have been made, authorizes a third 67 sale on the *failure of the purchaser at the second sale to discharge his note.

2. If this be otherwise, that such subsequent sale could not affect the right of Oneale, whose title would still be good.

The first point depends on the second section of the act entitled a further supplement to the act "concerning the territory of Columbia, and the city of Washington."

This act enables the commissioners to sell at public vendue any lots sold by them on credit, if the purchaser shall fail to pay the purchase money thirty days after the same shall become due, and to "retain in their hands sufficient of the money, produced by such new sale, to satisfy all principal and interest due by the first contract, together with the expenses, &c., and the original purchaser, or his assigns, shall be entitled to receive from the said commissioners, at their treasury, on demand, the balance of the money which may have been actually received by them, or under their order, on the the second sale, and all lots, so sold, shall be freed and acquitted of all claim, legal and equitable, of the first purchaser, his heirs and assigns."

It has been argued, that the terms of this section allow a resale so long as the purchaser shall fail to pay the purchase money, and that every purchaser, so failing, remains liable for his note, notwithstanding such resale.

But this court is of opinion, that a single resale only is contemplated by the legislature, and that by such resale, the power given by the act is executed.

The proposition, that a power to resell, if not restricted by the terms in which it is granted, implies a gift of all the power possessed at the original sale, will not be denied; but the court is of opinion, that in this case the power of reselling is restricted by *the words which [68 confer it. These words are such as, in their literal meaning, apply exclusively to a first and second sale. The words, "first contract," "original purchaser," and "first purchaser," designate, as expressly and exclusively as any words our language furnishes, the first sale made of the property, and the purchaser at that sale, and no other. It is true, that the natural import of words may be affected by the context, and that where other parts of the statute demonstrate an intent different from that which the words of a particular section of themselves would import, such manifest intent may be admitted to give to the words employed a less obvious meaning. But, in this statute, no such intent appears.

Men use a language calculated to express the idea they mean to convey. If the legislature had contemplated various and successive sales, so that any intermediate contract or purchaser was within the view of the lawmaker and intended to be affected by the power of resale given to the commissioners, the words employed would have been essentially different from those actually used. We should certainly have found words in the act applicable to the case of such intermediate contract. But we find no such terms; and the want of them might, in the event of different sales, for different prices, produce difficulties scarcely to be surmounted. No man, intending to draw a law for the purpose of giving the commissioners a continuing power to resell as often as default in payment should be made by the purchaser, could express that intention in the language of this act.

It has been argued by the defendants in error, that every subsequent default would produce the same necessity for reselling again that was produced by the default of the original purchaser, and that therefore the legislature, if their words will permit it, ought to be considered as having given the same remedy.

*The influence readily conceded to this [69 argument in general cases is much impaired, if not entirely destroyed, by the particular circumstances attending this law.

A contract for 6,000 lots was concluded on the day that this act passed, immediately after its passage. In this large contract was merged a former contract for 3,000 lots made with one of the purchasers in this second contract. It is impossible to reflect on this fact without being persuaded that the law was agreed upon by the parties to this contract, and was specially adapted to it. The immensity of property disposed of by this sale, furnished motives for legislative aid by giving a speedy remedy to the commissioners which might not exist on the resale of particular lots occasioned by any partial default in the purchasers. In consideration of the magnitude of the contract, the lots would, according to the ordinary course of human affairs, rate lower than in cases of a few sold to individuals. Consequently it could never enter the mind of the commissioners, or of the legislature, that one of these lots resold would not command a much higher price than the estimate made of it in the original contract. We therefore find no provision made, in the law, for the event of a lot's selling for a less sum, when resold, than was originally given for it. This furnishes additional inducements to the opinion that the legislature considered itself as having done as much as the state of the city required, by giving this summary remedy for the default of the first purchaser, and leaving the parties afterwards to the ordinary course of law.

It is, then, the opinion of the court that the act of assembly, under which the superintendent has acted, did not authorize the resale to Ross of the lots which had been previously resold to Oncale.

It remains, then, to inquire whether this sale and conveyance so affects the title of Oneale as to produce a failure of the consideration on which the note was given.

70*] *In this case, the impropriety, which has occurred in consequence of an agent's misconstruing his powers, is a fact dehors the title papers: It is not apparent on the face of the conveyances. They purport to pass a title which is entirely unexceptionable. How far such a conveyance may be valid in law, or how far it may be affected in equity by actual or implied notice to such subsequent purchaser, this court will not now decide.

The city, by reselling the property, and conveying it to the purchaser (an act to be justified by no state of things but the nullity of the previous sale), has not left itself at liberty to maintain the continuing obligation of that sale; and the plaintiff, by setting up this defense, has affirmed the title of the last purchaser.

This court is of opinion that the city has disabled itself from complying with its contract, and that, on the testimony in the cause, the plaintiff below ought not to have recovered.

Judgment reversed.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court, for the county of Washington, and was argued by counsel; all which being seen and considered, this court is of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in refusing to give the opinion prayed by the counsel for the defendants in that court, that, on the whole testimony, if believed, the plaintiffs in that court could not support their action. This court doth therefore reverse and annul the judgment rendered in this cause by the said Circuit Court, and doth remand the cause to that court for a new trial thereof.

THE DELAWARE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The questions whether the voyage be broken up, and whether the captain was justified in returning, are questions of law, and the finding thereupon by a jury is not to be regarded by the court.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, in an action of covenant upon a policy of insurance upon the freight of the Venus from Philadelphia to the Isle of France.

The vessel sailed early in December, 1807, before the British orders in council of the preceding November were known in the United States. On the afternoon of the 16th of January, 1808, while prosecuting her voyage, she was arrested by the British ship of war Wanderer, by whom she was detained until the morning of the 18th, when she was restored to the captain, her papers being first indorsed with these words: "Ship Venus warned off the 18th of January, 1808, by His Majesty's ship Wanderer, from proceeding to any port in possession of His Majesty's enemies."

"EDWARD MEDLEY, 2d Lieut."

The captain was verbally informed by an officer of the Wandcrer that the Isle of France was blockaded, and that the Venus would be a good prize if she proceeded thither.

The captain returned to Philadelphia, where he was disabled from prosecuting his voyage by the embargo. Considering the voyage as broken up by the arrest and detention of his vessel by the Wanderer, he on that account abandoned to the underwriters.

These facts were specially found by the jury, who also found that "by the interruption, detainment, and warning off of the British force, the voyage of the ship Venus was broken up."

The Venus returned to the Delaware on the 21st of February, 1808, and, on the 22d, the following letter of abandonment was written by Vanuxem and Clark, the agents of the plaintiff:

Thomas Fitzsimmons, Esq.

SIR:—The ship Venus, Captain King, bound from hence to the Isle of France, having had the register indorsed, and warned by the British ship Wanderer from proceeding to her destination, has returned to this port; by which circumstance her voyage is broken up. We do therefore hereby abandon to your office the freight insured by policy of 5th December last, for 6,000 dollars, on freight out valued at 8,000 dollars.

Yours,

VANUXEM and CLARK.

Thomas Fitzsimmons, Esq.,
Pres. Del. Ins. Co.

The jury further found that the possession was not *as prize, but merely to pre- [*75 vent the Venus from prosecuting her voyage to the Isle of France.

Upon this special verdict, judgment, in the court below, was rendered for the defendants.

Binney and Hopkinson, contra.

The assured at the time of abandonment must state a good cause of abandonment. The only causes assigned by the plaintiff are those stated in the special verdict, none of which are suffieient.

The special verdict finds matters of law which ought not to have been submitted to the jury, viz., that the voyage was broken up, and that the captain was justified in returning. He was opposed by no physical or legal impediment. The jury have found that the arrest was not as prize, but only to prevent the prosecution of the voyage. The exemption from the general operation of the orders in council of the 11th of November, embraces the case of a vessel sailing from a neutral port direct to an enemy's colony. The words are: "Nothing 77] herein contained shall *extend to subject to capture or condemnation any vessel," "belonging to any country not declared by this order to be subjected to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, which shall have cleared out" "from some port" "of the country to which she belongs," "direct to some port" "in the colonies of His Majesty's enemies." The expression shall have must, in grammatical construction, allude to a time which was future when the order was passed, and also to a time which should have passed, before the arrival of that future time. "Which shall have cleared out." That is, which shall then have cleared out. When? At the time of the seizure. If at the time of seizure the vessel shall have cleared out from a neutral port direct to an enemy's colony, she is within the exception to the general order. If it had been intended to except only those which had cleared out before the 11th of November, the date of the order, the expression would have been, which have cleared out, &c.

If the Venus was within the exception to the order, the officer of the Wanderer had no right to prohibit her from proceeding on her voyage; and his prohibition was no justification to the captain in returning to Philadelphia.

But even if the order did include this vessel, yet the prohibition was no justification to the captain; because the Isle of France was only nominally, not actually blockaded.

A coustructive blockade, if it be a peril insured against, must be considered as within the denomination of restraints, but, from the terms of the policy, it must be a restraint which comes to the hurt, damage or detriment of the thing insured. It must therefore have been either an actual or legal restraint.

A constructive blockade is not known to the law of nations. Our courts reject it. It is not a legal restraint. (2 Caines, 11; 1 Johns., 253.)

If the circumstances of the present case are 78] a justification, *then every ill founded apprehension of a timorous man may justify an abandoument. There must be peril in point of fact. The misapprehension of a weak man is not sufficient. (3 Bos. & Pull., 392; 5 Esp., 50; Park, 226.) The captain ought to have proceeded, that he might himself see whether the port was actually blockaded or uot.

He ought not to have depended upon the information he received from the Wanderer.

Harper, in reply.

The captain was under a moral incapacity to proceed on his voyage, and was therefore justified in returning. The policy of Great Britain was to interdict this neutral commerce; it was the great object of the order of the 11th of November, 1807. The words shall have cleared out, mean, shall have now cleared out, i. e., before the date of the order. It is immaterial whether this order was warranted by the law of nations, because it was still within the peril of restraiut of princes. A probability of capture and condemnation was sufficient. Such a reasonable apprehensiou as a man of firmness might indulge.

February 17. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opiniou of the court as follows:

This suit was instituted on a policy insuring the freight of the Venus, from Philadelphia to the Isle of France. The vessel sailed early in December, 1807, before the British orders in council, of the preceding November, were known in the United States. On the afternoon of the 16th of January, 1808, while prosecuting her voyage, she met the British ship of war Wanderer, by whom she was arrested and detained until the morning of the 18th, when she was restored to the captain, her papers being first indorsed with these words, "Ship Venus warned off the 18th of January, 1808, by H. M. S. Wanderer, from proceeding *to any [79 port in possession of His Majesty's enemies."

EDWARD MEDLEY, second lieutenant.

The captain was verbally informed by an officer of the Wanderer that the Isle of France was blockaded, and that the Venus would be a good prize if she proceeded thither.

The captain returned to Philadelphia, where he was disabled from prosecuting his voyage by the embargo. Considering the voyage as broken up, by the arrest and detention of his vessel by the Wanderer, he on that account abandoned to the underwriters.

The principal question arising on this case is, was the captain of the Venus justified iu returning to Philadelphia, after having proceeded about 1,000 miles ou his voyage, either by the indorsement on his papers, or the verbal information given by an officer of the Wanderer?

A point preliminary to the examination of this question on its merits has been made by the plaintiff in error.

The jury have found, that "by the interruption, detainment, and warning off of the British force, the voyage of the said ship Venus was broken up."

After stating the verbal information given by the British officer respecting the blockade of the Isle of France, is this further finding, "We find, in consequence thereof, that the said Elisha King was fully justified in returning to the port of Philadelphia."

These findings, it is urged, conclude the court, and render this special verdict equivalent to a general one.

But this court is not of that opinion. It has been truly said, that finding the breaking up of the voyage finds nothing. The question recurs, was the voyage broken up by one of the perils insured against, or by *the fault of the [80 captain? The auswer to this question determines the liability of the underwriters.

It has beeu also truly said that the question of justification is a question of law, uot of fact. If, as in this case, the jury find the fact specially, and draw the legal conclusion that the fact amounts to a justification, the court is not bound by that conclusion.

The case, then, is open to examination on its real merits, unaffected by the particular findings which have been noticed.

Iu proceeding to inquire whether the circumstances which actually occurred justified the captain of the Venus in returning to Philadelphia, it beeomes important to ascertain the real hazard of prosecuting his voyage. This essentially depends on the construction of the British orders of council issued in November, 1807. By the plaintiff in error it is insisted, that thesc orders extend to the direct trade between a neutral port and the colony of an enemy. In support of this construction, a very acute and elaborate criticism has been bestowed on those orders, which appears to the court merely to furnish additional proof of the imperfection of all human language. The intent of the orders to exclude from their operation this direct trade, an intent alike manifested by the context, and by the particular words forming the exception, the universal understanding of both countries, which has been, on more than one occasion, publicly and officially expressed, are too conclusive on this point to render it necessary that the court should proceed to review that analysis of this document which has been so well made at the bar.

According to the construction contended for by the plaintiffs in error, an exception profcssedly made to mitigate the rigor of the general rule, "and still to allow to neutrals the opportunity of furnishing themselves with colonial produce for their own consumption and supply," would be more rigorous than the rule itself, and would interdict that trade by 81] which *they were to be supplied with this produce for their own use, with as jealous circumspection as the trade professedly prohibited by the general rule.

It is, then, the clear and unanimous opinion of the court, that the words "shall have," which are used in the excception, relate as well to the time of capture as to the time of issuing the orders, and that a direct voyage from the United Statcs to a colony of France, was not prohibited.

It being found that the Isle of France was not actually blockaded, and the orders not prohibiting the voyage, it remains to inquirc whether the apprehension excited by the warning, or by the verbal cominunication of a British officer, justified the return of the Vcnus to Philadelphia.

It has been very truly observed that, in this case, the Venus was not physically incapacitated from prosccuting her voyage.

With equal truth has it been observed, that there was no legal impediment to her proceeding, because the voyage was not prohibited by the orders of November, 1807; and, cousequently, the indorsement on her papers would not have increased the danger.

There did not, then, at the time the voyage was abandoned, exist, either in fact, or in law, the restraint or detention against which the underwriters insured. From fear, founded on misrepresentation, the voyage was broken up, and the vessel returned to her port of departure.

Whether this might be justified under any circumstances it is unneccssary to determine. But the court is of opinion that the circumstances of this case did not justify it. The Venus might have proceeded, and ought to have proceeded, until she could obtain further information. It would be dangerous in the extreme if any false intelligence received on a voyage *might justify a captain in acting [82 as if that intelligence were true.

The case of Blackenhagen v. The London Assurance Company has a strong bearing on this case, and though that was a decision at Nisi Prius, it is entitled to all the respect which is due to the Court of Common Pleas. After the same opinion had been successively given by Lord Ellenborough, and by Sir James Mansfield, it was affirmed by the whole court, and the jury having found against the opinion of the judge, a new trial was granted.

The court gives no opinion on the question how far the underwriters would have beeu liable, had the orders of council prohibited the trade to the Isle of France. This decision is not intended in any manner to affect that question.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

LEWIS v. HARWOOD.

A bond in an action upon which it would be necessary to assign breaches, and call in a jury to assess damages, is not assignable, under the statute of Virginia.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, in an action of debt upon a bond dated February 3, 1784, the condition of which was, that if the obligor should pay to William Whetcroft, his attorney, heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, the sum of 3,000*l.* current money of Virginia, on or before the 1st of January, 1785, then the obligation to be void.

Provided that if the obligor, on application by the obligee at the town of Fredericksburg, on or after the 1st of January, 1785, should pay to the obligee 3,000*l.* in officers' certificates of a certain description, or should pay the interest of 6 per cent. from the date of the bond, on such certificates, if not paid, aud should annually and punctually pay the said 6 per cent. *when applied to as before mentioued, [83 in doing of which the condition of the bond was to be dischargeable by payment of the 3.000*l.* officers' certificates, otherwise the bond was to have its full force and effect.

Upon the pleas of payment, and conditions performed, the verdict and judgment below were for the plaintiff.

The defendant brought his writ of error.

Terrell and Swann, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

That the bond was not assignable under the act of assembly of Virginia, and therefore the plaintiff below, who was the assignee, could not recover in his own uame.

The act of 1748 applies only to a bond given for a debt. And by a subsequent act, it is explained to mean a money debt.

The subsequent act makes tobacco bonds assignable. In the case of Henderson v. Hepburn (2 Call, 232, 238), it is decided that an assignee cannot maintain an action of debt in his own name upon a bond with a collateral condition. (Craig v. Craig, 1 Call, 483.)

The condition of the bond is either to pay 3,000*l.* by a certain day, or to pay 3,000*l.* in certificates, or to pay interest on the certificates.

A bond is not assignable unless it be for a debt so certain, as not to require the aid of a jury to assess the damages, or to ascertain the sum due.

February 24. LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows: On the 3d 84] day of February, 1784, the *plaintiff executed his bond to William Whetcroft, in the penal sum of 6,000*l.*, to which there is a condition in the following words: "The condition of the above obligation is such, that if the said John Lewis shall well and truly pay to the said William Whetcroft the full sum of three thousand pounds, current money of Virginia, on or before the first day of January, 1785, then this obligation to be void. Provided, and it is to be understood, that in case the said Lewis, on application by the said Whetcroft to him, in the town of Fredericksburg, on or after the said first day of January, shall pay unto the said William, or his attorney, the sum of three thousand pounds in officers' certificates issued under an act of assembly passed November, 1781, for pay or arrearages of pay and depreciation, or shall well and truly pay the interest of six per centum from the date hereof, on the said certificates, if not paid, and shall moreover annually and punctually pay the said six per cent. when applied to as before mentioned, in doing of which the condition of this bond is dischargeable by payment of the said three thousand pounds officers' certificates; otherwise the bond shall have its full force and effect.

This bond was assigned to the defendant on the 3d of August 1790, and an action at law was brought on it in the name of the assignee in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Virginia, when judgment was rendered for the defendant.

On this judgment a writ of error has been sued out, and the plaintiff alleges that the same should be reversed, because the bond on which this action is brought is not assignable under the laws of Virginia, so as to enable the assignee to prosecute at law in his own name. Other causes of error have been assigned, but the opinion of the court being with the plaintiff on the first point, it will not be necessary to take any notice of the objections which have been made to the pleadings, or to the imperfect finding of the jury.

85*] *A bond not being assignable at common law, the present question must turn altogether on the statutes of Virginia. It seems to have been for a long time doubted, after passing the act of 1748 (c. 27), whether any but bonds conditioned to pay money or tobacco were assignable. That question was, however, at last settled by the Court of Appeals, in the case of Henderson v. Hepburn, in which it was decided that a bond with a collateral condition was not, within the meaning of this act, assignable. With this decision the court not only feels no inclination to interfere, but thinks it a fair and just exposition of the acts which had then been passed on this subject. The bonds intended by the legislature were most clearly such as were to become void on the payment of a sum certain, and where no intervention or assessment of a jury was necessary. Bonds which require particular breaches to be assigned, damages on which were to be estimated or liquidated by a jury, do not appear to have been contemplated.

It being then settled that bonds with collateral conditions were not assignable under the laws in force at the time of the making of this assignment, it only remains to ascertain the true character of the condition of the bond on which this action is brought.

Although by payment of 3,000*l.* on or before a certain day, the obligor might have discharged himself from the penalty, it was part of the condition that, on the application of the obligee, by a certain day, a payment in certain certificates, which were not money, might be substituted. This created an alternative by which the penalty might be discharged either by money or officers' certificates; and although the consent of both parties might be necessary to a payment in the latter way, still, as it made part of the written contract, the court cannot but perceive that, on a certain contingency, it was to be considered as a bond on which it might, as it did, become necessary to assign breaches and call in a jury to assess damages. If we look at the record, we shall find the *parties, their counsel and the jury [86 treating it as a bond of this description.

It is the opinion, therefore, of the court, that this bond was not assignable under the laws of Virginia, and that the jugdment of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia must be reversed, and judgment on the verdict be arrested.

RIDDLE AND COMPANY v. MANDEVILLE AND JAMESSON.

The court below upon a mandate on reversal of its judgment may award execution for the costs of the appellant in that court.

A MANDATE had been issued upon the reversal of the decree in this case at the last term, in which, "this court, proceeding to give such decree as the said Circuit Court ought to have given, doth decree and order, that the defendants pay to the plaintiffs the sum of 1,500 dollars, that being the amount of the note in the bill mentioned, together with interest thereon from the time the same became due, you are hereby commanded, that such execution and proceedings be had on the said decree of the said Supreme Court, as, according to equity and justice, and the laws of the United States, ought to be had, the said writ of error notwithstanding."

Nothing having been said respecting the costs, the court below had not issued execution for the costs of the appellant.

E. J. Lee moved the court for a further mandate to the court below, to award the costs of that court.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. The court below is always competent to award costs in a chancery suit in that court, and, in case of a mandate, may issue execution therefor.

87*] *FLETCHER v. PECK.

If the breach of covenant assigned be, that the state had no authority to sell and dispose of the land, it is not a good plea in bar to say that the governor was legally empowered to sell and convey the premises, although the facts stated in the plea as inducement, are sufficient to justify a direct negative of the breach assigned.

It is not necessary that a breach of covenant be assigned in the very words of the covenant. It is sufficient if it show a substautial breach.

The court will not declare a law to be unconstitutional unless the opposition between the constitution and the law be clear and plain.

The legislature of Georgia, in 1795, had the power of disposing of the unappropriated lands within its own limits.

In a contest between two individuals, claiming under an act of a legislature, the court cannot inquire into the motives which actuated the members of that legislature. If the legislature might constitutionally pass such an act; if the act be clothed with all the requisite forms of a law, a court, sitting as a court of law, cannot sustain a suit between individuals founded on the allegation that the aet is a nullity in consequence of the impure motives which influenced certain members of the legisiature which passed the law.

When a law is in its nature a contract, when absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot devest those rights.

A law, annulling conveyances, is unconstitutional, because it is a law impairing the obligation of contracts, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States.

The proclamation of the King of Great Britain in 1763 did not alter the boundaries of Georgia.

The nature of the Indian title is not such as to be absolutely repugnant to seizure in fee on the part of the state.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts, in an action of covenant brought by Fletcher against Peck.

The first count of the declaration states that Peck, by his deed of bargain and sale dated the 14th of May, 1803, in consideration of 3,000 dollars, sold and conveyed to Fletcher 15,000 acres of land lying in common and undivided in a tract described as follows: beginning on the river Mississippi, where the latitude 32 deg. 40 min. north of the equator intersects the same, running thence along the same parallel of latitude a due east course to the Tombigby River, thence up the said Tombigby River to where the latitude of 32 deg. 43 min. 52 sec. intersects the same, thence along the same parallel of latitude a due west course to the Mississippi; thence down the said river to the place of beginning; the said described tract containing 500,000 acres, and is the same which was conveyed by Nathaniel Prime to Oliver Phelps, by deed dated the 27th of February, 1796, and of which the said Phelps conveyed four-fifths to Benjamin Hichborn, and the said Peck, by deed dated the 8th of December, 1800; the said tract of 500,000 acres, being part of a tract which James Greenleaf conveyed to the said N. uary, 1795, to the said James Gunn and others, under the name of James Gunn, Mathew 88] M'Allister, and George *Walker and their associates, and their heirs and assigns in fee-simple, under the name of the Georgia Company; which patent was issued by virtue of an act of the legislature of Georgia, passed the 7th of January, 1795, entitled "An act supplementary to an act for appropriating part of the unlocated territory of this state for the payment of the late state troops, and for other purposes therein mentioned, and declaring the right of this state to the unappropriated territory thereof, for the protection and support of the frontiers of this state, and for other purposes."

That Peck, in his deed to Fletcher, covenanted "that the state of Georgia aforesaid was, at the time of the passing of the act of the legislature thereof (entitled as aforesaid), legally seized in fee of the soil thereof, subject only to the extinguishment of part of the Indian title thereon. And that the legislature of the said state at the time of passing the act of sale aforesaid, had good right to sell and dispose of the same in manner pointed out by the said act. And that the governor of the said state had lawful authority to issue his grant aforesaid, by virtue of the said act. And further, that all the title which the said state of Georgia ever had in the aforegranted premises has been legally conveyed to the said John Peck by force of the conveyances aforesaid. And further, that the title to the premises so conveyed by the state of Georgia, and finally vested in the said Peck, has been in no way constitutionally or legally impaired by virtue of any subsequent act of any subsequent legislature of the said state of Georgia."

The breach assigned in the first count was, that at the time the said act of 7th of January, 1795, was passed, "the said legislature had no authority to sell and dispose of the tenements aforesaid, or of any part thereof, in the manner pointed out in the said act."

The 2d count, after stating the covenants in the deed as stated in the first count, averred, "that at Augusta, in the said state of Georgia, on the 7th day of January, 1795, the said James 89] Gunn, Mathew M'Allister *and George Walker, promised and assured divers members of the legislature of the said state then duly and legally sitting in general assembly of the said state, that if the said members would assent to and vote for the passing of the act of the said general assembly, entitled as aforesaid, the same then being before the said general assembly in the form of a bill, and if the said bill should pass into a law, that such members should have a share of, and be interested in, all the lands, which they the said Gunn, M'Allister and Walker, and their associates, should purchase of the said state by virtue of and under authority of the same law: and that divers of the said members to whom the said promise and assurance was so made as aforesaid, were unduly influenced thereby, and under such influence did then and there vote for the passing the said bill into a law; by reason whereof the said law was a nullity, and from the time of passing the same as aforesaid was, ever since has been, and now is, absolutely void and of no effect whatever; and that the title which the said state of Georgia had in the aforegranted premises at any time whatever was never legally conveyed to the said Peck, by force of the conveyances aforesaid."

The third count, after repeating all the averments and recitals contained in the second, further averred, that after the passing of the said act, and of the execution of the patent aforesaid, the general assembly of the state of Georgia, being a legislature of that state subsequent to that which passed the said act, at a session thereof, duly and legally holden at Augusta, in the said state, did, on the 13th of February, 1796, because of the undue influence used as aforesaid, in procuring the said act to be passed, and for other causes, pass another certain act in the words following, that is to say, "An act declaring null and void a certain usurped act passed by the last legislature of this state at Augusta, the 7th day of January, 1795, under the pretended title of 'An act supplementary to an act entitled an act for appropriating a part of the unlocated *territory [90 of the state for the payment of the late state troops, and for other purposes therein mentioned, declaring the right of this state to the unappropriated territory thereof for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes,' and for expunging from the public records the said usurped act, and declaring the right of this state to all lands lying within the boundaries therein mentioned."

By which, after a long preamble, it is enacted, "That the said usurped act passed on the 7th of January, 1795, entitled, &c., be, and the same is hereby declared, null and void, and the grant or grants, right or rights, claim or claims, issued, deduced, or derived therefrom, or from any clause, letter or spirit of the same, or any part of the same, is hereby also annulled, rendered void, and of no effect; and as the same was made without constitutional authority, and fraudulently obtained, it is hereby declared of no binding force or effect on this state, or the people thereof, but is and are to be considered, both law and grant, as they ought to be, ipso facto, of themselves, void, and the territory therein mentioned is also hereby declared to be the sole property of the state, subject only to the right of treaty of the United States to enable the state to purchase under its pre-emption right, the Indian title to the same."

The 2d section directs the enrolled law, the grant, and all deeds, contracts, &c., relative to the purchase, to be expunged from the records of the state, &c.

The 3d section declares that neither the law nor the grant, nor any other conveyance, or agreement relative thereto, shall be received in evidence in any court of law or equity in the state so far as to establish a right to the territory or any part thereof, but they may be received in evidence in private actions between individuals for the recovery of money paid upon pretended sales, &c.

The 4th section provides for the repayment of money, funded stock, &c., which may have been paid into the treasury, provided it was then remaining *therein, and provided [91 the repayment should be demanded within eight months from that time.

The 5th section prohibits any application to Congress, or the general government of the United States for the extinguishment of the Indian claim; and

The 6th section provides for the promulgation of the act.

The count then assigns a breach of the covenant in the following words, viz.: "And by reason of the passing of the said last-mentioned act, and by virtue thereof, the title which the said Peck had, as aforesaid, in and to the tenements aforesaid, and in and to any part thereof, was constitutionally and legally impaired, and rendered null and void."

The 4th count, after reciting the covenants as in the first, assigned as a breach, "that at the time of passing of the act of the 7th of January, 1795, the United States of America were seized in fee-simple of all the tenements aforesaid, and of all the soil thereof, and that at that time the state of Georgia was not seized in fee-simple of the tenements aforesaid, or of any part thereof, nor of any part of the soil thereof, subject only to the extinguishment of part of the Indian title thereon."

The defendant pleaded four pleas, viz.:

1st plea. As to the breach assigned in the first count, he says,

That on the 6th of May, 1789, at Augusta, in the state of Georgia, the people of that state by their delegates, duly authorized and empowered to form, declare, ratify, and confirm a constitution for the government of the said state, did form, declare, ratify, and confirm such constitution, in the words following:

Here was inserted the whole constitution, the 16th section of which declares, that the general assembly shall have power to make all laws and 92] ordinances *which they shall deem necessary and proper for the good of the state which shall not be repugnant to this constitution. The plea then avers, that until and at the ratification and confirmation aforesaid of the said constitution, the people of the said state were seized, among other large parcels of land, and tracts of country, of all the tenements described by the said Fletcher in his said first count, and of the soil thereof in absolute sovereignty, and in fee-simple (subject only to the extinguishment of the Indian title to part thereof); and that upon the confirmation and ratification of the said constitution, and by force thereof, the said state of Georgia became seized in absolute sovereignty, and in fee-simple, of all the tenements aforesaid, with the soil thereof, subject as aforesaid; the same being within the territory and jurisdiction of the said state, and the same state continued so seized in fee-simple, until the said tenements and soil were conveyed by letters patent under the great seal of the said state, and under the signature of George Matthews, Esq., Governor thereof, in the manner and form mentioned by the said Fletcher, in his said first count. And the said Peck further saith, that on the 7th of January, 1795, at a session of the general assembly of the said state duly holden at Augusta within the same, according to the provisions of the said constitution, the said general assembly, then and there possessing all the powers vested in the legislature of the said state by virtue of the said constitution, passed the act above mentioned by the said Fletcher in the assignment of the breach aforesaid, which act is in the words following, that is to say, "An act supplementary," &c.

Here was recited the whole act, which, after a long preamble, declares the jurisdictional and territorial rights, and the fee-simple to be in the state, and then enacts, that certain portions of the vacant lands should be sold to four distinct associations of individuals, calling themselves respectively, "The Georgia Company," "The Georgia Mississippi Company," "The Upper Mississippi Company," and "The Tennessee Company."

The tract ordered to be sold to James Gunn and *others (the Georgia Company), was [93 described as follows: "All that tract or parcel of land, including islands, situate, lying and being within the following boundaries; that is to say, beginning on the Mobile Bay where the latitude 31 deg. north of the equator, intersects the same, running thence up the said bay to the mouth of Lake Tensaw; thence up the said Lake Tensaw to the Alabama River, including Curry's, and all other islands therein; thence up the said Alabama River to the junction of the Coosa and Oakfushee Rivers; thence up the Coosa River above the big shoals to where it intersects the latitude of thirty-four degrees north of the equator; thence a due west course to the Mississippi River; thence down the middle of the said river to the latitude 32 deg. 40 min.; thence, a due east course to the Don or Tombigby River; thence down the middle of the said river to its junction with the Alabama River; thence down the middle of the said river to Mobile Bay; thence down the Mobile Bay to the place of beginning.

Upon payment of 50,000 dollars, the governor was required to issue and sign a grant for the same, taking a mortgage to secure the balance, being 200,000 dollars, payable on the first of November, 1795.

The plea then avers, that all the tenements described in the first count are included in, and parcel of, the lands in the said act to be sold to the said Gunn, M'Allister and Walker, and their associates, as in the act is mentioned.

And that by force and virtue of the said act, and of the constitution aforesaid, of the said state, the said Matthews, Governor of the said state, was fully and legally empowered to sell and convey the tenements aforesaid, and the soil thereof, subject as aforesaid, in fee-simple by the said patent under the seal of the said state, and under his signature, according to the terms, limitations, and conditions in the said act mentioned. And all this he is ready to verify; wherefore, &c.

*To this plea there was a general [94 demurrer and joinder.

2d plea. To the second count the defendant, "protesting that the said Gunn, M'Allister and Walker, did not make the promises and assurances to divers members of the legislature of the said state of Georgia, supposed by the said Fletcher in his second count, for plea saith, that until after the purchase by the said Greenleaf, as is mentioned in the said second count, neither he the said defendant, nor the said Prime, nor the said Greenleaf, nor the said Phelps, nor the said Hichborn, nor either of them, had any notice nor knowledge that any such promises and assurances were made by the said Gunn, M'Allister and Walker, or either of them, to any of the members of the legislature of the said state of Georgia, as is supposed by the said Fletcher in his said second count, and this he is ready to verify," &c.

To this plea also there was a general demurrer and joinder.

3d plea to the third count was the same as the second plea, with the addition of an averment that Greenleaf, Prince, Phelps, Hichborn and the defendant were, until and after the purchase by Greenleaf, on the 22d of August, 1795, and ever since have been, citizens of some of the United States other than the state of Georgia.

To this plea also there was a general demurrer and joinder.

4th plea. To the fourth count, the defendant pleaded that at the time of passing the act of the 7th of January, 1795, the state of Georgia was seized in fee-simple of all the tenements and territories aforesaid, and of all the soil thereof, subject only to the extinguishment of the Indian title to part thereof, and of this he puts himself on the country, and the plaintiff likewise.

95*] *Upon the issue joined upon the fourth plea, the jury found the following special verdict, viz.:

That his late majesty, Charles the second, King of Great Britain, by his letters patent under the great seal of Great Britain, bearing date the thirtieth day of June, in the seventeenth year of his reign, did grant unto Edward Earl of Clarendon, George Duke of Albemarle, William Earl of Craven, John Lord Berkeley, Antony Lord Ashby, Sir George Carteret, Sir John Colleton, and Sir William Berkeley, therein called lords proprietors, and their heirs and assigns, all that province, territory, or tract of ground, situate, lying and being in North America, and described as follows: extending north and eastward as far as the north end of Carahtuke River or gullet, upon a straight westerly line to Wyonoahe Creek, which lies within or about the degrees of thirty-six and thirty minutes of northern latitude, and so west in a direct line as far as the South Seas, and south and westward as far as the degrees of twenty-nine inclusive, northern latitude, and so west in a direct line as far as the South Seas (which territory was called Carolina), together with all ports, harbors, bays, rivers, soil, land, fields, woods, lakes, and other rights and privileges therein named; that the said lords proprietors, grantees aforesaid, afterwards by force of said grant, entered upon and took possession of said territory, and established within the same many settlements, and erected therein fortifications and posts of defense.

And the jury further find, that the northern part of the said tract of land, granted as aforesaid to the said lords proprietors, was afterwards created a colony by the King of Great Britain, under the name of North Carolina, and that the most northern part of the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude was then and ever afterwards the boundary and line between North Carolina and South Carolina, and that the land, described in the plaintiff's declaration, is situate in that part of said tract, formerly called Carolina, which was afterwards a colony called South Carolina, as aforesaid; that afterwards, on the twenty-sixth day of July, in the third 96] *year of the reign of His late Majesty George the second, King of Great Britain, and in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine, the heirs or legal representatives of all the said grantees, except those of Sir George Carteret, by deed of indenture, made between authorized agents of the said King George the second, and the heirs and representatives of the said grantees, in conformity to an act of the parliament of said kingdom of Great Britain, entitled, "An act for establishing an agreement with seven of the lords proprietors of Carolina for the surrender of their title and interest in that province to his majesty," for and in consideration of the sum of twenty-two thousand five hundred pounds of the money of Great Britain, paid to the said heirs and representatives of the said seven of the lords proprietors, by the said agent of the said king, sold and surrendered to his said majesty, King George the second, all their right of soil, and other privileges to the said granted territory; which deed of indenture was duly executed and was enrolled in the Chancery of Great Britain, and there remains in the chapel of the rolls, That afterwards, on the ninth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine, His said Majesty, George the second, appointed Robert Johnson, Esq., to be Governor of the province of South Carolina, by a commission under the great seal of the said kingdom of Great Britain; in which commission the said Governor Johnson is authorized to grant lands within the said province, but no particular limits of the said province is therein defined.

And the jury further find, that the said Governor of South Carolina did exercise jurisdiction in and over the said colony of South Carolinia under the commission aforesaid, claiming to have jurisdiction by force thereof as far southward and westward as the southern and western bounds of the aforementioned grant of Carolina, by King Charles the second, to the said lords proprietors, but that he was often interrupted therein and prevented therefrom in the southern and western parts of said grants by the public enemies of the King of Great Britain, who at divers times *had actual possession of the [97 southern and western parts aforesaid. That afterwards the Right Honorable Lord Viscount Percival, the Honorable Edward Digby, the Honorable George Carpenter, James Oglethorpe, Esq., with others, petitioned the lords of the committee of his said majesty's privy council for a grant of lands in South Carolina, for the charitable purpose of transporting necessitous persons and families from London to that province, to procure there a livelihood by their industry, and to be incorporated for that purpose; that the lords of the said privy council referred the said petition to the board of trade, so called, in Great Britain, who, on the seventeenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty, made report thereon, and therein recommended that his said majesty would be pleased to incorporate the said petitioners as a charitable society, by the name of "The Corporation for the purpose of establishing charitable colonies in America, with perpetual succession." And the said report further recommended, that his said majesty be pleased "to grant to the said petitioners and their successors forever, all that tract of land in his province of South Carolina, lying between the rivers Savannah and Alatamaha, to be bounded by the most navigable and largest branches of the Savannah, and the most southerly branch of the Alatamaha." And that they should be separated from the province of South Carolina, and be made a colony independent thereof, save only in the command of their militia. That afterwards, on the twenty-second day of December, one thousand seven hundred and thirty-one, the said board of trade reported further to the said lords of the privy council, and recommended that the western boundary of the new charter of the colony, to be established in South Carolina, should extend as far as that described in the ancient patents granted by King Charles the second to the late lords proprietors of Carolina, whereby that province was to extend westward in a dircet line as far as the South Seas. That afterwards, on the ninth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-two, His 98] said Majesty, George the *second, by his letters patent, or royal charter, under the great seal of the said kingdom of Great Britain, did incorporate the said Lord Viscount Percival and others, the petitioners aforesaid, into a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The trustees for establishing the colony of Georgia, in America, with perpetual succession;" and did, by the same letters patent, give and grant in free and common socage, and not in capite, to the said corporation and their successors, seven undivided parts (the whole into eight equal parts to be divided) of all those lands, countries and territories, situate, lying and being in that part of South Carolina in America, which lies from a nothern stream of a river there commonly called the Savannah, all along the sea-coast to the southward unto the most southern branch of a certain other great water or river, called the Alatamaha, and westward from the heads of the said rivers respectively in direct lines to the South Seas, and all the lands lying within said boundaries, with the islands in the sea, lying opposite to the eastern coasts of the same, together with all the soils, grounds, havens, bays, mines, minerals, woods, rivers, waters, fishings, jurisdictions, franchises, privileges, and pre-eminences within the said territories. That afterwards, in the same year, the Right Honorable John Lord Carteret, Baron of Hawnes, in the county of Bedford, then Earl Granville, and heir of the late Sir George Carteret, one of the grantees and lords proprietors aforesaid, by deed of indenture between him and the said trustees for establishing the colony of Georgia in America, for valuable consideration therein mentioned, did give, grant, bargain and sell under the said trustees for establishing the colony of Georgia aforesaid, and their successors, all his one undivided eighth part of or belonging to the said John Lord Carteret (the whole into eight equal parts to be divided) of, in, and to the aforesaid territory, seven undivided eighth parts of which had been before granted by his said majesty to said trustees.

And the jury further find, that one-eighth part of the said territory, granted to the said lords proprietors, and called Carolina as afore-99] said, which eighth part belonged *to Sir George Carteret, and was not surrendered as aforesaid, was afterwards divided and set off in severalty to the heirs of the said Sir George Carteret in that part of said territory which was afterwards made a colony by the name of North Carolina. That afterwards, in the same year, the said James Oglethorpe, Esq., one of the said corporation, for and in the name of and as agent to the said corporation, with a large number of other persons under his authority and control, took possession of said territory, granted as aforesaid to the said corporation, made a treaty with some of the native Indians within said territory, in which, for and in behalf of said corporation, he made purchases of said Indians of their native rights to parts of said territory, and erected forts in several places to keep up marks of possession. That afterwards, on the sixth day of September, in the year last mentioned, on the application of said corporation to the said board of trade, they, the said board of trade, in the name of his said majesty, sent instructions to said Robert Johnson, then Governor of South Carolina, thereby willing and requiring him to give all due countenance and encouragement for the settling of the said colony of Georgia, by being aiding and assisting to any settlers therein; and further requiring him to cause to be registered the aforesaid charter of the colony of Georgia, within the said province of South Carolina, and the same to be entered of record by the proper officer of the said province of South Carolina.

And the jury further find, that the Governor of South Carolina, after the granting the said charter of the colony of Georgia, did exercise jurisdiction south of the southern limits of said colony of Georgia, claiming the same to be within the limits of his government; and particularly that he had the superintendency and control of a military post there, and did make divers grants of land there, which lands have ever since been holden under his said grants. That afterwards, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and fifty-two, by deed of indenture made between His said Majesty, George the second, of the one part, and the said trustees for establishing the *colony [100 in America of the other part, they, the said trustees, for divers valuable considerations therein expressed, did, for themselves and their successors, grant, surrender, and yield up to His said Majesty, George the second, his heirs and successors, their said letters patent, and their charter of corporation, and all right, title and authority, to be or continue a corporate body, and all their powers of government, and all other powers, jurisdictions, franchises, pre-eminences and privileges therein, or thereby granted or conveyed to them; and did also grant and convey to His said Majesty, George the second, his heirs and successors, all the said lands, countries, territories and premises, as well the said one-eighth part thereof granted by the said John Lord Carteret to them as aforesaid, as also the said seven-eighths parts thereof, granted as aforesaid by his said majesty's letters patent or charter as aforesaid, together with all the soils, grounds, havens, ports, bays, mines, woods, rivers, waters, fishings, jurisdictions, franchises, privileges and pre-eminences, within said territories, with all their right, title, interest, claim or demand whatsoever in and to the premises; and which grant and surrender aforesaid, was then accepted by his said majesty for himself and his successors; and said indeuture was duly executed on the part of said trustees, with the privity and by the direction of the common council of the said corporation by affixing the common seal of said corporation thereunto, and on the part of his said majesty by causing the great seal of Great Britain to be thereunto affixed. That afterwards, on the sixth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four, His said Majesty, George the second, by his royal commissiou of that date under the great seal of Great Britain, constituted and appointed John Reynolds, Esq., to be captain-general and commauder-in-chief in aud over said colouy of Georgia in America, with the following boundaries, viz.. lying from the most northerly stream of a river there commonly called Savannah, all along the sea coast to the southward unto the most southeru stream of a certain other great water or river called the Alatamaha, and westward from the heads of the said rivers respectively, in straight lines to the South Seas, and all the space, circuit and 101] precinct of *land lying within the said boundaries, with the islands in the sea lyiug opposite to the eastern coast of said lands within twenty leagues of the same. That afterwards, on the tenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, a definitive treaty of peace was concluded at Paris, between His Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain, and His Majesty, George the third, King of Great Britain; by the twentieth article of which treaty, His said Catholic Majesty did cede and guarauty, in full right to His Britannic Majesty, Florida, with Fort St. Augustin, and the bay of Pensacola, as well as all that Spaiu possessed on the continent of North America, to the east or to the south-east of the river Mississippi, and in general all that depended on the said countries and island, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and all rights acquired by treaties or otherwise, which the Catholic king aud the crown of Spaiu had till then over the said countries, lands, places, and their inhabitauts; so that the Catholic king did cedc aud make over the whole to the said kiug and the said crown of Great Britain, and that in the most ample manner and form.

That afterwards, on the seventh day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, His said Majesty, George the third, King of Great Britain, by and with the advice of his privy council, did issue his royal proclamation, therein publishing and declaring, that he, the said King of Great Britain, had, with the advice of his said privy council, granted his letters patent, under the great seal of Great Britain, to erect withiu the couutries and islands ceded and coufirmed to him by the said treaty, four distiuct and separate governments, styled and called by the names of Quebec, East Florida, West Florida and Grenada; in which proclamation the said government of West Florida is described as follows, viz.: Bounded to the southward by the Gulf of Mexico, including all islauds within six leagues of the coast from the river Apalachicola to Lake Pontchartrain, to the westward by the said lake, the Lake Maurepas, and the river Mississippi; to the northward by a *liue drawn due east from that part of [102 the river Mississippi which lies in thirty-one degrees of north latitude, to the river Apalachichola or Catahouchee; and to the eastward by the said river. And in the same proclamation the said governmeut of East Florida is described as follows, viz., bounded to the westward by the Gulf of Mexico and the Apalachichola River; to the northward by a liue drawn from that part of the said river where the Catahouchee and Flint rivers meet, to the source of St. Mary's River, and by the course of the said river to the Atlantic ocean; and to the east and south by the Atlantic ocean and the Gulf of Florida, including all islands within six leagues of the sea coast. And in and by the same proclamation, all lands lyiug between the rivers Alatamaha and St. Mary's were declared to be annexed to the said province of Georgia; and that in and by the same proclamatiou, it was further declared by the said king as follows, viz.: "That it is our royal will and pleasure for the present, as aforesaid, to reserve uuder our sovereiguty, protectiou and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land aud territories not included within the limits of our said three uew governments, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, as also all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and north-west as aforesaid; and we do hereby strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our special leave and license for that purpose first obtained."

And the jury find, that the land described in the plaintiff's declaration did lay to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall iuto the sea from the west and north-west as aforesaid. That afterwards, on the twenty-first day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, and in the fourth year of the reign of said King George the third, he, the said king, by his royal commission under the great seal of Great Britaiu, did constitute and appoint *George [103 Johnstoue, Esq., captain-general aud governor in chief over the said province of West Florida in America; in which commission the said province was described in the same words of limitation and extent, as in said proclamation is before set down. That afterwards, on the twentieth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousaud seven huudred and sixty-four, the said Kiug of Great Britain, by his commission under the great seal of Great Britain, did coustitute and appoint James Wright, Esq., to be the captain-general and goveruor in chief in and over the colony of Georgia, by the following bounds, viz., bounded on the north by the most northeru stream of a river there commonly called Savannah, as far as the head of the said river; and from thence westward as far as our territories extend; on the east, by the sea coast, from the said river Savannah to the most southern stream of a certain other river, called St. Mary (including all islands within twenty leagues of the coast lying between the said river Savannah and St. Mary, as far as the head thereof); and from thence westward as far as our territories extend by the north boundary line of our provinces of East and West Florida.

That afterwards, from the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, to the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, an open war existed between the colonies of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, called the United States, on the one part, and His said Majesty, George the third, King of Great Britain, on the other part. And on the third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, a definitive treaty of peace was signed and concluded at Paris, by and between certain authorized commissioners on the part of the said belligerent powers, which was afterwards duly ratified and confirmed by the said two respective powers; by the first article of which treaty, the said King George the third, by the name of His Britannic Majesty, acknowl-
104*] edged the aforesaid United *States to be free, sovereign and independent states; that he treated with them as such, and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claim to the government, proprietary and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof; and by the second article of said treaty, the western boundary of the United States is a line drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi, until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude; and the southern boundary is a line drawn due east from the determination of the said line, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the equator, to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catahouchee; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint River; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's River; and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's River to the Atlantic Ocean.

And the jury further find, that in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, the Congress of the United States did instruct the said commissioners, authorized on the part of the United States to negotiate and conclude the treaty aforesaid, that they should claim in this negotiation, respecting the boundaries of the United States, that the most northern part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude should be agreed to be the southern boundary of the United States, on the ground that that was the southern boundary of the colony of Georgia; and that the river Mississippi should be agreed to be the western boundary of the United States, on the ground that the colony of Georgia and other colonies, now states of the United States, were bounded westward by that river; and that the commissioners on the part of the United States did, in said negotiation, claim the same accordingly, and that on those grounds the said southern and western boundaries of the United States were agreed to by the commissioners on the part of the King of Great Britain. That afterwards, in the same year, the legislature of the state of Georgia passed an act, declaring her right, and proclaiming her title to all the lands lying within her boundaries to the river Mississippi. And in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, the [
105 legislature of the said state of Georgia established a county, by the name of Bourbon, on the Mississippi, and appointed civil officers for said county, which lies within the boundaries now denominated the Mississippi territory; that thereupon a dispute arose between the state of South Carolina and the state of Georgia, concerning their respective boundaries, the said states separately claiming the same territory; and the said state of South Carolina, on the first day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, petitioned the Congress of the United States for a hearing and determination of the differences and disputes subsisting between them and the state of Georgia, agreeably to the ninth article of the then confederation and perpetual union between the United States of America; that the said Congress of the United States did thereupon on the same day resolve, that the second Monday in May then next following should be assigned for the appearance of the said states of South Carolina and Georgia, by their lawful agents, and did then and there give notice thereof to the said state of Georgia, by serving the legislature of said state with an attested copy of said petition of the state of South Carolina, and said resolve of Congress. That afterwards, on the eighth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, by the joint consent of the agents of said states of South Carolina and Georgia, the Congress resolved that further day be given for the said hearing, and assigned the fifteenth day of the same month for that purpose. That afterwards, on the eighteenth day of May aforesaid, the said Congress resolved, that further day be given for the said hearing, and appointed the first Monday in September, then next ensuing, for that purpose. That afterwards, on the first day of September then next ensuing, authorized agents from the states of Carolina and Georgia attended in pursuance of the order of Congress aforesaid, and produced their credentials, which were read in Congress, and there recorded, together with the acts of their respective legislatures; which acts and credentials authorized the said agents to settle and compromise all the differences and disputes aforesaid, as well as to [ 106 appear and represent the said states respectively before any tribunal that might be created by Congress for that purpose, agreeably to the said ninth article of the confederation. And in conformity to the powers aforesaid, the said commissioners of both the said states of South Carolina and Georgia, afterwards, on the 28th day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, met at Beaufort, in the state of South Carolina, and then and there entered into, signed, and concluded a convention between the states of South Carolina and Georgia aforesaid. By the first artiele of which convention it was mutually agreed between the said states, that the most northern branch or stream of the river Savannah from the sea or mouth of such stream to the fork or confluence of the rivers then called Tugaloo and Keowee; and from thence the most northern branch or stream of said river Tugaloo, till it intersects the northern boundary line of South Carolina, if the said branch or stream of Tugaloo extends so far north, reserving all the islands in the said rivers Savannah and Tugaloo, to Georgia; but if the head, spring, or source of any branch or stream of the said river Tugaloo does not extend to the north boundary line of South Carolina, then a west course to the Mississippi, to be drawn from the head, spring, or source of the said branch or stream of Tugaloo River, which extends to the highest northern latitude, shall forever thereafter form the separation, limit, and boundary between the states of South Carolina and Georgia. And by the third article of the convention aforesaid, it was agreed by the said states of South Carolina and Georgia, that the said state of South Carolina should not thereafter claim any lands to the eastward, southward, south-eastward, or west of the said boundary above established; and that the said state of South Carolina did relinquish and cede to the said state of Georgia all the right, title, and claim which the said state of South Carolina had to the government, sovereignty, and jurisdiction in and over the same, and also the right and pre-emption of soil from the native Indians, and all the estate, property, and claim which the said state of South Carolina had in or to the said lands.

107*] *And the jury further find, that the land described in the plaintiff's declaration is situate south-west of the boundary line last aforesaid; and that the same land lies within the limits of the territory granted to the said lords proprietors of Carolina, by King Charles the second, as aforesaid, and within the bounds of the territory agreed to belong and ceded to the King of Great Britain, by the said treaty of peace made in seventeen hundred and sixty-three, as aforesaid; and within the bounds of the United States, as agreed and settled by the treaty of peace in seventeen hundred and eighty-three, as aforesaid; and north of a line drawn due east from the mouth of the said river Yazoos, where it unites with the Mississippi aforesaid. That afterwards, on the ninth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, the delegates of said state of South Carolina in Congress moved, that the said convention, made as aforesaid, be ratified and confirmed, and that the lines and limits therein specified be thereafter taken and received as the boundaries between the said states of South Carolina and Georgia; which motion was by the unanimous vote of Congress committed, and the same convention was thereupon entered of record on the journals of Congress; and on the same day John Kean and Daniel Huger, by virtue of authority given to them by the legislature of said state of South Carolina, did execute a deed of cession on the part of said state of South Carolina, by which they ceded and conveyed to the United States, in Congress assembled, for the benefit of all the said states, all their right and title to that territory and tract of land included within the river Mississippi, and a line beginning at that part of the said river which is intersected by the southern boundary line of the state of North Carolina; and continuing along the said boundary line, until it intersects the ridge or chain of mountains which divides the eastern from the western waters; then to be continued along the top of the said ridge of mountains until it intersects a line to be drawn due west from the head of the southern branch of the Tugaloo River to the said mountains, and thence to run a due west course to the river Mississippi; which deed of cession was *thereupon received [108 and entered on the journals of Congress, and accepted by them.

The jury further find, that the Congress of the United States did, on the sixth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand, seven hundred and eighty, recommend to the several states in the Union having claims to western territory, to make a liberal cession to the United States of a portion of their respective claims for the common benefit of the Union. That afterwards, on the ninth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, the said Congress resolved, that whereas the states of Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, and Virginia had, in consequence of the recommendation of Congress on the sixth day of September aforesaid, made cessions of their claims to western territory to the United States in Congress assembled, for the use of the United States, the said subject be again presented to the view of the states of N. Carolina, S. Carolina and Georgia, who had not complied with so reasonable a proposition; and that they be once more solicited to consider with candor and liberality the expectations of their sister states, and the earnest and repeated applications made to them by Congress on this subject. That afterwards, on the twentieth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, the Congress of the United States passed the following resolve, viz., that it be and hereby is represented to the states of North Carolina and Georgia, that the lands, which have been ceded by the other states in compliance with the recommendation of this body, are now selling in large quantities for public securities; that the deeds of cession from the different states have been made without annexing an express condition, that they should not operate till the other states, under like circumstances, made similar cessions; and that Congress have such faith in the justice and magnanimity of the states of North Carolina and Georgia, that they only think it necessary to call their attention to these circumstances, not doubting but, upon consideration of the subject, they will feel those obligations which will induce similar cessions, and that confidence which has been placed justify [109 in them. That afterwards, on the first day of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, the legislature of said state of Georgia, then duly convened, passed an act for ceding part of the territorial claims of said state to the United States; by which act the state of Georgia authorized her delegates in Congress to convey to the United States the territorial claims of said state of Georgia to a certain tract of country bounded as follows, to wit: beginning at the middle of the river Catahouchee or Apalachicola, where it is intersected by the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and from thence due north one hundred and forty miles, thence due west to the river Mississippi; thence down the middle of the said river to where it intersects the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and along the said degree to the place of beginning; annexing the provisions and conditions following, to wit: That the United States in Cougress assembled, shall guaranty to the citizens of said territory a republican form of government, subject only to such changes as may take place in the federal constitution of the United States; secondly, that the navigation of all the waters included in the said cession shall be equally free to all the citizens of the United States; nor shall any tonnage on vessels, or any duties whatever, be laid on any goods, wares, or merchandises that pass up or down the said waters, unless for the use and benefit of the United States. Thirdly, that the sum of one hundred and seventy-one thousand and twenty-eight dollars, forty-five cents, which has been expended in quieting the minds of the Indians, and resisting their hostilities, shall be allowed as a charge against the United States, and be admitted iu payment of the specie requisition of that state's quotas that have been or may be required by the United States. Fourthly, that in all cases where the state may require defense, the expenses arising thereon shall be allowed as a charge against the United States, agreeably to the articles of confederation. Fifthly, that Congress shall guaranty and secure all the remaining territorial rights of the state, as pointed out and expressed by the definitive treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, the convention be-110] tween the said *state and the state of South Carolina; entered into the twenty-eighth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seveu, and the clause of an act of the said state of Georgia, deseribing the boundaries thereof, passed the seventeenth day of February, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, which act of the said state of Georgia, with said conditions annexed, was by the delegates of said state in Congress presented to the said Congress, and the same was, after being read, committed to a committee of Congress; who, on the fifteenth day of July, in the said year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, made report thereon to Congress, as follows, to wit: "The committee, having fully considered the subject referred to them, are of opinion, that the cession offered by the state of Georgia cannot be accepted on the terms proposed; first, because it appears highly probable that on running the boundary line between that state and the adjoining state or states, a claim to a large tract of country extending to the Mississippi, and lying between the tract proposed to be ceded, and that lately ceded by South Carolina, will be retained by the said state of Georgia; and therefore the land which the state now offers to cede must be too far removed from the other lands hitherto ceded to the Union to be of any immediate advantages to it. Secondly, because there appears to be due from the state of Georgia, on specie requisitions, but a small part of the sum mentioned in the third proviso or conditiou before recited; and it is inipropei in this case to allow a charge against the specie requisitions of Congress which may hereafter be made, especially as the said state stands charged to the Uuited States for very considerable sums of money loaned. And, thirdly, beeause the fifth proviso or condition before recited contains a special guaranty of territorial rights, and such a guaranty has not been made by Congress to any state, and which, cousidering the spirit and meaning of the confederation, must be unnecessary and improper. But the committee are of opinion, that the first, second, and fourth provisions, before recited, and also the third, with some variations, may be admitted; and that, should the said state extend the bounds of her cession, *and vary the [111 terms thereof as herein after mentioned, Congress may accept the same. Whereupon they submit the following resolutions: That the cession of claims to western territory, offered by the state of Georgia, cannot be accepted on the terms contained in her act passed the first of February last. That in case the said state shall authorize her delegates in Congress to make a cession of all her territorial claims to lands west of the river Apalachicola, or west of a meridian line running through or near the point where that river intersects the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and shall omit the last proviso in her said act, and shall so far vary the proviso respecting the sum of one hundred and seveuty-one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight dollars, and forty-five cents, expended in quieting and resisting the Indians, as that the said state shall have credit in the specie requisitions of Congress, to the amount of her specie quotas on the past requisitions, and for the residue, in her account with the United States for moneys loaned, Congress will accept the cession." Which report beiug read, Congress resolved, that Congress agreed to the said report.

The jury further find, that in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, Thomas Jefferson, Esq., then Secretary of State for the United States, made a report to the then President of the United States, which was intended to serve as a basis of instructions to the commissioners of the United States for settling the points which were theu in dispute between the King of Spain and the government of the United States; one of which points in dispute was, the just boundaries between West Florida and the southern line of the United States. On this point, the said Secretary of State, in his report aforesaid, expresses himself as follows, to wit: "As to boundary, that between Georgia and West Florida is the only oue which needs any explanation. It (that is, the court of Spain) sets up a claim to possessions withiu the state of Georgia, founded on her (Spain) having rescued them by force from the British during the late war. The following view of that subject seems to admit of no reply. The several states now composing the Uuited States *of America were, from their first es- [*112 tablishment, separate and distinct societies, dependent on no other society of men whatever. They continued at the head of their respective governments the executive magistrate who presided over the one they had left, and thereby secured in effect a constant amity with the nation. In this stage of their government their several boundaries were fixed, and particularly the southern boundary of Georgia, the only one now in questiou, was established at the thirty-first degree of latitude, from the Apalachicola westwardly. The southern limits of Georgia depend chiefly on, first, the charter of South Carolina, &c. Secondly, on the proclamation of the British king, in one thousand seveu hundred and sixty-three, establishing the boundary between Georgia and Florida, to begin on the Mississippi, in thirty-one degrees of north latitude, and running eastwardly to the Apalachicola, &c. That afterwards, on the seventh day of December, of the same year, the commissioners of the United States for settling the aforesaid disputes, in their communications with those of the King of Spain, express themselves as follows, to wit: 'In this stage of their (meaning the United States) government, the several boundaries were fixed, and particularly the southern boundary of Georgia, the one now brought into question by Spain. This boundary was fixed by the proclamation of the King of Great Britain, their chief magistrate, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, at a time when no other power pretended any claim whatever to any part of the country through which it ran. The boundary of Georgia was thus established: to begin in the Mississippi, in latitude thirty-one north, and running eastward to the Apalachicola,' &c. From what has been said, it results, first, that the boundary of Georgia, now forming the southern limits of the United States, was lawfully established in the year seventeen hundred and sixty-three. Secondly, that it has been confirmed by the only power that could at any time have pretensions to contest it."

That afterwards, on the tenth day of August, in the year 1795, Thomas Pinckney, 113] Esq., minister plenipotentiary *of the United States at the court of Spain, in a communication to the prince of peace, prime minister of Spain, agreeably to his instructions from the President of the United States on the subject of said boundaries, expresses himself as follows, to wit: "Thirty-two years have elapsed since all the country on the left or eastern bank of the Mississippi, being under the legitimate jurisdiction of the King of England, that sovereign thought proper to regulate with precision the limits of Georgia and the two Floridas, which was done by his solemn proclamation, published in the usual form; by which he established between them precisely the same limits that, near twenty years after he declared to be the southern limits af the United States, by the treaty which the same King of England concluded with them in the month of November, seventeen hundred and eighty-two."

That afterwards, on the 27th day of October, in the year seventeen hundred and ninety-five, a treaty of friendship, limits and navigation, was concluded between the United States and His Catholic Majesty the King of Spain; in the second article of which treaty it is agreed, that the southern boundary of the United States, which divides their territory from the Spanish colonies of East and West Florida, shall be designated by a line beginning on the river Mississippi, at the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, which from thence shall be drawn due east to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catahouchee, thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint, thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river, and thence down the middle thereof to the Atlantic Ocean."

But whether, upon the whole matter, the state of Georgia, at the time of passing the act aforesaid, entitled as aforesaid, as mentioned by the plaintiff, in his assignment of the breach in the fourth count of his declaration, was seized in fee-simple of all the territories and tenements aforesaid, and of all the soil thereof, subject only to the extinguishment of the Indian title *to part thereof, the jury are ignorant, [114 and pray the advisement of the court thereon; and if the court are of opinion that the said state of Georgia was so seized at the time aforesaid, then the jury find, that the said state of Georgia, at the time of passing the act aforesaid, entitled as aforesaid, as mentioned by the said Fletcher, in his assignment of the breach in the fourth count of his declaration, was seized in fee-simple of all the territories and tenements aforesaid, and of all the soil thereof, subject only to the extinguishment of the Indian title to part thereof, and the jury thereupon find, that the said Peck his covenant aforesaid, the breach whereof is assigned in the plaintiff's fourth count mentioned, hath not broken, but hath kept the same.

But if the court are of opinion that the said state of Georgia was not so seized at the time aforesaid, then the jury find, that the said state of Georgia, at the time of passing the act aforesaid, entitled as aforesaid, as mentioned by the said Fletcher in his assignment of the breach in the fourth count of his declaration, was not seized of all the territories and tenements aforesaid, and of all the soil thereof, subject only to the extinguishment of the Indian title to part thereof; and the jury thereupon find, that the said Peck his covenant aforesaid, the breach whereof is assigned in the plaintiff's fourth count mentioned, hath not kept, but broken the same; and assess damages for the plaintiff, for the breach thereof, in the sum of three thousand dollars, and costs of suit.

Whereupon it was considered and adjudged by the court below, that on the issues on the three first counts, the several pleas are good and sufficient, and that the demurrer thereto be overruled; and on the last issue, on which there is a special verdict, that the state of Georgia was seized, as alleged by the defendant, and that the defendant recover his costs.

The plaintiff sued out his writ of error, and the case was twice argued, first by Martin, for the plaintiff in error, and by J. Q. Adams and R. G. Harper, for the *defendant, at [115 February term, 1809, and again at this term by Martin, for the plaintiff, and by Harper and Story, for the defendant.

Martin, for the plaintiff in error.

The first plea is no answer to the first count. The breach of the covenant complained of is, that "the legislature had no authority to sell and dispose of" the land, but the plea is, that "the said Matthews, governor of the said state, was fully and legally empowered to sell and convey" the land. Although the governor had authority to sell, non constat that the legislature had.

The same objection applies to the second plea; it is an answer to the inducement, not to the point of the plea. The breach assigned in the second count is, "that the title which the state of Georgia at any time had in the premises was never legally conveyed to the said Peck by force of the conveyances aforesaid."

The improper influence upon the members of the legislature was only inducement.

The plea is, the defendant had no notice nor knowledge of the improper means used. It is no answer to the breach assigned.

The same objection applies also to the third plea.

It appears upon the special verdict that the state of Georgia never was seized in fee of the lands. They belonged to the crown of Great Britain, and at the revolution devolved upon the United States, and not upon the state of Georgia.

When the colonies of North Carolina and South Carolina were royal colonies, the king limited the boundaries, and disannexed these lands from Georgia.

Argument for the defendant in error.

The first fault of pleading is in the declaration.

116*] *The breach of the covenant is not well assigned in the first count. The covenant is, that the legislature had good right to sell. The breach assigned is, that the legislature had no authority to sell. Authority and right are words of a different signification. Right implies an interest: authority is a mere naked power.

But if the breach be well assigned, the plea is a substantial answer to it, for if the governor derived full power and authority from the legislature to sell, the legislature must have had that power to give. The plea shows the title to be in the state of Georgia.

The objection is only to the form of the plea, which cannot prevail upon a general demurrer.

Two questions arise upon the issue joined upon the 4th plea.

1st. Whether the title was in the state of Georgia; and, 2d. Whether it was in the United States.

At the beginning of the revolution the lands were within the bounds of Georgia. These bounds were confirmed by the treaty of peace in 1783, and recognized in the treaty with Spain in 1795, and by the cession to the United States in 1802.

The United States can have no title but what is derived from Georgia.

The title of Georgia depends upon the facts found in the special verdict.

The second charter granted by George the 2d, in 1732, includes these lands, the bounds of that grant being from the Savannah to the Alatamaha, and from the heads of those rivers respectively, in direct lines, to the South Sea.

It is not admitted that the king had a right to enlarge or diminish the boundaries even of royal provinces.

117*] *The exercise of that right, even by parliament itself, was one of the violations of right upon which the revolution was founded; as appears by the declaration of independence, the address to the people of Quebec, and other public documents of the time.

This right, claimed by the king, was denied by Virginia and North Carolina in their constitutions. See the article of the constitution of Virginia respecting the limits of that State, and the 25th section of the declaration of rights of North Carolina. (1 Belsham's Hist. of Geo. 3d, The Quebec Act, and the Collection of State Constitutions, p. 180.)

The right was denied by the commissioners on the part of the United States, who formed the treaty, and was given up by Great Britain when the present line was established.

But the proclamation of 1763 did not profess or intend to disannex the western lands from the province of Georgia. The king only declares that it is his royal will and pleasure for the present "as aforesaid," to reserve under his sovereignty, protection and dominion, for the use of the Indians, all the lands and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and northwest; and he thereby forbids his subjects from making purchases or settlements, or taking possession of the same.

This clause of the proclamation cannot well be understood without the preceding section to which it refers, by the words "as aforesaid."

The preceding clause is, "that no governor or commander-in-chief of our other colonies or plantations in America, i. e. (other than the colonies of Quebec, East Florida and West Florida), do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrants of surveys, or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic ocean from the west or north-west; or upon any lands whatever which, not having been *ceded to, [118 or purchased by us, as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians, or any of them."

Then comes the clause in question, which is supposed to have disannexed these lands from Georgia, as follows: "And we do further declare it to be our royal will and pleasure for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and north-west as aforesaid," &c.

It was a prohibition to all the governors of all the colonies, and a reservation of all the western lands attached to all the colonies. But it was only a temporary reservation for the use of the Indians.

If this proclamation disannexed these lands from Georgia, it also disannexed all the western lands from all the other colonies. But if they were disannexed by the proclamation, they were re-annexed three months afterwards by the commission to Governor Wright, on the 20th of January, 1764.

It appears by the report of the Attorney General, as well as by Mr. Chalmers's observations, that it never was the opinion of the British government that these lands were disannexed by the proclamation.

If they were not re-annexed before, they certainly were by the treaty of peace.

At the commencement of the revolution, the lands then belonged to and formed a part of the province of Georgia.

By the declaration of independence the several states were declared to be free, sovereign and independent states; and the sovereignty of each, not of the whole, was the principle of the revolution; there was no connection between them, but that of necessity and self-defence, and in what manner each should contribute to the *common cause was a [119 matter left to the discretion of each of the states. By the second article of the confederation the sovereignty of each state is confirmed, and all the rights of sovereignty are declared to be retained which are not by that instrument expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled. It provides also that no state shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States.

On the 25th of February, 1783, the legislature of Georgia passed an act declaring her boundaries, before the definitive treaty of peace. This declaration of Georgia was not contradicted by the United States in any public act.

In 1785, Georgia passed an act erecting the county of Bourbon in that territory; this produced a dispute with South Carolina, which ended in the acknowledgment of the right of Georgia to these lands. (See the third article of the convention between South Carolina and Georgia.)

The same boundaries are acknowledged by the United States in their instructions, given by the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, in 1793, to the commissioners appointed to settle the dispute with Spain respecting boundaries.

The United States certainly had no claim at the commencement of the revolution, nor at the declaration of independence, nor under the articles of confederation.

During the progress of the revolution a demand was made by two or three of the states, that crown lands should be appropriated for the common defense. But Congress never asserted such a right. They only recommended that cessions of territory should be made by the states for that purpose.

The journals of Congress are crowded with proofs of this fact. See journals of Congress, 16th September, 1776, vol. 2, p. 336; 30th of 120] October, 1776; 15th *October, 1777, vol. 3, p. 345; 27th October, 1777, vol. 3, p. 363; 22d June, 1778, vol. 4, p. 262; 23d and 25th June, 1778. p. 269; 1779, vol. 5, p. 49; 21st May, 1779, vol. 5, p. 158; 1st March, 1781; Resolution of 1780, vol. 6, p. 123; 12th February, 1781, vol. 7, p. 26; 1st March, 1781; 29th October, 1782, vol. 8, p. —.

At the treaty of peace, there was no idea of a cession of land to the United States by Great Britain. The bonnds of the United States were fixed as the bonnds of the several states had been before fixed. The United States did not claim land for the United States as a nation; they claimed only in right of the individual states. Great Britain yielded the principle of the royal right to disannex lands from the colonies, and acquiesced in the principle contended for by the United States, which was the old boundary of the several states. See Chief Justice Jay's opinion in the case of Chisholm v. The State of Georgia, reported in a pamphlet published in 1793.

The United States then had no title by the treaty of peace. She has since (viz., in 1788) declined accepting a cession of the territory from Georgia, not because the United States had already a title, but because the lands were too remote, &c.

There is nothing in the constitution of the United States which can give her a title. By the third section of the fourth article the claims of particular states are saved.

The public acts since the adoption of the new constitution are the instructions to the commissioners in 1793, to settle the boundaries with Spain; the treaty with Spain, 27th October, 1795; the act of Congress of 7th April, 1798, (vol. 4, p. 90); the act of 10th of May, 1800; the remonstrance of Georgia, in December, 1800; and the cession by Georgia to the United States in 1802. All these public acts recognized the title to be in Georgia.

*If, then, Georgia had good title on [121 the 7th of January, 1795, the next question is, had the legislature of that state a right to sell?

By the revolution, all the right and royal prerogatives devolved upon the people of the several states, to be exercised in such manner as they should prescribe, and by such governments as they should erect. The right of disposing of the lands belonging to the state naturally devolved upon the legislative body; who were to enact such laws as should authorize the sale and conveyance of them. The sale itself was not a legislative act. It was not an act of sovereignty, but a mere conveyance of title. (2 Tucker's Bl. Com., 53, 57; Montesquieu, b. 26, c. 15; 2 Dal., 320; 4 Dal., 14, Cooper v. Telfaire. Constitution of Georgia, Art. 1, § 16. Digest of Georgia Laws of 7th June, 1777, 1780, 1784, 1785, 1788, 1789, and 1790.) These show the universal practice of Georgia in this respect.

A doubt has been suggested whether this power extends to lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished.

What is the Indian title? It is a mere occupancy for the purpose of hunting. It is not like our tenures; they have no idea of a title to the soil itself. It is overrun by them, rather than inhabited. It is not a true and legal possession. (Vattel, b. 1, § 81, p. 37, and § 209; b. 2, § 97; Montesquieu, b. 18, c. 12; Smith's Wealth of Nations, b. 5, c. 1.) It is a right not to be transferred but extinguished. It is a right regulated by treaties, not by deeds of conveyance. It depends upon the law of nations, not upon municipal right.

Although the power to extinguish this right by treaty is vested in Congress, yet Georgia had a right to sell subject to the Indian claim. The point has never been decided in the courts of the United States, because it has never before been questioned.

The right has been exercised and recognized by all the states.

*There was no objection to the sale [122 arising from the constitution of Georgia. With regard to state constitutions, it is not necessary that the powers should be expressly granted, however it may be with the constitution of the United States. But it is not constitutional doctrine even as it applies to the legislature of the United States.

The old articles of confederation limited the powers of Congress to those expressly granted. But in the constitution of the United States, the word expressly was purposely rejected. See the Federalist, and Journals of House of Rep., 21st August, 1789. Journal of Senate, 7th September, 1789.

But if the legislature of Georgia could only exercise powers expressly given, they had no power to abrogate the contract.

A question has been suggested from the bench whether the right which Georgia had before the extinguishment of the Indian title, is such a right as is susceptible of conveyance, and whether it can be said to be a title in fee-simple?

The Europeans found the territory in possession of a rude and uncivilized people, consisting of separate and independent nations. They had no idea of property in the soil but a right of occupation. A right not individual but national. This is the right gained by conquest. The Europeans always claimed and exercised the right of conquest over the soil. They allowed the former occupants a part, and took to themselves what was not wanted by the natives. Even Penn claimed under the right of conquest. He took under a charter from the King of England, whose right was the right of conquest. Hence the feudal tenures in this country. All the treaties with the Indians were the effect of conquest. All the extensive grants have been forced from them by successful war. The conquerers permitted the conquered tribes to occupy part of the land until it should be wanted for the use of the conquerors. Hence 123] the acts of legislation *fixing the lines and bounds of the Indian claims; hence the prohibition of individual purchasers, &c.

The rights of governments are allodial. The crown of Great Britain granted lands to individuals, even while the Indian claim existed, and there has never been a question respecting the validity of such grants. When that claim was extinguished, the grantee was always admitted to have acquired a complete title. The Indian title is a mere privilege which does not affect the allodial right.

The legislature of Georgia could not revoke a grant once executed. It had no right to declare the law void; that is the exercise of a judicial, not a legislative function. It is the province of the judiciary to say what the law is, or what it was. The legislature can only say what it shall be.

The legislature was forbidden by the constitution of the United States to pass any law impairing the obligation of contract. A grant is a contract executed, and it creates also an implied executory contract, which is, that the grantee shall continue to enjoy the thing granted according to the terms of the grant.

The validity of a law cannot be questioned because undue influence may have been used in obtaining it. However improper it may be, and however severely the offenders may be punished, if guilty of bribery, yet the grossest corruption will not authorize a judicial tribunal to disregard the law.

This would open a source of litigation which could never be closed. The law would be differently decided by different juries; innumerable perjuries would be committed, and inconceivable confusion would ensue.

But the parties now before the court are innocent of the fraud, if any has been practiced. They were bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, without notice of fraud. They cannot be affected by it.

124*] Martin, in reply.

All the western lands of the royal governments were wholly disannexed from the colonies and reserved for the use of the Indians. Georgia never had title in those lands. It is true that Great Britain did undertake to extend the bounds of the royal provinces. The right was not denied, but the purpose for which it was executed.

By the proclamation, if offenders should escape into those territories, they are to be arrested by the military force and sent into the colony for trial.

In Governor Wright's commission the western boundary of the colony is not defined. The jury has not found whether the lands were within Governor Wright's commission.

As to the Indian title.

The royal provinces were not bodies politic for the purpose of holding lands. The title of the lands was in the crown. There is no law authorizing the several states to transfer their right subject to the Indian title. It was only a right of pre-emption which the crown had. This right was not by the treaty ceded to Georgia, but to the United States. The land when purchased of the Indians is to be purchased for the benefit of the United States. There was only a possibility that the United States would purchase for the benefit of Georgia. But a mere possibility cannot be sold or granted.

The declarations and claims of Georgia could not affect the rights of the United States.

An attempt was made in Congress to establish the principle that the land belonged to the United States; but the advocates of that doctrine were overruled by a majority. This, however, did not decide the question of right.

*The states which advocated that prin- [125 ciple did not think proper to refuse to join the confederacy because it was not inserted among the articles of confederation, but they protested against their assent to the Union being taken as evidence of their abandonment of the principle.

Nor is the assent of Congress to the commission for settling the bounds between South Carolina and Georgia, evidence of an acknowledgment, on the part of the United States, that either of those states was entitled to those lands.

March 11, 1809. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court upon the pleadings, as follows:

In this cause there are demurrers to three pleas filed in the Circuit Court, and a special verdict found on an issue joined on the 4th plea. The pleas were all sustained, and judgment was rendered for the defendant.

To support this judgment, this court must concur in overruling all the demurrers; for, if the plea to any one of the counts be bad, the plaintiff below is entitled to damages on that count.

The covenant, on which the breach in the first count is assigned, is in these words: "that the legislature of the said state (Georgia), at the time of the passing of the act of sale aforesaid, had good right to sell and dispose of the same, in manner pointed out by the said act."

The breach of this covenant is assigned in these words: "now the said Fletcher saith that, at the time when the said act of the legislature of Georgia, entitled an act, &c., was passed, the said legislature had no authority to sell and dispose of the tenements aforesaid, or of any part thereof, in the manner pointed out in the said act."

*The plea sets forth the constitution [126 of the state of Georgia, and avers that the lands lay within that state. It then sets forth the act of the legislature, and avers that the lands described in the declaration are included within those to be sold by the said act; and that the governor was legally empowered to sell and convey the premises.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred; and the defendant joined in the demurrer.

If it be admitted that sufficient matter is shown, in this plea, to have justified the defendant in denying the breach alleged in the count, it must also be admitted that he has not denied it. The breach alleged is, that the legislature had not authority to sell. The bar set up is, that the governor had authority to convey. Certainly an allegation, that the principal has no right to give a power, is not denied by alleging that he has given a proper power to the agent.

It is argued that the plea shows, although it does not, in terms, aver, that the legislature had authority to convey. The court does not mean to controvert this position, but its admission would not help the case. The matter set forth in the plea, as matter of inducement, may be argumentatively good, may warrant an averment which negatives the averment in the declaration, but does not itself constitute that negative.

Had the plaintiff tendered an issue in fact upon this plea, that the governor was legally empowered to sell and convey the premises, it would have been a departure from his declaration; for the count to which this plea is intended as a bar alleges no want of authority in the governor. He was therefore under the necessity of demurring.

But it is contended that although the plea be substantially bad, the judgment, overruling the demurrer, is correct, because the declaration is defective.

The defect alleged in the declaration is, that [*127] the *breach is not assigned in the words of the covenant. The covenant is, that the legislature had a right to convey, and the breach is, that the legislature had no authority to convey.

It is not necessary that a breach should be assigned in the very words of the covenant. It is enough that the words of the assignment show, unequivocally, a substantial breach. The assignment under consideration does show such a breach. If the legislature had no authority to convey, it had no right to convey.

It is, therefore, the opinion of this court, that the Circuit Court erred in overruling the demurrer to the first plea by the defendant pleaded, and that their judgment ought therefore to be reversed, and that judgment on that plea be rendered for the plaintiff.

After the opinion of the court was delivered, the parties agreed to amend the pleadings, and the cause was continued for further consideration.

The cause having been again argued at this term,

March 16, 1810. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The pleadings being now amended, this cause comes on again to be heard on sundry demurrers, and on a special verdict.

The suit was instituted on several covenants contained in a deed made by John Peck, the defendant in error, conveying to Robert Fletcher, the plaintiff in error, certain lands which were part of a large purchase made by James Gunn and others, in the year 1795, from the state of Georgia, the contract for which was made in the form of a bill passed by the legislature of that state.

The first count in the declaration set forth a breach *in the second covenant con- [*128] tained in the deed. The covenant is, "that the legislature of the state of Georgia, at the time of passing the act of sale aforesaid, had good right to sell and dispose of the same in the manner pointed out by the said act." The breach assigned is, that the legislature had no power to sell.

The plea in bar sets forth the constitution of the state of Georgia, and avers that the lands sold by the defendant to the plaintiff, were within that state. It then sets forth the granting act, and avers the power of the legislature to sell and dispose of the premises as pointed out by the act.

To this plea the plaintiff below demurred, and the defendant joined in demurrer.

That the legislature of Georgia, unless restrained by its own constitution, possesses the power of disposing of the unappropriated lands within its own limits, in such manner as its own judgment shall dictate, is a proposition not to be controverted. The only question, then, presented by this demurrer, for the consideration of the court, is this, did the then constitution of the state of Georgia prohibit the legislature to dispose of the lands, which were the subject of this contract, in the manner stipulated by the contract?

The question, whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution, is, at all times, a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled by duty to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station, could it be unmindful of the solemn obligations which that station imposes. But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other.

In this case the court can perceive no such opposition. In the constitution of Georgia, adopted in the *year 1789, the court can [*129] perceive no restriction on the legislative power, which inhibits the passage of the act of 1795. The court cannot say that, in passing that act, the legislature has transcended its powers and violated the constitution.

In overruling the demurrer, therefore, to the first plea, the Circuit Court committed no error.

The 3d covenant is, that all the title which the state of Georgia ever had in the premises had been legally conveyed to John Peck, the grantor.

The 2d count assigns, in substance, as a breach of this covenant, that the original grantees from the state of Georgia promised and assured divers members of the legislature, then sitting in general assembly, that if the said members would assent to, and vote for, the passing of the act, and if the said bill should pass, such members should have a share of, and be interested in, all the lands purchased from the said state by virtue of such law. And that divers of the said members, to whom the said promises were made, were unduly influenced thereby, and, under such influence, did vote for the passing of the said bill; by reason whereof the said law was a nullity, &c., and so the title of the state of Georgia did not pass to the said Peek, &c.

The plea to this count, after protesting that the promises it alleges were not made, avers, that until after the purchase made from the original grantees by James Greenleaf, under whom the said Peck claims, neither the said James Greenleaf, nor the said Peck, nor any of the mesne vendors between the said Greenleaf and Peck, had any notice or knowledge that any such promises or assurances were made by the said original grantees, or either of them, to any of the members of the legislature of the state of Georgia.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred generally, and the defendant joined in the demurrer.

130*] *That corruption should find its way into the governments of our infant republics, and contaminate the very source of legislation, or that impure motives should contribute to the passage of a law, or the formation of a legislative contract, are circumstances most deeply to be deplored. How far a court of justice would, in any case, be competent, on proceedings instituted by the state itself, to vacate a contract thus formed, and to annul rights acquired, under that contract, by third persons having no notice of the improper means by which it was obtained, is a question which the court would approach with much circumspection. It may well be doubted how far the validity of a law depends upon the motives of its framers, and how far the particular inducements, operating on members of the supreme soverign power of a state, to the formation of a contract by that power, are examinable in a court of justice. If the principle be conceded, that an act of the supreme sovereign power might be declared null by a court, in consequence of the means which procured it, still would there be much difficulty in saying to what extent those means must be applied to produce this effect. Must it be direct corruption, or would interest or undue influence of any kind be sufficient? Must the vitiating cause operate on a majority, or on what number of the members? Would the act be null, whatever might be the wish of the nation, or would its obligation or nullity depend upon the public sentiment?

If the majority of the legislature be corrupted, it may well be doubted, whether it be within the province of the judiciary to control their conduct, and, if less than a majority act from impure motives, the principle by which judicial interference would be regulated, is not clearly discerned.

Whatever difficulties this subject might present, when viewed under aspects of which it may be susceptible, this court can perceive none in the particular pleadings now under consideration.

This is not a bill brought by the state of Georgia, to annul the contract, nor does it appear to 131] the court, by *this count, that the state of Georgia is dissatisfied with the sale that has been made. The case, as made out in the pleadings, is simply this: One individual who holds lands in the state of Georgia, under a deed covenanting that the title of Georgia was in the grantor, brings an action of covenant upon this deed, and assigns, as a breach, that some of the members of the legislature were induced to vote in favor of the law, which constituted the contract, by being promised an interest in it, and that therefore the act is a mere nullity.

This solemn question cannot be brought thus collaterally and incidentally before the court. It would be indecent in the extreme, upon a private contract between two individuals, to enter into an inquiry respecting the corruption of the sovereign power of a state. If the title be plainly deduced from a legislative act, which the legislature might constitutionally pass, if the act be clothed with all the requisite forms of a law, a court, sitting as a court of law, cannot sustain a suit brought by one individual against another founded on the allegation that the act is a nullity, in consequence of the impure motives which influenced certain members of the legislature which passed the law.

The Circuit Court, therefore, did right in overruling this demurrer.

The 4th covenant in the deed is, that the title to the premises has been in no way, constitutionally or legally, impaired by virtue of any subsequent act of any subsequent legislature of the state of Georgia.

The third count recites the undue means practiced on certain members of the legislature, as stated in the second count, and then alleges that, in consequence of these practices, and of other causes, a subsequent legislature passed an act annulling and rescinding the law under which the conveyance to the original grantees was made, declaring that conveyance void, and asserting the title of the state to the lands it contained. The *count proceeds to recite [132 at large, this rescinding act, and concludes with averring that, by reason of this act the title of the said Peck in the premises was constitutionally and legally impaired, and rendered null and void.

After protesting, as before, that no such promises were made as stated in this count, the defendant again pleads that himself and the first purchaser under the original grantees, and all intermediate holders of the property, were purchasers without notice.

To this plea there is a demurrer and joinder.

The importance and the difficulty of the questions, presented by these pleadings, are deeply felt by the court.

The lands in controversy vested absolutely in James Gunn and others, the original grantees, by the conveyance of the governor, made in pursuance of an act of assembly to which the legislature was fully competent. Being thus in full possession of the legal estate, they, for a valuable consideration, conveyed portions of the land to those who were willing to purchase. If the original transaction was infected with fraud, these purchasers did not participate in it, and had no notice of it. They were innocent. Yet the legislature of Georgia has involved them in the fate of the first parties to the transaction, and, if the act be valid, has annihilated their rights also.

The legislature of Georgia was a party to this transaction; and for a party to pronounce its own deed invalid, whatever cause may be assigned for its invalidity, must be considered as a mere act of power which must find its vindication in a train of reasoning not often heard in courts of justice.

But the real party, it is said, are the people, and when their agents are unfaithful, the acts of those agents cease to be obligatory.

It is, however, to be recollected that the peo- 133 ple can *act only by these agents, and that, while within the powers conferred on them, their acts must be considered as the acts of the people. If the agents be corrupt, others may be chosen, and, if their contracts be examinable, the common sentiment, as well as common usage of mankind, points out a mode by which this examination may be made, and their validity determined.

If the legislature of Georgia was not bound to submit its pretensions to those tribunals which are established for the security of property, and to decide on human rights, if it might claim to itself the power of judging in its own case, yet there are certain great principles of justice, whose authority is universally acknowledged, that ought not to be entirely disregarded.

If the legislature be its own judge in its own case, it would seem equitable that its decision should be regulated by those rules which would have regulated the decision of a judicial tribunal. The question was, in its nature, a question of title, and the tribunal which decided it was either acting in the character of a court of justice, and performing a duty usually assigned to a court, or it was exerting a mere act of power in which it was controlled only by its own will.

If a suit be brought to set aside a conveyance obtained by fraud, and the fraud be clearly proved, the conveyance will be set aside, as between the parties; but the rights of third persons, who are purchasers without notice, for a valuable consideration, cannot be disregarded. Titles which, according to every legal test, are perfect, are acquired with that confidence which is inspired by the opinion that the purchaser is safe. If there be any concealed defect, arising from the conduct of those who had held the property long before he acquired it, of which he had no notice, that concealed defect cannot be set up against him. He has paid his money for a title good at law, he is innocent, whatever may be the guilt of others, and equity will not subject him to the penalties attached to that guilt. All titles would be inse- 134 cure, and the intercourse *between man and man would be very seriously obstructed, if this principle be overturned.

A court of chancery, therefore, had a bill been brought to set aside the conveyance made to James Gunn and others, as being obtained by improper practices with the legislature, whatever might have been its decision as respected the original grantees, would have been bound, by its own rules, and by the clearest principles of equity, to leave unmolested those who were purchasers, without notice, for a valuable consideration.

If the legislature felt itself absolved from those rules of property which are common to all the citizens of the United States, and from those principles of equity which are acknowledged in all our courts, its act is to be supported by its power alone, and the same power may devest any other individual of his lands, if it shall be the will of the legislature so to exert it.

It is not intended to speak with disrespect of the legislature of Georgia, or of its acts. Far from it. The question is a general question, and is treated as one. For although such powerful objections to a legislative grant, as are alleged against this, may not again exist, yet the principle, on which alone this rescinding act is to be supported, may be applied to every case to which it shall be the will of any legislature to apply it. The principle is this: that a legislature may, by its own act, devest the vested estate of any man whatever, for reasons which shall, by itself, be deemed sufficient.

In this case the legislature may have had ample proof that the original grant was obtained by practices which can never be too much reprobated, and which would have justified its abrogation so far as respected those to whom crime was imputable. But the grant, when issued, conveyed an estate in fee-simple to the grantee, clothed with all the solemnities which law can bestow. This estate was transferable; and those who purchased parts of it were not stained by that *guilt which]135 infected the original transaction. Their case is not distinguishable from the ordinary case of purchasers of a legal estate without knowledge of any secret fraud which might have led to the emanation of the original grant. According to the well known course of equity, their rights could not be affected by such fraud. Their situation was the same, their title was the same, with that of every other member of the community who holds land by regular conveyances from the original patentee.

Is the power of the legislature competent to the annihilation of such title, and to a resumption of the property thus held?

The principle asserted is, that one legislature is competent to repeal any act which a former legislature was competent to pass; and that one legislature cannot abridge the powers of a succeeding legislature.

The correctness of this principle, so far as respects general legislation, can never be controverted. But, if an act be done under a law, a succeeding legislature cannot undo it. The past cannot be recalled by the most absolute power. Conveyanees have been made; those conveyances have vested legal estates, and, if those estates may be seized by the sovereign authority, still, that they originally vested is a faet, and cannot cease to be a fact.

When, then, a law is in its nature a contract, when absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot devest those rights; and the aet of annulling them, if legitimate, is rendered so by a power applicable to the case of every individual in the community.

It may well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government does not prescribe some limits to the legislative power; and, if any be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation?

*To the legislature all legislative [136 power is granted; but the question, whether the act of transferring the property of an individual to the public, be in the nature of the legislative power, is well worthy of serious reflection.

It is the peculiar province of the legislature to prescribe general rules for the government of society; the application of those rules to individuals in society would seem to be the duty of other departments. How far the power of giving the law may involve every other power, in cases where the constitution is silent, never has been, and perhaps never can be, definitely stated.

The validity of this rescinding act, then, might well be doubted, were Georgia a single sovereign power. But Georgia cannot be viewed as a single, unconnected, sovereign power, on whose legislature no other restrictions are imposed than may be found in its own constitution. She is a part of a large empire; she is a member of the American Union; and that Union has a constitution the supremacy of which all acknowledge, and which imposes limits to the legislatures of the several states, which none claim a right to pass. The constitution of the United States declares that no state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Does the case now under consideration come within this prohibitory section of the constitution?

In considering this very interesting question, we immediately ask ourselves what is a contract? Is a grant a contract?

A contract is a compact between two or more parties, and is either executory or executed. An executory contract is one in which a party binds himself to do, or not to do, a particular thing; such was the law under which the conveyance was made by the governor. A contract [*137] executed is one in which the object of contract is performed; and this, says Blackstone, differs in nothing from a grant. The contract between Georgia and the purchasers was executed by the grant. A contract executed, as well as one which is executory, contains obligations binding on the parties. A grant, in its own nature, amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to re-assert that right. A party is, therefore, always estopped by his own grant.

Since, then, in fact, a grant is a contract executed, the obligation of which still continues, and since the constitution uses the general term contract, without distinguishing between those which are executory and those which are executed, it must be construed to comprehend the latter as well as the former. A law annulling conveyances between individuals, and declaring that the grantors should stand seized of their former estates, notwithstanding those grants, would be as repugnant to the constitution as a law discharging the vendors of property from the obligation of executing their contracts by conveyances. It would be strange if a contract to convey was secured by the constitution, while an absolute conveyance remained unprotected.

If, under a fair construction of the constitution, grants are comprehended under the term contracts, is a grant from the state excluded from the operation of the provision? Is the clause to be considered as inhibiting the state from impairing the obligation of contracts between two individuals, but as excluding from that inhibition contracts made with itself?

The words themselves contain no such distinction. They are general, and are applicable to contracts of every description. If contracts made with the state are to be exempted from their operation, the exception must arise from the character of the contracting party, not from the words which are employed.

Whatever respect might have been felt for the state sovereignties, it is not to be disguised that the framers of the constitution viewed, with some apprehension, the violent [*138] acts which might grow out of the feelings of the moment; and that the people of the United States, in adopting that instrument, have manifested a determination to shield themselves and their property from the effects of those sudden and strong passions to which men are exposed. The restrictions on the legislative power of the states are obviously founded in this sentiment; and the constitution of the United States contains what may be deemed a bill of rights for the people of each state.

No state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts.

A bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual, or may confiscate his property, or may do both.

In this form the power of the legislature over the lives and fortunes of individuals is expressly restrained. What motive, then, for implying, in words which import a general prohibition to impair the obligation of contracts, an exception in favor of the right to impair the obligation of those contracts into which the state may enter?

The state legislatures can pass no ex post facto law. An ex post facto law is one which renders an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed. Such a law may inflict penalties on the person, or may inflict pecuniary penalties which swell the public treasury. The legislature is then prohibited from passing a law by which a man's estate, or any part of it, shall be seized for a crime which was not declared, by some previous law, to render him liable to that punishment. Why, then, should violence be done to the natural meaning of words for the purpose of leaving to the legislature the power of seizing, for public use, the estate of an individual in the form of a law annulling the title by which he holds that estate? The court can perceive no sufficient grounds for making this distinction. This rescinding act would have the effect of an ex post facto law. It forfeits the estate of Fletcher for a crime not committed by himself, but by those from whom he purchased. This [*139] cannot be effected in the form of an ex post facto law, or bill of attainder; why, then, is it allowable in the form of a law annulling the original grant?

The argument in favor of presuming an intention to except a case, not excepted by the words of the constitution, is susceptible of some illustration from a principle originally ingrafted in that instrument, though no longer a part of it. The constitution, as passed, gave the courts of the United States jurisdiction in suits brought against individual states. A state, then, which violated its own contract was suable in the courts of the United States for that violation. Would it have been a defense in such a suit to say that the state had passed a law absolving itself from the contract? It is scarcely to be conceived that such a defense could be set up. And yet, if a state is neither restrained by the general principles of our political institutions, nor by the words of the constitution, from impairing the obligation of its own contracts, such a defense would be a valid one. This feature is no longer found in the constitution; but it aids in the construction of those clauses with which it was originally associated.

It is, then, the unanimous opinion of the court, that, in this case, the estate having passed into the hands of a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, the state of Georgia was restrained, either by general principles, which are common to our free institutions, or by the particular provisions of the constitution of the United States, from passing a law whereby the estate of the plaintiff in the premises so purchased could be constitutionally and legally impaired and rendered null and void.

In overruling the demurrer to the 3d plea, therefore, there is no error.

The first covenant in the deed is, that the state of Georgia, at the time of the act of the legislature thereof, entitled as aforesaid, was legally seized in fee of the soil thereof subject only to the extinguishment of part of the Indian title thereon.

140*] *The 4th count assigns, as a breach of this covenant, that the right to the soil was in the United States, and not in Georgia.

To this count the defendant pleads, that the state of Georgia was seized; and tenders an issue on the fact in which the plaintiff joins. On this issue a special verdict is found.

The jury find the grant of Carolina by Charles second to the Earl of Clarendon and others, comprehending the whole country from 36 deg. 30 min. north lat. to 29 deg. north lat., and from the Atlantic to the South Sea.

They find that the northern part of this territory was afterwards erected into a separate colony, and that the most northern part of the 35 deg. of north lat. was the boundary line between North and South Carolina.

That seven of the eight proprietors of the Carolinas surrendered to George second in the year 1729, who appointed a governor of South Carolina.

That, in 1732, George the second granted, to the Lord Viscount Percival and others, seven-eighths of the territory between the Savannah and the Alatamaha, and extending west to the South Sea, and that the remaining eighth part, which was still the property of the heir of Lord Carteret, one of the original grantees of Carolina, was afterwards conveyed to them. This territory was constituted a colony and called Georgia.

That the governor of South Carolina continued to exercise jurisdiction south of Georgia.

That, in 1752, the grantees surrendered to the crown.

That, in 1754, a governor was appointed by the crown, with a commission describing the boundaries of the colony.

That a treaty of peace was concluded between 141] Great *Britain and Spain, in 1763, in which the latter ceded to the former Florida, with fort St. Augustine and the bay of Pensacola.

That, in October, 1763, the King of Great Britain issued a proclamation, creating four new colonies, Quebec, East Florida, West Florida, and Grenada; and prescribing the bounds of each, and further declaring that all the lands between the Alatamaha and St. Mary's should be annexed to Georgia. The same proclamation contained a clause reserving, under the dominion and protection of the crown, for the use of the Indians, all the lands on the western waters, and forbidding a settlement on them, or a purchase of them from the Indians. The lands conveyed to the plaintiff lie on the western waters.

That, in November, 1763, a commission was issued to the governor of Georgia, in which the boundaries of that province are described as extending westward to the Mississippi. A commission, describing boundaries of the same extent, was afterwards granted in 1764.

That a war broke out between Great Britain and her colonies, which terminated in a treaty of peace acknowledging them as sovereign and independent states.

That in April, 1787, a convention was entered into between the states of South Carolina and Georgia settling the boundary line between them.

The jury afterwards describe the situation of the lands mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration, in such manner that their lying within the limits of Georgia, as defined in the proclamation of 1763, in the treaty of peace, and in the convention between that state and South Carolina, has not been questioned.

The counsel for the plaintiff rest their argument on a single proposition. They contend that the reservation for the use of the Indians, contained in the proclamation *of 1763, [142 excepts the lands on the western waters from the colonies within whose bounds they would otherwise have been, and that they were acquired by the revolutionary war. All acquisitions during the war, it is contended, were made by the joint arms, for the joint benefit of the United States, and not for the benefit of any particular state.

The court does not understand the proclamation as it is understood by the counsel for the plaintiff. The reservation for the use of the Indians appears to be a temporary arrangement suspending, for a time, the settlement of the country reserved, and the powers of the royal governor within the territory reserved, but is not conceived to amount to an alteration of the boundaries of the colony. If the language of the proclamation be, in itself, doubtful, the commissions subsequent thereto, which were given to the governors of Georgia, entirely remove the doubt.

The question, whether the vacant lands within the United States became a joint property, or belonged to the separate states, was a momentous question which, at one time, threatened to shake the American confederacy to its foundation. This important and dangerous contest has been compromised, and the compromise is not now to be disturbed.

It is the opinion of the court, that the particular land stated in the declaration appears, from this special verdict, to lie within the state of Georgia, and that the state of Georgia had power to grant it.

Some difficulty was produced by the language of the covenant, and of the pleadings. It was doubted whether a state can be seized in fee of lands, subject to the Indian title, and whether a decision that they were seized in fee, might not be construed to amount to a decision that their grantee might maintain an ejectment for them, notwithstanding that title.

The majority of the court is of opinion that the nature of the Indian title, which is certainly 143] to be respected *by all courts, until it be legitimately extinguished, is not such as to be absolutely repugnant to seizin in fee on the part of the state.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

JOHNSON, J. In this case I entertain, on two points, an opinion different from that which has been delivered by the court.

I do not hesitate to declare that a state does not possess the power of revoking its own grants. But I do it on a general principle, on the reason and nature of things: a principle which will impose laws even on the Deity.

A contrary opinion can only be maintained upon the ground that no existing legislature can abridge the powers of those which will succeed it. To a certain extent this is certainly correct; but the distinction lies between power and interest, the right of jurisdiction and the right of soil.

The right of jurisdiction is essentially connected to, or rather identified with, the national sovereignty. To part with it is to commit a species of political suicide. In fact, a power to produce its own annihilation is an absurdity in terms. It is a power as utterly incommunicable to a political as to a natural person. But it is not so with the interests or property of a nation. Its possessions nationally are in nowise necessary to its political existence; they are entirely accidental, and may be parted with in every respect similarly to those of the individuals who compose the community. When the legislature have once conveyed their interest or property in any subject to the individual, they have lost all control over it; have nothing to act upon; it has passed from them; is vested in the individual; becomes intimately blended with his existence, as essentially so as the blood that circulates through his system. The government may indeed demand of him the one or the other, not because they are not his, but because whatever is his is his country's.

144*] *As to the idea, that the grants of a legislature may be void because the legislature are corrupt, it appears to me to be subject to insuperable difficulties. The acts of the supreme power of a country must be considered pure for the same reason that all sovereign acts must be considered just; because there is no power that can declare them otherwise. The absurdity in this case would have been strikingly perceived, could the party who passed the act of cession have got again into power, and declared themselves pure, and the intermediate legislature corrupt.

The security of a people against the misconduct of their rulers, must lie in the frequent recurrence to first principles, and the imposition of adequate constitutional restrictions. Nor would it be difficult, with the same view, for laws to be framed which would bring the conduct of individuals under the review of adequate tribunals, and make them suffer under the consequences of their own immoral conduct.

I have thrown out these ideas that I may have it distinctly understood that my opinion on this point is not founded on the provision in the constitution of the United States, relative to laws impairing the obligation of contracts. It is much to be regretted that words of less equivocal signification had not been adopted in that article of the constitution. There is reason to believe, from the letters of Publius, which are well known to be entitled to the highest respect, that the object of the convention was to afford a general protection to individual rights against the acts of the state legislatures. Whether the words, "acts impairing the obligation of contracts," can be construed to have the same force as must have been given to the words "obligation and effect of contracts," is the difficulty in my mind.

There can be no solid objection to adopting the technical definition of the word "contract," given by Blackstone. The etymology, the classical signification, and the civil law idea of the word, will all support it. But the difficulty arises on the word "obligation," *which [145 certainly imports an existing moral or physical necessity. Now, a grant or conveyance by no means necessarily implies the continuance of an obligation beyond the moment of executing it. It is most generally but the consummation of a contract, is functus officio the moment it is executed, and continues afterwards to be nothing more than the evidence that a certain act was done.

I enter with great hesitation upon this question, because it involves a subject of the greatest delicacy and much difficulty. The states and the United States are continually legislating on the subject of contracts, prescribing the mode of authentication, the time within which suits shall be prosecuted for them, in many cases affecting existing contracts by the laws which they pass, and declaring them to cease or lose their effect for want of compliance, in the parties, with such statutory provisions. All these acts appear to be within the most correct limits of legislative powers, and most beneficially exercised, and certainly could not have been intended to be affected by this constitutional provision; yet where to draw the line, or how to define or limit the words, "obligation of contracts," will be found a subject of extreme difficulty.

To give it the general effect of a restriction of the state powers in favor of private rights, is certainly going very far beyond the obvious and necessary import of the words, and would operate to restrict the states in the exercise of that right which every community must exercise, of possessing itself of the property of the individual, when necessary for public uses; a right which a magnanimous and just government will never exercise without amply indemnifying the individual, and which perhaps amounts to nothing more than a power to oblige him to sell and convey, when the public necessities require it.

The other point on which I dissent from the opinion of the court, is relative to the judgment which ought to be given on the first count. Upon that count we are *called upon [146 substantially to decide, "that the state of Georgia, at the time of passing the act of cession, was legally seized in fee of the soil (then ceded), subject only to the extinguishment of part of the Indian title." That is, that the state of Georgia was seized of an estate in fee-simple in the lands in question, subject to another estate, we know not what, nor whether it may not swallow up the whole estate decided to exist in Georgia. It would seem that the mere vagueness and uncertainty of this covenant would be a sufficient objection to deciding in favor of it, but to me it appears that the facts in the case are sufficient to support the opinion that the state of Georgia had not a fee-simple in the land in question.

This is a question of much delicacy, and more fitted for a diplomatic or legislative than a judicial inquiry. But I am called upon to make a decision, and I must make it upon technical principles.

The question is, whether it can be correctly predicated of the interest or estate which the state of Georgia had in these lands, "that the state was seized thereof, in fee-simple."

To me it appears that the interest of Georgia in that land amounted to nothing more than a mere possibility, and that her conveyanee thereof could operate legally only as a covenant to convey or to stand seized to a use.

The correctness of this opinion will depend upon a just view of the state of the Indian nations. This will be found to be very various. Some have totally extinguished their national fire, and submitted themselves to the laws of the states: others have, by treaty, acknowledged that they hold their national existence at the will of the state within which they reside: others retain a limited sovereignty, and the absolute proprietorship of their soil. The latter is the case of the tribes to the west of Georgia. We legislate upon the conduct of strangers or citizens within their limits, but innumerable treaties 147] formed with them *acknowledge them to be an independent people, and the uniform practice of acknowledging their right of soil, by purchasing from them, and restraining all persons from encroaching upon their territory, makes it unnecessary to insist upon their right of soil. Can, then, one nation be said to be seized of a fee-simple in lands, the right of soil of which is in another nation? It is awkward to apply the technical idea of a fee-simple to the interests of a nation, but I must consider an absolute right of soil as an interest to them and their heirs. A fee-simple estate may be held in reversion, but our law will not admit the idea of its being limited after a fee-simple. In fact, if the Indian nations be the absolute proprietors of their soil, no other nation can be said to have the same interest in it. What, then, practically, is the interest of the states in the soil of the Indians within their boundaries? Unaffected by particular treaties, it is nothing more than what was assumed at the first settlement of the country, to wit, a right of conquest or of purchase, exclusively of all competitors within certain defined limits. All the restrictions upon the right of soil in the Indians, amount only to an exclusion of all competitors from their markets; and the limitation upon their sovereignty amounts to the right of governing every person within their limits except themselves. If the interest in Georgia was nothing more than a pre-emptive right, how could that be called a fee-simple, which was nothing more than a power to acquire a fee-simple by purchase, when the proprietors should be pleased to sell? And if this ever was anything more than a mere possibility, it certainly was reduced to that state when the state of Georgia ceded, to the United States, by the constitution, both the power of pre-emption and of conquest, retaining for itself only a resulting right dependent on a purchase or conquest to be made by the United States.

I have been very unwilling to proceed to the decision of this cause at all. It appears to me to bear strong evidence, upon the face of it, of being a mere feigned case. It is our duty to decide on the rights, but not on the speculations of parties. My confidence, *however, [148 in the respectable gentlemen who have been engaged for the parties, has induced me to abandon my scruples, in the belief that they would never consent to impose a mere feigned case upon this court.

MASSIE v. WATTS.

The practice in Kentucky to call a jury to ascertain the facts in chancery causes is incorrect.

A suit in chancery by one who has the prior equity against him who has the eldest patent is in its nature local, and if it be a mere question of title, must be tried in the district where the land lies.

But if it be a case of contract, or trust, or fraud, it is to be tried in the district where the defendant may be found.

If, by any reasonable construction of an entry, it can be supported, the court will support it.

When a given quantity of land is to be laid off on a given base, it shall be included within four lines forming a square, as nearly as may be, unless the form be repugnant to the entry.

If the calls of an entry do not fully describe the land, but furnish enough to enable the court to complete the location by the application of certain principles, they will complete it.

If a location have certain material calls sufficient to support it, and to describe the land, other calls less material and incompatible with the essential calls of the entry, may be discarded.

The rectangular figure is to be preserved, if possible.

If an agent locate land for himself which he ought to locate for his principal, he is in equity a trustee for his principal.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Kentucky, in a suit in equity brought

---

NOTE.—An agent, or trustee, cannot directly, or indirectly, become the purchaser of property confided to his care. Church v. Mar. Ins. Co., 1 Mason, 341; Torrey v. B'k Orleans, 9 Paige, 649; 7 Hill., 260; Dobson v. Racey, 3 Sand., Ch. 60; Baker v. Whiting, 3 Sumner, 476.

by Watts, a citizen of Virginia, against Massie, a citizen of Kentucky, to compel the latter to convey to the former 1,000 acres of land in the state of Ohio, the defendant having obtained the legal title with notice of the plaintiff's equitable title.

The bill stated that the defendant Massie (the appellant) had contracted with a certain Ferdinand Oneale, to locate and survey for him a military warrant for 4,000 acres in his name, (which the plaintiff afterwards purchased for a valuable consideration,) and to receive for his services in locating and surveying the same, the sum of 50*l., which the plaintiff paid him. That the defendant located the said warrant with the proper surveyor, and being himself a surveyor, he fraudulently made a survey purporting to be a survey of part of the entry, but variant from the same, and contrary to law, whereby the survey was entirely removed from the land entered with the surveyor, for the fraudulent purpose of giving way to a claim of the defendant's which he surveyed on the land entered for the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff lost the land, and the defendant obtained the legal title. That the land adjoins the town of Chillicothe, and is worth fifteen dollars an acre. The bill prays that the defendant may 149] be compelled to convey the *land to the plaintiff, or if that is not in his power, that he make compensation in damages.

The defendant, by his answer, denied that he contracted with the plaintiff to locate and survey the warrant in the name of Oneale, but admits that, in 1787, he was requested by W. Ellzey, to locate the warrant for Oneale; that Ellzey informed him he was not authorized to make any special contract with the defendant for his services, but he had no doubt, if he did the business, he would receive the customary compensation, which was 12*l.* 10*s.* per 1,000 acres, or one third of the land.

He admits that he made the entry, and that the plaintiff has paid him the 50*l.* But he denies that he made the survey improperly, or with a fraudulent intention. He says that in the year 1793, as a deputy surveyor, he surveyed the land on the Scioto, on which the claim of Oneale depended; but not wishing to take upon himself the construction of Oneale's entry, he merely meandered the river, and referred the question to the principal surveyor, by whose directions he made the survey for Oneale in 1796, and without any instructions from Oneale or any agent for him. That when the entry was made, the country had been but recently explored, and none of the locators knew by survey the meanders of the Scioto. He does not admit that the entry has been surveyed contrary to location, but he surveyed it as he would have surveyed it for himself.

He admits he made an entry for himself, and intended to appropriate the vacant land, but it was not by any procurement of his that his patent was prior to Oneale's. That the plaintiff did not become wholly interested in the claim until long after the survey was made.

After the defendant's answer came in, the plaintiff amended his bill by making Anderson (the principal surveyor) a defendant, and charged that if the survey for Oneale was made by the directions of Anderson, as alleged by the defendant Massie, it was with a fraudulent design on the part of Anderson to appropriate *to himself the land described in Oneale's [150 entry, and that if he had no design, he was still responsible for the consequences of the illegal survey.

Anderson by his answer denies all fraud, and most positively denies that he gave Massie any instructions to make the survey, as falsely stated in the bill. That the survey was made of 530 acres, in part of the entry, which survey was returned to his (Anderson's) office, and which he did not record for about the term of one year from the time he received it, doubting whether the survey had been properly made; but after a critical examination of the subject he concluded that it was not improperly made and recorded it.

The plaintiff amended his bill again by charging that the defendant Massie was the owner of Powell's entry, and had surveyed and obtained a grant therefor, and calling upon him to answer when he became the purchaser of Powell's right.

To this Massie answered, that after surveying Oncale's entry in the spring of 1797, he purchased Robert Powell's survey, before which time he had no interest in the land, and has sold the whole of it, but made a conveyance of only a part.

There had been certain facts found in the cause by a jury according to a practice heretofore adopted in chancery suits in the courts of Kentucky, but the court ordered "that the facts found by the jury should be set aside."

The following opinion of Judge Innis (Judge Todd being absent), states the facts of the case so fully that nothing need be added in stating the case.

"The complainant having acquired the equitable right to certain lands conferred on Ferdinand Oncale by the state of Virginia, as a bounty for military services performed by him as an officer during the revolutionary war, has instituted this suit with a double aspect, first, to recover one thousand acres of land, which 151*] *had been entered for Oncale on the Scioto river, upon a suggestion that the defendant Massie, who was the locator, had wrongfully deprived him of the land, by surveying Robert Powell's entry so as to cover part of Oncale's land, and, by a subsequent entry and survey of his own, hath taken the balance. Secondly, if the complainant shall establish his right to the land in contest, and cannot obtain a conveyance therefor, that the decree may be for the value thereof, in money. It appears from the pleadings in the cause that the defendant Massie has purchased Powell's land, and that he has appropriated, by entry and survey, the adjoining land. The three following entries were made upon the Scioto River adjoining each other. "No. 480, 1787, August 13, Major Thomas Massie enters 1,400 acres of land beginning at the junction of Paint Creek with the Scioto, running up the Scioto 520 poles when reduced to a straight line, thence off at right angles from the general course of the river so far that a line parallel thereto will include the quantity."

"No. 503, Captain Robert Powell enters one thousand acres of land beginning at the upper corner, on the Scioto, of Major Thomas Massie's entry. No. 480, running up the river 520 poles when reduced to a straight line, thence from the beginning, with Massie's line so far that a line parallel to the general course of the river shall include the quantity,"

"No. 509, Captain Ferdinand Oneale enters one thousand acres beginning at the upper corner on the Scioto of Robert Powell's entry. No. 503, running up the river 520 poles when reduced to a straight line, and from the beginning with Powell's line so far that a line parallel with the general course of the river shall include the quantity." Surveys have been made upon the entries of Thomas Massie and Robert Powell, so as to cover almost the whole base of 1,560 poles, the space which was allotted for the three claims on the river, and 530 acres of land have been surveyed for Oncale, by the defendant Massie in part of his entry, which it is impossible upon any construction he can hold. 152*] *To form a correct opinion in this case, the several entries of Massie, Powell and Oneale, must be brought into one view, and, as far as it is possible, consistent with the entries, to ascertain the object and intention of the locator. It is evident, from the manner in which these entries are worded, that the locator had no doubt in his mind, at the time the entries were made, of having given that space which would enable him to secure, by legal surveys, the quantity of land located for each person. It becomes, then, the duty of the court to consider the case with a reference to this object. No difficulty arises as to the manner in which the entry of Thomas Massie ought to be surveyed, the calls of his entry being express and positive. His entry ought to have been surveyed in the following manner: to begin, as he has done, at the junction of Paint Creek and the Scioto, and then to run up the river so far as will ascertain the termination of the 520 poles called for on the river, when reduced to a straight line. This will reduce his base to a point below the first flooded land represented in the connected plat, above the mouth of Paint Creek, thence he is to run out at right angles with the general course of the river. The unexpected bends in the Scioto river have induced such a construction to be placed on the entries of Powell and Oneale, by the defendant Massie, that, in executing the surveys of Thomas Massie and Powell, he considered Oneale as being excluded from obtaining any part of the land upon the base of 1,560 poles, the space allotted for three entries.

The contest in this case, in consequence of the manner which has been pursued in making Massie's and Powell's surveys, rests principally upon the construction which is to be given to Powell's and Oneale's entries; and, as the latter is dependent on the former, equity requires that, if it be possible to secure to each his portion of land agreeably to their entries, it ought to be so decided, provided it can be done consistently with the spirit of the entries, and the real intention of the locator.

From an attentive consideration of the entries, the *object of the locator was evi- [153 dently to give to each of the proprietors of the warrants an equal base on the river, and make it the ruling principal in shaping the surveys. It only remains, then, to be considered whether the words in the entries will bear such a construction as to effectuate the object, and secure the lands to Powell and Oneale, which the locator intended at the time he made the entries.

Powell's first call is to run up the river Scioto; and the description given of the land contemplated to be covered by the entry, is that portion which shall lie within a line parallel to the general course of the river. From a view of the Scioto river, as laid down in the connected plat, and the shape which Thomas Massie's land will assume when run out agreeably to his entry, it becomes necessary, in order to give Powell the land parallel to the general course of the river, to lay it off by commencing the survey on the river at the extremity of the 520 poles above Massie, and thence to run out at right angles to the general course of the river, so far that a parallel line to the river, extending to Massie's back line, and binding on Massie's lines, will include his one thousand acres. Reverse this mode of surveying Powell's entry, and begin at Massie's upper corner on the river and run out with Massie's line, it will make Massie's line the governing principle of the survey, and not the river, which construction will be contrary to the true meaning expressed in the entry, the intention of the locator, and place the survey on the land of Oneale, whose interest, as a subsequent locator, is equally entitled to protection with that of the prior.

The rule adopted in construing this entry must justify the manner of executing a survey a greeably thereto by running five lines instead of four to circumscribe the land. This proceeds from an accidental circumstance occasioned by the great bend immediately above the mouth of Paint Creek, which renders it necessary to comply with the governing principle in the entry for the land to be "parallel to the general course of the river." By thus executing Powell's survey, a portion of land will remain on the river, and parallel thereto 154] *sufficient to satisfy Oneale, the calls of whose entry are similar to Powell's calling for him as he does for Massie.

Oneale's survey ought, therefore, to have been executed in the same manner as it is now decided. Powell's ought to have been made by beginning at the termination of 520 poles on the river, and thence to run off at right angles from that point.

Having decided the manner in which the entries of Massie, Powell, and Oneale ought to have been surveyed, it remains yet to say what is the situation of the survey for 530 acres of land made for Oneale, and placed on the record book of the surveyor. To make this act obligatory on the party it was necessary that all the acts done should have been performed or approved by Oneale himself or some one of his assignees, or by some agent authorized for that purpose. There is no evidence in the cause to this effect: the placing the survey on the surveyor's book is therefore an unauthorized and void act.

In the case of Wilson and Mason, in the late district court, the court decided that a survey once recorded was not afterwards in the power or control of the party. This opinion was predicated on two facts found in that cause, that William Mason was the agent of the defendant, and approved of what had been done by registering the surveys of Mason although cautioned of his danger.

Upon this view of the case, the court is of opinion that the complainant recover of the defendant one thousand acres of land, to be laid off agreeably to the mode pointed out as the proper manner for surveying Oneale's entry.

That upon the defendant Massie's conveying the said one thousand acres of land to the complainant, he, the complainant, shall assign to the said defendant all his right in and to one thousand acres of the warrant issued to the said Oneale.

155*] *So far as this suit relates to the defendant Anderson, it is decreed and ordered that the bill be dismissed as to him with costs, the court being of opinion he was improperly made a party. It is therefore considered by the court, that the defendant Anderson recover of the complainant his costs by him in this behalf expended.

And afterwards, at the same term, the following order was made herein. The court in pursuance of the opinion and decree delivered in this cause on the eighth day of this month (December) doth order, that the surveyor of Ross county do go on the land in controversy and lay off the same as follows: Thomas Massie's entry by beginning at the mouth of Paint Creek, thence up the Scioto so far as will amount to 520 poles when reduced to a straight line, and from each end of this base at right angles from the general course so far that a line parallel with that general course will produce the quantity of fourteen hundred acres. Robert Powell's entry by beginning at the upper corner of Thomas Massie's entry, that is, 520 poles from the mouth of Paint Creek, thence up the river so far as will amount to 520 poles when reduced to a straight line, and from the end of this base line, a line is to be run at right angles to the general course of that portion of the river which is occupied by the base line and from the beginning with the lines of Thomas Massie, that is, his second and third lines, so far that a line parallel to the general course of this base line will produce the quantity of one thousand acres. Ferdinand Oneale's entry by beginning at the upper corner of Robert Powell's entry when laid off as aforesaid, thence up the Scioto so far as will amount to 520 poles when reduced to a straight line, and from the end of this base line a line is to be run at right angles from the general course of that portion of the river which is occupied by the base line, and from the beginning with the second and third lines of Powell so far that a line parallel to the general course of the base line will produce the quantity of one thousand acres.

And the court doth further order, that the said surveyor *do make and bound the [156 said survey of Oneale when laid off as aforesaid, and make report of the metes and bounds and his proceedings herein to the next court."

At May term, 1808, the surveyor having made his report, a final decree was entered in conformity with the principles laid down in the interlocutory order, from which the defendant appealed.

Pope, for the plaintiff in error, contended that the Circuit Court in Kentucky had no jurisdiction of a case involving the title of land lying in Ohio, unless it be upon a personal contract. Here was no personal contract. Although the bill states an agreement respecting the surveying of the land, yet it is denied by the answer, and not proved. Besides, if there was such a contract, it is not upon the contract that the suit is brought. It is a mere question which of the parties has the better right under their several entries. The remedy in chancery in Kentucky is merely a substitute for a caveat. It is in the nature of a real action, which is local. A court in New York could not try the title of land in Virginia, unless it were upon a personal contract. Even the action of trespass quare clausum fregit is a local action, although it sounds in damages, and seems to be of a personal nature.

P. B. Key, contra. The bill is for a specific performance of a trust. The party who has the legal estate by a younger entry, is a trustee for him who had the elder entry; and upon this is founded the jurisdiction of a court of equity. The action is in personam, not in rem. The remedy sought is a decree that the defendant should convey the land to the plaintiff. If the defendant refuses to perform the decree, the compulsory process is in personam, by way of attachment for a contempt of court. The whole and original jurisdiction of a court of equity is in personam, and not in rem.

But the act of Congress is imperative. The Circuit Court of Kentucky has jurisdiction in all cases at law and in equity between citizens 157] of different states, if *the defendant be found in the District of Kentucky. The same jurisdiction might have been exercised by the state courts of Kentucky.

H. Clay, same side. The question is, whether the nature of the case controls the general expressions of the constitution, and the act of Congress.

If Watts could not sue Massie in Kentucky, he would be without remedy. He could not sue in Ohio, because the defendant could not be found there.

The ground of jurisdiction is trust. The case also contains the peculiar relation of the parties to each other. Massie was employed by Watts's assignor to locate the land. In this respect it is a case of contract.

Pope, in reply. The circuit courts of the United States have concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the state in which they sit.

The state courts of Ohio unquestionably had jurisdiction. The Circuit Court, therefore, of the District of Ohio, is the court of the United States which had cognizance of the case.

The court having intimated an opinion in favor of the jurisdiction of the court below, the counsel proceeded to argue the question of location. But as the subject is very intricate without a copy of the plats in the case, and as the opinion of the court is very full, it is deemed unnecessary to report the arguments of counsel upon that point.

February 28. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit having been originally instituted, in the Court of Kentucky, for the purpose of obtaining a conveyance for lands lying in the state of Ohio, an objection is made by the 158] plaintiff in error, who was the *defendant below, to the jurisdiction of the court by which the decree was rendered.

Taking into view the character of the suit in chancery brought to establish a prior title originating under the land law of Virginia against a person claiming under a senior patent, considering it as a substitute for a caveat introduced by the peculiar circumstances attending those titles, this court is of opinion, that there is much reason for considering it as a local action, and for confining it to the court sitting within the state in which the lands lie. Was this cause, therefore, to be considered as involving a naked question of title; was it, for example, a contest between Watts and Powell, the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of Kentucky would not be sustained. But where the question changes its character, where the defendant in the original action is liable to the plaintiff, either in consequence of contract, or as trustee, or as the holder of a legal title acquired by any species of mala fides practiced on the plaintiff, the principles of equity give a court jurisdiction wherever the person may be found, and the circumstance, that a question of title may be involved in the inquiry, and may even constitute the essential point on which the case depends, does not seem sufficient to arrest that jurisdiction.

In the celebrated case of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, the Chancellor of England decreed a specific performance of a contract respecting lands lying in North America. The objection to the jurisdiction of the court, in that case, as reported by Vezey, was not that the lands lay without the jurisdiction of the court, but that, in cases relating to boundaries between provinces, the jurisdiction was exclusively in the king and council. It is in reference to this objection, not to an objection that the lands were without his jurisdiction, that the chancellor says, "This court, therefore, has no original jurisdiction on the direct question of the original right of boundaries." The reason why it had no original jurisdiction on this direct question was, that the decision on the extent of those grants, including dominion and political power, as well *as property, was exclusively [159 reserved to the king in council.

In a subsequent part of the opinion, where he treats of the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, arising from its inability to enforce its decree in rem, he allows no weight to that argument. The strict primary decree of a court of equity is, he says, in personam, and may be enforced in all cases where the person is within its jurisdiction. In confirmation of this position he cites the practice of the courts to decree respecting lands lying in Ireland and in the colonies, if the person, against whom the decree was prayed, be found in England.

In the case of Arglasse v. Muschamp (1 Vernon, 75), the defendant, residing in England, having fraudulently obtained a rent charge on lands lying in Ireland, a bill was brought in England to set it aside. To an objection made to the jurisdiction of the court the chancellor replied, "This is surely only a jest put upon the jurisdiction of this court by the common lawyers; for when you go about to bind the lands and grant a sequestration to execute a decree, then they readily tell you that the authority of this court is only to regulate a man's conscience, and ought not to affect the estate, but that this court must agere in personam only; and when, as in this case, you prosecute the person for a fraud, they tell you that you must not intermeddle here, because the fraud, though committed here, concerns lands that lie in Ireland, which makes the jurisdiction local, and so wholly eludes the jurisdiction of this court." The chancellor, in that case, sustained his jurisdiction on principle, and on the authority of Archer and Preston, in which case a contract made respecting lands in Ireland, the title to which depended on the act of settlement, was enforced in England, although the defendant was a resident of Ireland, and had only made a casual visit to England. On a rehearing before Lord Keeper North this decree was affirmed.

In the case of The Earl of Kildare v. *Sir Morrice Eustace and Fitzgerald (1 [160 Vern., 419), it was determined that if the trustee live in England, the chancellor may enforce the trust, although the lands lie in Ireland.

In the case of Tollor v. Carteret (2 Vern., 494), a bill was sustained for the foreclosure of a mortgage of lands lying out of the jurisdiction of the court, the person of the mortgageor being within it.

Subsequent to these decisions was the case of Penn against Lord Baltimore (1 Vez., 444), in which the specific performance of a contract for lands lying in North America was decreed in England.

Upon the authority of these cases, and of others which are to be found in the books, as well as upon general principles, this court is of opinion that, in a case of fraud, of trust, or of contract, the jurisdiction of a court of chancery is sustainable wherever the person be found, although lands not within the jurisdiction of that court may be affected by the decree.

The inquiry, therefore, will be, whether this be an unmixed question of title, or a case of fraud, trust or contract.

The facts in this case, so far as they affect the question of jurisdiction, are, that, in 1787, the land warrant, of which Watts is now the proprietor, and which then belonged to Oneale, was placed without any special contract in the hands of Massie, as a common locator of lands. In the month of August in the same year he located 1,000 acres, part of this warrant, to adjoin a previous location made on the same day for Robert Powell.

In the year 1793 Massie, as deputy surveyor, surveyed the lands of Thomas Massie, on which Robert Powell's entry depended, and the land of Robert Powell, on which Oneale's entry, now the property of Watts, depended. On the 27th of June, 1795, Nathaniel Massie, the plaintiff in error, entered for himself 2,366 [161*] acres *of land to adjoin the surveys made for Robert Powell, Thomas Massie and one Daniel Stull. The entry of Daniel Stull commences at the upper corner of Ferdinand Oneale's entry on the Scioto, and the entry of Ferdinand Oneale commences at the upper corner of Robert Powell's entry on the Scioto; so that the land of Oneale would be supposed, from the entries, to occupy the space on the Scioto between Powell and Stull. Nathaniel Massie's entry, which was made after surveying the lands of Thomas Massie and of Robert Powell, binds on the Scioto, and occupies the whole space between Powell's survey and Stull's survey.

In the year 1796, Nathaniel Massie surveyed 530 acres of Oneale's entry, chiefly within Stull's survey, and afterwards, in the spring of 1797, purchased Powell's survey. Nathaniel Massie's entry is surveyed and patented. In 1801 Massie received from Watts, in money, the customary compensation for making his location.

It is alleged that Nathaniel Massie has acquired for himself the land which was comprehended within Oneale's entry, and has surveyed for Oneale land to which his entry can by no construction be extended.

If this allegation be unsupported by evidence, there is an end of the case. If it be supported, had the Court of Kentucky jurisdiction of the cause?

Although no express contract be made, yet it cannot be doubted that the law implies a contract between every man who transacts business for another at the request of that other and the person for whom it is transacted. A common locator who undertakes to locate lands for an absent person is bound to perform the usual duties of a locator, and is entitled to the customary compensation for those duties. If he fails in the performance of those duties, he is liable to the action of the injured party, which may be instituted wherever his person is found. If his compensation be refused, he may sue therefor in any court within whose jurisdiction the person for whom the location was made *can be found. In either action the [*162 manner in which the service was performed is inevitably the subject of investigation, and the difficulty of making it cannot oust the court of its jurisdiction.

From the nature of the business, and the situation of the parties, the person for whom the location is made being generally a non-resident, and almost universally unacquainted with the country in which his land is placed, it is the duty of the locator not only to locate the lands, but to show them to the surveyor. He also necessarily possesses the power to amend or to change the location if he has sufficient reason to believe that it is for the interest of his employer so to do. So far as respects the location, he is substituted in the place of the owner, and his acts done bona fide are the acts of the owner.

If, under these circumstances, a locator finding that the entry he has made cannot be surveyed, instead of withdrawing it or amending it so as to render it susceptible of being carried into execution, secured the adjoining land for himself, and shows other land to the surveyor which the location cannot be construed to comprehend, it appears to this court to be a breach of duty, which amounts to a violation of the implied contract, and subjects him to the action of the party injured.

If the location be sustainable, and the locator, instead of showing the land really covered by the entry, shows other land, and appropriates to himself the land actually entered, this appears to the court to be a species of mala fides which will, in equity, convert him into a trustee for the party originally entitled to the land.

In either case the jurisdiction of the court of the state in which the person is found is sustainable.

If we reason by analogy from the distinction between actions local and transitory at common law, this action would follow the person, because it would *be founded on an im- [*163 plied contract, or on neglect of duty.

If we reason from those principles which are laid down in the books relative to the jurisdiction of courts of equity, the jurisdiction of the Court of Kentucky is equally sustainable, because the defendant, if liable, is either liable under his contract, or as trustee.

The case, then, as presented to the court, gives it jurisdiction, and the testimony must be examined to ascertain how far the bill is supported.

The entry of Thomas Massie begins at the junction of Paint Creek with the Scioto, and runs up the Scioto 520 poles, when reduced to a straight line, thence off at right angles from the general course of the river, so far that a line parallel thereto will include the quantity.

Respecting this entry there is no controversy

Robert Powell enters 1,000 acres of land, "beginning at the upper corner on the Scioto, of Major Thomas Massie's entry, No. 480, running up the river 520 poles, when reduced to a straight line, thence from the beginning with Massie's line, so far that a line parallel with the general course of the river shall include the quantity."

Then Ferdinand Oneale enters 1,000 acres of land, beginning at the upper corner on the Scioto, of Robert Powell's entry, No. 503, running up the river 520 poles, when reduced to a straight line, and from the beginning with Powell's line, so far that a line parallel with the general course of the river shall include the quantity.

As Oneale's entry depends on Powell's, it is necessary to ascertain the land taken by Powell, before that of Oneale can be accurately determined.

Had the general course of the Scioto con-
164*] tinued *nearly the same, no difficulty would have been found in this case. The surveys might have conformed literally to all the calls of each entry, and each tract would have constituted nearly a rectangular figure with a base of 520 poles on the river, and a back line parallel to that base. But the unexpected bends of the Scioto have deranged the uniformity of this chain of locations, and produced questions of considerable intricacy respecting the ground which must be covered by them.

Thomas Massie's entry being of 1,400 acres, and Powell's of only 1,000 acres, with a base of the same length on the river, it probably was thought certain that Massie's upper line would extend beyond Powell's land, and that the line of Powell, which was to run parallel to the river, would intersect Massie's upper line. Powell's entry, therefore, calls to run from the river with Massie's line, so far that a line parallel to the general course of the river will include the quantity. Upon actual survey the course of the river is found to be such that a line parallel thereto, drawn from the end of Massie's line, would not include 200 acres of land. Under these circumstances Powell must lose between 800 and 900 acres of land, if his entry cannot be so construed as to extend beyond the length of Massie's line.

From the peculiar situation of titles acquired under the land law of Virginia, a law which offered for sale an immense unexplored wilderness, covered with savages equally fierce and hostile, leaving to the purchaser the right to place his warrant, which was the evidence of his purchase, on any land not previously appropriated, and requiring him to make his entries so certainly that any other person might locate the adjacent residuum, it followed inevitably that immense difficulties would occur, and that locations must often be lost, or receive that certainty which the law required from principles adapted to the general state of things in the country, but which were not precisely foreseen when the locations were made.

165*] *These principles have been laid down by the courts, and must be considered as expositions of the statute. A great proportion of the landed property of the country depends on adhering to them.

The great and equitable foundation on which they stand is this. If, by any reasonable construction of an entry, it can be supported, the courts will support it. This principle absolutely requires that all discretion, with respect to the mode of surveying an entry, should be surrendered. For if a location might be surveyed in various ways, then it is vague, and no subsequent locator would know how to enter the adjacent residuum. The court, therefore, is compelled to say in what manner every location, which appears, in its terms, to reserve some power in the locator to vary its form, shall be surveyed.

In the exercise of this essential and necessary power, they have declared that when a given quantity of land is to be laid off on a given base, it shall be included within four lines, so that the lines proceeding from the base shall be at right angles with it, and the line opposite the base shall be parallel to it, unless this form be repugnant to the entry.

The consequence of this principle is, that if the calls of an entry do not fully describe the land, but furnish enough to enable the court to complete the location by the application of certain principles, they will complete it.

They have also decided that, if a location have certain material calls sufficient to support it, and to describe the land, other calls less material and incompatible with the essential calls of the entry may be discarded.

These principles, it is believed, will enable the court to ascertain, in a reasonable manner, the land covered by Powell's location.

The beginning is the upper corner of Massie on the *Scioto. A base line upon the [*166 river is then given to consist of 520 poles, when reduced to a straight line. Massie's upper line, to its whole extent, if necessary, is also given, and a back line parallel to the base is given. The side line opposite Massie's line, and the course from the termination of Massie's line to the back line are wanting, and are to be supplied by construction.

The material inquiry, so far as respects the present cause, is, in what direction shall Powell's upper line, extending back from the river to the line parallel to the general course of the river, be run? That line is not given, and is consequently to be supplied by construction.

According to the uniform course of decisions, Powell's upper line must project from the base at right angles with it, unless there shall be some other call in the entry which controls this general principle. It is contended that it is controlled by the call to run with Massie's line from the beginning. Massie's line not being at right angles with the base line, it is argued that Powell's opposite line, discarding the rectangular principle, must be parallel to the line from the beginning.

But the court does not concur with the counsel for the plaintiff in error in this opinion. The principle that the rectangular figure is to be preferred to any other, and is to be preserved whenever it can be preserved, originates in the necessity of adopting some regular figure in order to give to locations that certainty which is not always to be found in their terms, and in the superior convenience of that figure over every other, with respect to the adjacent residuum. These motives apply to a part as well as to the whole of an entry. If one location be made upon another so that the lines of that other bind the entry on one side, and then a precise line be called for from the beginning to run a certain distance, from the end of which a line is to be drawn, and to continue until a line, parallel to the first or base line, or to some 167*] given point in *the lines of the person on whom the location is made, shall include the quantity, the same respect for certainty and convenience which induced originally the adoption of the rectangular figure would seem to require its adoption with respect to those lines which did not receive a different direction from the positive calls of the location. On one side there might be several different lines; but this would not seem to demand that, on the opposite side, the same variety should be preserved. It would be departing from the principle unnecessarily to require that the lines of the opposite side of the tract should be multiplied in order to be all parallel to the lines by which one side was unavoidably bounded. To the court it seems that the rectangular principle is always to be preserved where it can be preserved, that is, where there is no call in the entry applying to the lines which control them, and that, where it is necessarily departed from, the departure should not be extended further than the necessity requires.

In this particular case the location does not call for a line parallel to Massie's line, and, as Massie's line was to run at right angles from the general course of the river, and it was obviously expected Powell's line would not extend the whole length of Massie's line, it is clear that the locator expected that Powell's upper line, when at right angles with the course of the river, would be nearly parallel to Massie's line.

This may be considered as, in some degree, an auxiliary argument in favor of the opinion which is entertained by this court, that the Circuit Court did right in laying down the upper line of Powell at right angles with his base line.

This line being established, it is of little importance to Oneale's claim in what manner the remaining lines of Powell may be run.

The call of the location, so far as respects the side binding on Massie, is said to stop at Massie's north-western corner. Is that line to be continued?

168*] *The conclusive objection to it is, that it would intersect the upper line before the quantity was obtained, and would, consequently, entirely defeat the call for a back line parallel to the course of the river.

Is a line at right angles with the general course of the river to be run from Massie's corner and continued until a line parallel to the base line would include the quantity?

This would be less exceptionable, but it would be departing further from the square, and might, in some instances, exhibit a plat the breadth of which would not be one-third of its length. This point, however, is not critically examined, because it is of very little importance in the present cause. The upper line of Powell, on which Oneale binds, would be the same as far as it now runs, and should it be continued further, it would only take a small angle of Oneale's survey as made by order of the Circuit Court.

The court is of opinion that Powell's entry is rightly surveyed by order of the Circuit Court, and it is an additional argument in support of this opinion, that, with the exception of the angle unavoidably made by the interference of Massie, the general form of the land approaches a square more nearly than if laid off in any other manner.

If Powell's entry be correctly surveyed, Oneale's cannot be laid off otherwise than it is.

Were it even to be admitted that the original survey made for Powell was correct, it is entirely possible that the case of the plaintiff would not be materially improved thereby.

Powell's back line would probably terminate on the river; in which event, that would be his upper corner on the Scioto, which is called for as the beginning of Oneale's entry. Oneale then calls to run on the river a distance of 520 poles on a straight line, and with Powell's line so far as that a line parallel to the general *course of the river shall include 1,000 [169 acres. Either this entry is rendered totally incapable of being surveyed in consequence of the call for Powell's line, or it must be so surveyed as to include almost the whole town of Chillicothe, and to take a considerable part of Massie's land.

It is, however, unnecessary to inquire what would be the rights of the person claiming Oneale's entry, in that event, since the court is satisfied that the survey, as directed by the Circuit Court, is correct.

The case, then, as made out in evidence, is this: Nathaniel Massie, employed to locate a military warrant for Oneale, has entered the warrant in pursuance of his engagement. On surveying the entries on which that of Oneale depended, he either believed that Oneale's entry was void from the repugnancy of its calls, or if not absolutely void, was incapable of covering the land which, according to legal construction, and the common understanding of those who might read the entries, it must be considered as covering; or he thought that, by obtaining a prior patent for the land he might resist any claim which might afterwards be made by Oncale, or those claiming under him. If Massie really believed that Powell's entry was properly surveyed, and that Oneale's entry, as made, could not be surveyed, it was his duty to amend it, or, if that was not his duty, to place it elsewhere. For omitting so to do he is chargeable with such gross neglect of duty as to render him responsible in damages, had his construction of Oneale's location even been correct. But, if in this he was mistaken, it would be dangerous in the extreme, it would be a cover for fraud which could seldom be removed, if a locator, alleging difficulties respecting a location, might withdraw it and take the land for himself. He, however, has not withdrawn it, except so far as it may be impliedly withdrawn by the survey of 530 acres. With that exception the entry still covers the land on which it was originally placed, and is still entitled to that land. But Massie, the agent of Oncale, has entered and surveyed a portion of that land for himself, and obtained a patent for it in his own name. *According to the clearest and [170 best established principles of equity, the agent who so acts becomes a trustee for his principal. He cannot hold the land under an entry for himself otherwise than as trustee for his principal.

So far, then, as Oneale's land is within Massie's survey, Massie is a trustee for Oneale and his assignees, and upon the principle stated in the early part of this opinion, the Court of Kentucky had jurisdiction of the cause.

But a part of Oneale's land is surveyed for Powell, and in a contest between his assignees and Powell, the Court of Kentucky would have had no jurisdiction. This controversy, however, is not with Powell; it is with Massie, who is the purchaser of Powell's rights. The whole property being thus in the hands of Massie, and the Court of Kentucky being in possession of the cause, and having clear jurisdiction of a part of it which decides the principle on which the whole depends, that court did right in deciding the whole cause, and decreeing to the assignees of Oneale the whole land originally included in the entry made for him.

Considerable doubts were entertained respecting the right of Watts to more than the unsurveyed part of the entry. But a majority of the court is of opinion that he stands precisely in the place of Oneale.

As Massie does not show that he had conveyed any of that part of Powell's survey which is included within Oneale's entry previous to the institution of this suit, or even now, the allegation that he has conveyed a part of Powell's survey could not furnish sufficient matter for preventing the decree which was rendered.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.

171*] *THE UNITED STATES v. HALL AND WORTH.

If a vessel be driven by stress of weather to the West Indies, and the cargo there detained by the government of the place, this is such a casualty as comes within the exception of "dangers of the seas" in the condition of an embargo bond.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, in an action of debt upon an embargo bond, dated December 29, 1807, the condition of which was, to reland certain goods in some port of the United States, "the dangers of the seas only excepted." The vessel on board of which the goods were laden, cleared out and sailed from Philadelphia, for East Portland, in the District of Maine, but, having encountered severe and tempestuous weather, her crew disabled in a great degree, she was obliged, in order to escape from the danger of Nantucket shoals, to change her course, and to endeavor to gain the port of Charleston. The weather and the winds, however, were so severe and adverse that she could not make Charleston, nor any other port of the United States, and was obliged to bear away for the West Indies to obtain relief. She arrived at Porto Rico in distress. The governor ordered the cargo to be landed and sold, with which order the captain was obliged to comply, and did land and sell the same. She could not leave the island without considerable repairs, which were accordingly made.

The court below instructed the jury that these facts, if believed by them, were, upon the whole case, sufficient to bar the United States of their action. The verdict and judgment were accordingly for the defendants, and the United States sued out a writ of error.

The bond was taken in pursuance of the directions of the act of 22d of December, 1807, usually called the embargo act (vol. 9, p. 7), and before any of the supplemental acts on that subject were passed.

The third section of the act of March 12, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 71), provided that in every case where a bond had been given under the act of 22d of December, 1807, conditioned to reland the goods, &c., the parties *should, [*172 within four months after the date of the same, produce to the collector a certificate of the relanding, &c., on failure whereof the bond should be put in suit, and judgment should be given against the defendants, "unless proof shall be produced of such relanding, or of loss by sea, or other unavoidable accident."

The seventh section of the act of January 9, 1809, (vol. 9, p. 190), usually called the enforcing act, provides that in all cases where, under the act of 22d of December, 1807, a bond has been given to reland, &c., the parties shall, within two months after the date of the same, produce to the collector a certificate of the relanding of the goods from the collector of the proper port; on failure whereof the bond shall be put in suit, and judgment shall be given against the defendants, "unless proof shall be given of such relanding, or of loss of the vessel at sea. But neither capture, distress, or any other accident whatever, shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any such suit, unless such capture shall be expressly proved to have been hostile; and such distress or accident occasioned by no negligence or deviation, nor unless such vessel shall have been, from the commencement of the voyage, wholly navigated by a master, mate or mates, mariners and crew, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States," &c., &c.

Rodney, Attorney General, and Jones for the United States. In order to excuse the party he must show that the goods have been actually lost by the dangers of the seas. If the vessel were irresistably driven by a tempest to Porto Rico, yet the goods arrived there in safety, and were not lost. The party had the full benefit of them, and probably at a higher price than if he had landed them in the United States. If the law of the 12th of March affects the case, yet it must be a loss by sea, or a loss by other unavoidable accident.

When the legislature particularly except certain cases, no other exceptions can be presumed. No loss can be said to be by the dangers of the seas, unless the sea be the proximate cause of the loss. (*Greene et al. v. Ensley, Peake's [*173 N. P., 61, 212; 4 T. R., 783; Bumb., 37.)

The vested rights of parties may be varied by posterior laws. The prohibition in the constitution respecting ex post facto laws, applies only to criminal cases.

Hopkinson, contra.

1. This was a loss by the dangers of the seas; and,

2. We are entitled to the benefit of the act of 12th of March, 1808, by which unavoidable accident is an excuse.

1. The first embargo law means such a kind of a loss as prevents the relanding of the goods in the United States. It does not mean where the loss is occasioned by the immediate dangers of the element, but any loss to which vessels are exposed in consequence of the dangers of the seas.

Thus captured by pirates is a loss by one of the dangers of the seas. The expression has the same meaning in the act as it has in bills of lading. If this action had been upon the bill of lading instead of the bond, such an accident would have been a sufficient excuse to the master for not delivering the goods. So in a policy of insurance. (Abbott, 155, Amer. edit.; 2 Roll. Abr., 248, pl. 10; Marshall, 418, 1st edit.; Abbott, 168; Carricks v. Cox, Binney's Rep, Sup. Court Pennsylvania; Marshall, 488, 2d edit.)

The vessel was by the weather forced into Porto Rico. She could not return without repairs. She could not obtain repairs without leave of the governor. That leave could not be obtained but by obedience to his orders. His orders prevented the relanding of the goods according to the condition of the bond.

The case cited from Peake only shows that the loss was within the description of loss by capture, not that it was not a loss by the dan-
174*] gers of the seas. The case *from Bunbury was a mere private trespass; so was that cited from 4 T. R. 783. It was not an act of the government. The insured had a private remedy against the trespassers.

2. We have a right to the benefit of the act of 12th of March, and are excused if prevented from relanding by any unavoidable accident.

There is a difference, as to ex post facto laws, between those which mitigate, and those which increase, the penalty.

The act expressly refers to bonds taken under the prior law. It does not mean loss by unavoidable accident, but prevention by such accident. The punctuation of the sentence, as printed in the statute book, favors this construction; but if it be doubtful, the court will lean against the penalty.

But the property was lost to the owner, within the meaning of the statute. He had no power over the thing itself; he could not bring it away. It is immaterial whether he obtained an equivalent or not; the letter of the condition of the bond could only be satisfied by relanding the thing itself. A compliance with the condition was to him as impossible as if the goods had perished in the sea.

3. The act of January 9, 1809, cannot apply to this case so as to make that penal which before was justifiable.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., stopped the counsel, and observed that the court would never consider the penal act as applying to previous facts, unless such construction be absolutely unavoidable.

March 3. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit was instituted on a bond taken in 175*] pursuance *of the original embargo act, with a condition that the cargo of the schooner Mary, a sea letter vessel, should be relanded in the port of East Portland, or some other port of the United States "the dangers of the seas only excepted."

Her cargo was not relanded within the United States, but was carried to Porto Rico and sold. The defendants allege that they were driven by stress of weather into Porto Rico, where the cargo was landed by order of the government; and they insist that the case is within the exception contained in the condition of the bond. The Circuit Court instructed the jury that, if they believed the testimony, it was sufficient in law to bar the action. To this opinion the counsel for the United States excepted; and its propriety is now to be considered.

The improbability of the allegations made by the defendants is no longer the subject of inquiry. The jury have verified them, and the court must receive them as true. The testimony is, that the Mary was driven by tempestuous weather into a foreign port. That, while prosecuting her voyage, she encountered weather which so disabled both the crew and vessel, and put her in such a situation that, to escape Nantucket shoals, "she was obliged to change her course and endeavor to gain a southern port." She changed her course and bore for Charleston. But such was the condition of the crew and of the vessel, and so severe and so adverse were the winds, that she "could not make Charleston, nor any other port of the United States, and was obliged to bear away for the West Indies, to obtain relief."

The vessel, then, was driven into Porto Rico by the cause which forms the exception in the condition of the bond, and if the cargo had been lost at the mouth of the harbor, instead of entering the port, all would admit that the penalty of the bond had not been incurred. But it is contended that the dangers of the seas terminated on entering the port, and that no sufficient cause is shown for not bringing back the cargo to the United States.

*The case states that the governor of [176
Porto Rico issued an order that the cargo should be landed and sold, "with which order the captain was obliged to comply."

As this case is stated, the Mary was driven into Porto Rico, and the sale of her cargo, while there, was inevitable. The dangers of the sea placed her in a situation which put it out of the power of the owners to reland her cargo within the United States. The obligors, then, were prevented, by the dangers of the seas, from complying with the condition of the bond; for an effect, which proceeds inevitably, and of absolute necessity from a specified cause, must be ascribed to that cause.

It is the unanimous opinion of this court that there is no error in the proceedings of the Circuit Court, and that the judgment be affirmed.

CAMPBELL v. GORDON AND WIFE.

A certificate by a competent court, that an alien has taken the oath prescribed by the act respecting naturalization, raises a presumption that the court was satisfied as to the moral character of the alien, and of his attachment to the principles of the constitution of the United States, &c. The oath, when taken, confers the rights of a citizen. It is not necessary that there should be an order of court admitting him to become a citizen.

The children of persons duly naturalized before the 14th of April, 1802, being under age at the time of the naturalization of their parent, were, if dwelling in the United States, on the 14th of April, 1802, to be considered as citizens of the United States.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, dismissing the bill of the complainant.

The case was stated by WASHINGTON, J., in delivering the opinion of this court, as follows:

"The object of the bill was to rescind a contract made between the appellant and Robert Gordon, the appellee, for the sale of a tract of land by the latter to the former, upon the ground of a defect of title. The facts in the case, which are not disputed, appear to be as follows: The land which forms the subject of dispute belonged to James Currie, a citizen of Virginia, who died seized thereof in fee, on the 23d of April, 1807, intestate, and without issue. James Currie had one brother of the whole blood, named William, who, prior to the 14th day of October, in the year 1795, was a subject of the King of Great Britain, but who emigrated 177 *to the United States, and on the day last mentioned, at a District Court held at Suffolk, in Virginia, took the oath prescribed by the act of Congress, for entitling himself to the rights and privileges of a citizen. At the time when this oath was taken, William Currie had one daughter, Janetta, the wife of the appellee, who was born in Scotland. She came to the United States in October, 1797, whilst an infant, during the life of her father, and hath ever since continued to reside in the state of Virginia. William Currie died prior to the 23d of April, 1807."

C. Lee and F. S. Key, for the appellant, contended,

1. That William Currie was not duly naturalized.

2. That if he was, yet his daughter Janetta, being in Scotland at the time of her father's naturalization, was not thereby naturalized.

1. William Currie was not duly naturalized.

The certificate of his naturalization was as follows, viz.:

"At a District Court held at Suffolk, October the 14th, 1795, William Currie, late of Scotland, merchant, who hath migrated into this commonwealth, this day in open court, in order to entitle himself to the rights and privileges of a citizen, made oath that for two years last past he hath resided in and under the jurisdiction of the United States, and for one year within this commonwealth, and also that he will support the constitution of the United States, and absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, or other state whatsoever, particularly to the King of Great Britain.

"A copy,

"Teste,

"JOHN C. LITTLEPAGE."

178* *The original memorandum made upon the minutes of the court was as follows:

"At a District Court held at Suffolk, October the 14th, 1795, William Currie, native of Scotland, migrated into the commonwealth, took the oath," &c.

There was also a deposition of a deputy clerk, who states that he acted as deputy to Mr. Littlepage, at, before, and after the date of the entry respecting Mr. Currie's naturalization. That upon examining the order-books of the said court, he finds the entries made in all cases where persons were admitted to become citizens under the act of Congress, at and prior to October term, 1795, to be agreeably to the form used in the case of Mr. Currie. That however informal these entries may have been in not stating that it appeared to the court that the persons who took the oaths were of good moral character, and were admitted citizens; he is sensible every requisite of the law in this, as well as in all other similar instances, was complied with to the satisfaction of the court, and that the omission has been a clerical one.

He also finds, from the order-book, that at May term, 1796, the form of the entry was altered, so as to express the applicant to be of good moral character, &c.

The application was made under the 2d section of the act of January 29, 1795, (vol. 3, p. 163), which provides that any alien then residing within the limits, and under the jurisdiction of the United States, may be admitted to become a citizen, on his declaring, on oath or affirmation, "that he has resided two years at least within and under the jurisdiction of the same, and one year at least within the state or territory where such court is at the time held; that he will support the constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whatever, and particularly by name, the prince, potentate, state or sovereignty, *whereof he was before a citizen or sub- [179 ject; and moreover, on its appearing to the satisfaction of the court, that during the said term of two years he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same."

"All of which proceedings, required in this proviso to be performed, in the court, shall be recorded by the clerk thereof."

The first section of the act requires only the oath of the party himself to be recorded; but the 2d section requires all the proceedings to be recorded.

When a matter is directed by act of parliament to be recorded, it cannot be proved otherwise than by record. (Peake's N. P. Cas., p. 132.) The deposition of the deputy clerk is not competent evidence to prove what ought to have appeared upon the record.

It does not appear upon the record that the court was satisfied as to the moral character of Mr. Currie, or his attachment to the constitution of the United States, or that the court admitted him to become a citizen. They must either show an order of the court for his admission, or they must show that everything has been done to entitle him to become a citizen.

No decision goes farther than that the declaration of a competent court that everything has been done according to law, is sufficient, and dispenses with showing how it was done. But the court has not said so, nor does the record show it. Proof of good character, &c., is not a prerequisite to permission to take the oath; if it was, the admission to take the oath might be considered as evidence that the court was satisfied as to the moral character, &c. His application to the court was not to take the oath, but to be admitted a citizen.

The "&c." in the minutes might have been extended by the clerk, according to his usual custom; but this court cannot undertake to ex-180] tend it, or to say *what it means. Certainly not without direct and positive proof of its meaning.

2. But if William Currie was duly admitted a citizen, yet his daughter Janetta, being then in Scotland, was not thereby naturalized.

The words of the 3d section of the act of 1795 are, "that the children of persons duly naturalized, dwelling within the United States, and being under the age of 21 years, at the time of such naturalization," "shall be considered as citizens of the United States."

Janetta, the daughter of William Currie, was not dwelling within the United States at the time of his naturalization.

The words, "at the time of such naturalization," apply as well to the residence of the child as to her age.

If the child be naturalized by the naturalization of the father, she must be naturalized eo instanti. It cannot be a naturalization, or not, according to a future event.

The case would rarely happen of a parent coming to this country, residing two years, becoming a citizen, and leaving his children in a foreign country. Congress meant to provide for the more common case of a man coming with his children. They intended that all that were with him, under age at the time of his naturalization should partake of the benefit of his act. But they could not mean that the naturalization of a father should naturalize all his progeny under age, wherever they resided. Reasons of policy would forbid it. Their education, manners, habits, prejudices, and prepossessions would all be foreign, and uncongenial with our manners, principles, and systems of government. A child might in this manner become a citizen without renouncing his title of nobility.

The act of 1795 is to have the same construc-181] tion *as the act of 1802, vol. 6, p. 79, § 4; 2 Tuck. Bl., 249; 1 Tuck. Bl., part 2, Appendix, 101.

Swann, contra.

The "&c." in the clerk's minutes means everything that was necessary to be done to entitle Mr. Currie to become a citizen. If the requisites of the statute were complied with, it required the order of the court to admit him to become a citizen. He became such by virtue of the act of Congress. The testimony as to moral character, and attachment to the constitution of the United States, may be taken out of court, or the court may be satisfied of their own knowledge. He was naturalized de facto when he complied with the requisites of the act, and the neglect or error of the clerk cannot deprive him of the privileges of a citizen.

It was immaterial where the child was, if she was under age at the time of her father's naturalization.

February 20. WASHINGTON, J., after stating the case as before mentioned, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The title of the appellees to the land in question being disputed only upon the ground of the alienage of the female appellee, the court take it for granted that there is no other objection to its validity. It is contended, by the counsel for the appellant, that Janetta, who claims as heir to James Currie, is an alien, inasmuch as she has, by no act of her own, entitled herself to the rights and privileges of a citizen, and cannot claim those rights in virtue of her migration to the United States, and of any acts performed by her father. First, because her father was not duly naturalized; and, secondly, because if he were, she was not, at the time of her father's naturalization, dwelling within the United States.

*In support of the first objection it [182 is contended that, although the oath prescribed by the second section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject," passed the 29th of January, 1795, was administered to the said William Currie, by a court of competent jurisdiction, still it does not appear, by the certificate granted to him by the court, and appearing in the record, that he was, by the judgment of the court, admitted a citizen, or that the court was satisfied that, during the term of two years, mentioned in the same section, he had behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.

It is true that this requisite to his admission is not stated in the certificate; but it is the opinion of this court, that the Court of Suffolk must have been satisfied as to the character of the applicant, or otherwise a certificate, that the oath prescribed by law had been taken, would not have been granted.

It is unnecessary to decide whether, in the order of time, this satisfaction, as to the character of the applicant, must be first given, or whether it may not be required after the oath is administered, and, if not then given, whether a certificate of naturalization may not be withheld. But if the oath be administered, and nothing appears to the contrary, it must be presumed that the court, before whom the oath was taken, was satisfied as to the character of the applicant. The oath, when taken, confers upon him the rights of a citizen, and amounts to a judgment of the court for his admission to those rights. It is, therefore, the unanimous opinion of the court, that William Currie was duly naturalized.

The next question to be decided is, whether the naturalization of William Currie conferred upon his daughter the rights of a citizen, after her coming to, and residing within, the United States, she having been *a resident in a [183 foreign country at the time when her father was naturalized.

Whatever difficulty might exist as to the construction of the third section of the act of the 29th of January, 1795, in relation to this point, it is conceived that the rights of citizenship were clearly conferred upon the female appellee by the fourth section of the act of the 14th of April, 1802.

This act declares that the children of persons duly naturalized under any of the laws of the United States, being under the age of 21 years at the time of their parent's being so naturalized, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States. This is precisely the case of Mrs. Gordon. Her father was duly naturalized, at which time she was an infant; but she came to the United States before the year 1802, and was at the time when this law passed, dwelling within the United States.

It is, therefore, the unanimous opinion of the court that, at the time of the death of James Currie, Mrs. Gordon was entitled to all the right and privilege of a citizen; and therefore that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, which is to be affirmed with costs.

M'KNIGHT

v.

CRAIG'S ADMINISTRATOR.

In Virginia, if the defendant die afer interlocutory judgment and a writ of inquiry awarded, his administrator, upon scire facias, can only plead what his intestate could have pleaded.

In all cases of reversal, if this court direct the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff in error, the court below will, of course, enter the judgment with the costs of that court.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action of debt upon a judgment and devastavit, brought by M'Knight against Craig, as executor of Mitchell.

After an office judgment by defanlt against Craig, and a writ of inquiry awarded in November, 1807, at the rules, Craig died. At the July term, 1808, his death was suggested, and a scire facias awarded against I. G. Ladd, his 184] administrator. At the July term, *1809, (being the fourth term after the office judgment), Ladd appeared by his attorney, and offered to plead a special plea of plene administravit, by himself, as administrator of Craig, to which the plaintiff objected, but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the plea to be filed.

The substance of the plea was, that Craig had made a deed of trust of certain real estate to secure Ladd for his indorsements for Craig at the bank, by which deed Craig covenanted to indemnify Ladd. That Ladd had indorsed the notes of Craig to the amount of 8,000 dollars, which were discounted at the bank, and continued the indorsements to the time of Craig's death. That the bank had recovered judgment against Ladd as indorser of some of those notes to the amount of 6,009 dollars, and that Ladd had paid other of the said notes to the amount of 3,174 dollars, to avoid being compelled by suit to pay the same. That the estate, mentioned in the deed of trust, having been sold, produced only 4,095 dollars, whereby the estate of Craig became indebted to Ladd in the sum of 5,138 dollars, and so much of the estate of Craig is liable to be retained by Ladd in satisfaction.

That Craig was bound to several other creditors by specialties in large sums, amounting to 10,000 dollars, and suits thereupon have been brought against Ladd, and are now pending; that he has in his hands personal estate of Craig to the amount of 960 dollars only, which is liable to be retained by him in satisfaction of the damage he has sustained by his indorsements for Craig, by virtue of the covenant for his indemnification, and to pay the specialty creditors aforesaid.

To this plea the plaintiff replied the office judgment and writ of inquiry awarded against Craig in his lifetime in this suit; the subsequent death of Craig, and the scire facias against Ladd, as his administrator, returnable to November term, 1808.

The defendant rejoined that Craig died on the —— day of ——, in the year 1807.

*To this rejoinder the plaintiff de- [185 murred, and assigned as cause of demurrer that the rejoinder is no answer to the replication, and is a departure from the plea.

The court below being of opinion that the plea was good, and the replication bad, rendered judgment upon the demurrer for the defendant.

The plaintiff sued out his writ of error.

E. J. Lee, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the office judgment against Craig in his lifetime, is a debt superior in dignity to the debts stated in the plea; and,

2. That the defendant, coming in upon scire facias, can only plead such plea as his intestate could have pleaded.

1. The office judgment was regularly obtained agreeably to the act of assembly of Virginia (P. P. 80, § 36). And according to the forty-second section of the same act, it became final after the next succeeding court, it not having then been set aside. It being an action of debt, the judgment was not interlocutory, but final. (3 Bl. Com., 395; 1 Tidd, 508). Being a final judgment in the lifetime of Craig, it is entitled to a priority of payment before specialty debts.

2. But if it was only an interlocutory judgment, yet the defendant, upon the scire facias, could plead nothing but what the intestate could have pleaded.

The act of assembly of Virginia (P. P. 110, § 20), is copied almost verbatim from the English statute of 8 and 9, W. III., c. 11, and is in these words:

"And if the defendant die after such interlocutory judgment, and before final judgment, such action shall not abate, if the same were originally maintainable against the executors or administrators of such defendant, but the plaintiff shall and may have a scire facias *against his executors or administrators [186 to show cause why damages in such action should not be assessed and recovered by the plaintiff, and if such executors or administrators shall appear at the return of such writ, and not show or allege any matters sufficient to arrest the final judgment, &c., a writ of inquiry of damages shall thereupon be awarded, which being executed, judgment final shall be given for the said plaintiff," &c.

After such interlocutory judgment the intestate could only allege matter in arrest of judgment, and his administrator can only do the same.

Upon this point the case of Smith v. Harmon (6 Mod., 142, and 1 Salk., 315), is decisive.

Swann, contra.

An office judgment in Virginia is a very different thing from an interlocutory judgment in England. It may be set aside, as a matter of right, by the defendant at the next succeeding court, and he may plead any matter whatever in the same manner as if no such judgment had been rendered. And by the long established practice of Virginia, he may set it aside at any subsequent term, by pleading an issuable plea to the merits. It is not true, therefore, that Craig could only have alleged matter in arrest of judgment. He might have pleaded anything that went to show that the plaintiff ought not to recover judgment against him.

Upon the death of the defendant, and the appearance of his administrator, it becomes a new suit, and the administrator ought to be permitted to plead anything that goes to show that the plaintiff ought not to recover judgment against him.

A debt founded upon a devastavit is not of so high dignity as a debt upon specialty. It is in nature of damages for tort. It is a claim depending upon proof of matter of fact in pais.

187*] *February 19. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect.

The act of assembly of Virginia is copied almost literally from the English statute of 8 and 9 W. III., c. 11. The case in 6 Mod. is a decision expressly upon that statute, and is precisely in point, that the defendant upon the scire facias can only plead what the intestate could have pleaded; and that it is not to be considered as a proceeding against the representative of the deceased, but a continuance of the original action.

The plea is such as could not have been pleaded in the original action, and is therefore bad.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for the defendant to plead to the origiual action, if he should think proper.[1]

To a question by E. J. Lee, the Chief Justice answered, that if the plaintiff in error should obtain a judgment in the court below, it will of course be with costs. So in all cases of reversal, if this court direct the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff in error, the court below will, of course, enter the judgment with the costs of that court.

KENNEDY v. BRENT.

The marshal of the District of Columbia is bound to serve a subpœna in chancery as soon as he reasonably can; and the service of such subpœna, in case of a chancery attachment in Virginia, will make the garnishee liable if he pays away the money after notice of the subpœna.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an action on the case by Kennedy against Brent, marshal of the District of *Columbia, [*188 for the neglect of his deputy in not serving a subpœna in chancery, commonly called a chancery attachment, in due time, whereby the plaintiff lost his debt.

The declaration stated that one Johnston, who did not reside in the District of Columbia, was indebted to the plaintiff, a resident of Alexandria in that district, and that one Hampson was indebted to Johnston; that in order to subject the money in Hampson's hands to the payment of the debt due from Johnston, the plaintiff, on the 13th of December, 1804, filed his bill in chancery in the Circuit Court of the district for the county of Alexandria, and caused to be issued a subpœna in chancery against Johnston and Hampson to answer the bill, which subpœna was then and there delivered to the defendant's deputy to be executed: and was prosecuted with an intention that the debt due from Hampson to Johnstou would be subjected to the payment of the debt due from Johnston to the plaintiff. Nevertheless, the defendant, by his said deputy, not regarding his office of marshal in the true execution thereof, but contriving and fraudulently intending to hinder the plaintiff of his proper remedy for the recovery of his debt aforesaid, did not serve the said subpœna in chancery upon the said Hampson within a reasonable time after receiving the same to be executed as aforesaid, but neglected to serve the said process, without any reasonable cause for so doing, for a long time, to wit, for the space of four months and upwards, by means of which said neglect the said defendant altogether lost the effect of his said suit in chancery against the said Johnston and Hampson as aforesaid, wherefore the plaintiff saith he is injured, and hath sustained damage, &c.

The defendant pleaded not guilty, and a verdict, by consent, was rendered for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon a case agreed, which stated that on the 13th of December, 1804, the plaintiff filed his bill in chancery against Johnston and Hampson in the common form of a bill for a chancery attachment in Virginia. And that the clerk of the court, at the instance of the plaintiff, issued a process commonly *called a chancery attach- [*189 ment, being a subpœna in the common form to answer a bill in chancery, upon which was the following indorsement, viz.: "Memorandum. The object of the bill this day filed in this case is to stay the moneys and effects of the defendaut Johnston in the hands of the defendant Hampson, to satisfy a debt due from the defendant Johnston to the complainant.

(Signed) "G. DENEALE."

That this process, shortly after it was issued, was put into the hands of W. Fox, one of the defendant's deputies, to be executed, and might have been served by him if he had endeavored to have served the same, but it so happened that he did not serve the same, and that it afterwards got into the hands of Lewis Summers, another of the defendant's deputies, who served the same on the 20th day of June, 1805, and made the following return thereupon: "I received this attachment shortly after it issued, and delivered it to W. Fox, D. M., to serve, who shortly after left the town of Alexandria,

1.—The court below considered this case as coming within the act of Congress (vol. 1 p. 71, § 31), passed 24th September, 1789, which authorizes the court "to render judgment for or against the executor or administrator, as the case may require." It does not appear whether that act was taken into consideration by this court.

leaving in the marshal's office two bundles of process, one marked 'process served,' and the other 'process not served.' In the first bundle was this subpœna in chancery. On or about May or June last I was informed it had not then been served. I then examined this process and found it without any indorsement, and took the earliest opportunity to inquire of Mr. Fox as to the service of the subpœna, who informed me he did not recollect having served it. I then, on the 20th of June, served the same on Bryan Hampson. The other defendant Johnston not found.

(Signed) "L. SUMMERS, D. M."

Whereupon it was agreed that the verdict should be subject to the opinion of the court upon the following questions:

"1. As the marshal by his deputy executed the process on the 20th of June, 1805, before 190] the day appointed *for the return thereof, and returned the same on the return day thereof, whether he was in law bound to have served the same, if in his power so to do, at any time previous to the said 20th of June, 1805, unless he was specially required by the plaintiff to serve the same, notwithstanding he received the same as marshal on the day on which the said process was issued.

"2. Whether the indorsement on the said process of subpœna would, after service thereof, create any legal impediment to the payment of the money over to the said Johnston by the said Bryan Hampson, and would, in case of such payment after service, make the said Bryan Hampson personally liable for the amount so paid over.

"If the court should be of opinion that the said marshal was not bound to have served the said process, if in his power to do so at any time previous to the 20th of June, 1805, (unless he was specially required by the plaintiff to serve the same, notwithstanding he received the same as marshal on the day on which the said process issued,) then the judgment is to be rendered for the defendant.

"And if, under the circumstances mentioned in the second question, the court should be of opinion that the said Bryan Hampson would not be personally liable for the amount so paid over, and that his not being personally liable would be sufficient to discharge the marshal from any liability in this case, then judgment is to be rendered for the defendant.

"But if both those questions are decided for the plaintiff, then judgment upon the verdict is to be rendered for him."

The court below was of opinion that the statement of the case was not full enough to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, and directed judgment to be entered up for the defendant; whereupon the plaintiff brought his writ of error.

191*] Swann, for plaintiff in error.

The marshal is bound to serve all process put into his hands for service, as soon as possible, and if he does not, he is liable, in a special action on the case, to any party who suffers any injury by his neglect. (Bac. Abr., tit. Sheriff.)

The service of the subpœna in this case would have bound Kennedy, and if he should pay over the money after service of the subpœna, he would do it at his peril. If there should be a decree against him he could not avoid it by showing that he paid away the money after notice. The decree would relate back to the time of notice.

E. J. Lee, contra.

The marshal is not bound to serve process as soon as he can by any possibility serve it, which was the principle which the court below was called upon, by the case stated, to sanction.

It is sufficient in such a case as this, if he served it at any time before the return day. The indorsement is no part of the process. The marshal was not bound to serve that, or to give notice of it to the defendant. All that he was commanded to do was to summon the defendant to answer the bill according to the command of the subpœna. The indorsement was a mere private notice. It might have been served by any person, and would have been as obligatory upon Hampson as if served by the marshal. This was the opinion of Chancellor Wythe, in the case of Davis v. Fulton.

February 28. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

The questions intended to be submitted to the court were, 1st. Whether the marshal was bound to serve this process as soon as he reasonably could; and, 2d. *Whether the [192 service of such process would have made Hampson liable in case he had paid over the money after such service. On these points the court has no doubt. But the case is imperfectly stated. It does not appear that the plaintiff has sustained any loss by the neglect of the officer to serve the process, and for this reason

The judgment is affirmed.

KORN AND WISEMILLER v. THE MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY AGAINST FIRE ON BUILDINGS OF THE STATE OF VIRGINIA.

The separation of Alexandria from Virginia did not affect existing contracts between individuals. The insurance upon buildings in Alexandria did not cease by the separation, although the company could only insure houses in Virginia. The obligation of the insured to contribute, does not cease in consequence of his forfeiture of his own insurance by his own neglect. All the members of the company are bound by the act of the majority. No member can devest himself of his obligations as such, but according to the rules of the society.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

This was a motion, in the court below, in the name of the principal agent of the Mutual Assurance Society for judgment against Korn & Wisemiller for 116 dollars, "being the amount due from them for a half quota under a declaration for insurance made to the society with 6 per cent. interest thereon from the first day of June, 1805."

The court below gave judgment according to the motion, and the defendants brought their writ of error.

This society was incorporated by the legislature of Virginia, by an act passed on the 22d of December, 1794, entitled "An act for establishing a Mutual Assurance Society against fire on buildings in this state."

The principles of the society are declared to be, "That the citizens of this state may insure their buildings against the losses and damages occasioned accidentally by fire; and that the insured pay the losses and expenses, each his share according to the sum insured."

193*] *The act provides that the rules and regulations which should be concluded upon by a majority of the subscribers at the first meeting, should be binding on all those who should insure their property in that society; and that a majority of the society might at any time alter and amend the rules and regulations as they should judge necessary. That certain premiums should be agreed upon to be paid by the insured to constitute a fund to pay losses. And that if that fund should not be sufficient, a "repartition" among the insured should be made, and each should pay on demand of the cashier his share according to the sum insured and the rate of hazard. It also provides that the property insured should be bound for the payment, and for that purpose might be sold. That such quotas when called for should be advertised, and when any person should neglect to pay his quota, his insurance should cease until it should be paid. If the property should be sold, the purchaser was to become a subscriber in lieu of the vendor. The subscribers might be compelled to pay the premiums, on request of the cashier, with 6 per cent. interest to the day of payment.

By a subsequent act, passed in December, 1795, it was enacted, "That the said subscribers, a majority of them in person or by deputation being present, or a majority of the sum subscribed, when any meeting shall be held, being there represented, shall have power and authority to proceed and act in all matters and things in the first recited act mentioned, in as full, absolute, and unlimited a manner as they might or could do if all and every of the said subscribers were actually present and attending at any such meeting."

By an act passed the 12th of January, 1799, it is enacted. "That the said mutual insurance society shall have full power to recover the whole, or any part of such premiums or quotas as are, or may hereafter become, due from any delinquent subscriber or member, under his subscription or declaration for insurance made to the said society, on motion of the cashier of the society before the court of the county, or the court of the district wherein such delin-

194*] quent may reside, ten *days' notice of such motion being previously given; and such court shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine such motion, and to cause their judgment to be enforced with costs by any legal execution; saving to any person, against whom a motion shall be made, the right of a trial by jury, if he shall desire it."

By an act passed the 27th of January, 1803, it is enacted, "That the said society may insure buildings in the county of Alexandria, provided Congress shall pass a law subjecting those who declare for insurance in that society to the provisions and regulations of the laws of Virginia, which are already, or may hereafter be, passed concerning the said society. The act to commence and be in force as soon as Congress shall pass a law subjecting the citizens of the county of Alexandria who shall hereafter subscribe for insurance in the said society, to the same mode of recovery in the court of the county of Alexandria as is now allowed and granted by the laws of this commonwealth against defaulting subscribers residing within this state."

On the 3d of March, 1803, Congress passed such an act as was contemplated by the legislature of Virginia.

On the 29th of January, 1805, Virginia passed an act, the preamble to which recites, that it had been represented on the part of the society that such a change in their constitution as would separate the interests of the inhabitants of the towns from the interests of the inhabitants of the country, is essential to the "equalization" of the risks, and that the same had been agreed upon at a general annual meeting of the society. It therefore enacts, that the funds should be divided between the towns and the country, in proportion to the capital subscribed by the towns and country respectively, and that the town funds should be only liable for town losses, and country funds for country losses. That during the year 1805, all the valuations of houses insured should be revised, and no loss paid but according to such revaluation subject to a deduction of one-fifth thereof; "and where such revaluation shall exceed the former valuation, an additional premium shall be paid."

*That "it shall be lawful for any [195 member of this society to withdraw from the same, on giving six weeks' previous notice, and upon paying all arrearages due at the time of withdrawing."

"That all debts due, or to become due, to the society may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered in the name of the society in the same manner, in the same courts, and upon the same principles as they may now be sued for, &c., except that the name of the cashier need not be used. That the agents, &c., shall perform the duties required from agents by the 19th article of the rules and regulations now in force."

By the 19th article of the rules and regulations of the society adopted and in force prior to the 29th of January, 1805, the duties of an agent were "to act for the society agreeably to the constitution, to apply to the house owners of their respective counties, explain the plan to them, make out the declarations of insurance, procure the certificate of the majority of three respectable house owners (of whom the county agent may be one) of the valuation of the buildings, transmit the declarations, property executed, to the principal agent, and correspond with him on what may be necessary to be done."

The plaintiffs in error made their declaration for insurance in the usual form under seal, and thereby promised that they would "abide by, observe and adhere to, the constitution, rules and regulations which were already established, or might thereafter be established, by a majority of the assured present in person, or by representatives, or by a majority of the property insured, represented either by the persons themselves or their proxy, duly authorized, or their deputy, as established by law, at any general meeting to be holden by the assnranee society, or which were, or thereafter might be, established by the president and directors of the society."

In consequence of this declaration, the plaintiffs in error paid the original premium of 196] insurance and obtained *a policy. The society demanded a half quota; "that is to say, for the payment as it existed on the 25th of February, 1805, of a sum equal to one half of the original premium, which half quota was required to be paid on the 1st of April, 1805, and is the sum for which judgment is now claimed."

By the 14th article of the original rules and regulations of the society, it is provided, that, "In every period of seven years from the commencement of this institution, there shall be new declarations and valuations for insuranee upon buildings insured by this society, and whoever fails to renew his declarations and valuations for the space of three months from the expiration of each term of seven years, shall cease to enjoy the benefits of his assurance till such new declarations are made; should the valnation be less than before, the assured shall have no right to demand of the society the difference of the premiums, but it shall remain for the benefit of the society, and in case of any loss the insured are always to be paid according to the last valnatiou."

Korn & Wisemiller did not, within three months after the expiration of the first term of seven years, renew their declaration and valuation, and thereby ceased to enjoy the benefit of their insurance.

The town and county of Alexandria, in which these buildings were situated, was, until the 27th of February, 1801, a part of the state of Virginia, since which day they have constituted a part of the District of Columbia. The plaintiffs have always been inhabitants of the town of Alexandria ever since the year 1789.

On the 25th of December, 1795, the society commenced the operations of the institution.

In pursuance of the act of Virginia of the 29th of January, 1805, a separation of the interests of the inhabitants of the towns from the interests of the inhabitants of the country, has been made in the manner expressed in the 1st, 197] 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th sections. *The new constitution in that act contained went into operation on the 30th of Jannary, 1805.

The plaiutiffs iu error made a declaration of revaluation of the property insured by them, which declaration was under their seals, and was produced and made in consequence of the representations of the agent of the society, who stated that the plaintiffs in error were bound by their former declaration, and by the rules and regulations of the society, so to do.

C. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That they were not members of the company on the 25th of February, 1805, when the demand was made.

By the cession of the District of Columbia to the United States, the town of Alexandria ceased to be in Virginia, so that the plaintiffs in error were not Virginians, nor was their property in Virginia, and one of the fundamental articles of the charter would thus be violated if the property should continue to be insnred.

By accepting the new charter the old was dissolved, and no person could be a member of the new company unless by a new declaration, and by accepting a new policy.

2. That the revaluation, and new declaration did not bind the plaintiffs in error, because it was made under a misrepresentation made by the agent of the society; and it is immaterial whether it were a misrepresentation as to the fact or as to the law.

By the charter the assured only were to be considered as members of the company. When a person ceased to be assured he ceased to be a member, and was no longer liable to new calls. If the property of Korn & Wisemiller had been destroyed by fire after the 27th of February, 1801 (the day of the separation of Alexandria from Virginia), the society would not have been liable; Korn & Wisemiller, therefore, cannot be liable for a share of the losses which have happened *since that time. It [198 was a fundamental principle of the charter, that the insurance should be mutual.

The act of Congress of the 27th of February, 1801, which adopts the laws of Virginia as the laws of that part of the District of Colnmbia, does not aid the society, for the law of Virginia authorized insurance to be made upon houses in Virginia only. Any person might withdraw from the company by refusing to pay a quota, or by refusing to accept a policy.

Swann, contra.

The original charter gave the majority of the members a right to bind the residue, as well by alterations in the charter itself, as by rules, by-laws and regulations; a majority could accept a new charter, and thereby bind all the members.

The cession of the District of Columbia did not destroy private rights; it only changed the political relation of the inhabitants.

No person could withdraw from the company otherwise than by the mode pointed out in the act of Virginia, after giving the notice prescribed. The snspension of the insurance of a person refusing or neglecting to pay his quota, is a mere penalty, he does not cease to be a member, he still remains liable for his share of the losses, notwithstanding the suspension of his own insurance.

If there was a misrepresentation by the agent of the society, it was a misrepresentation of a principle of law which the plaintiffs in error were bound to know as well as the agent. They were members of the company, and ought to have known all the obligations they contracted as such. (Fonb. Eq., 108; Doct. & Stud., 1, 46, 309; Woodd., 608; Buller, 31.)

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This cause comes up from the Circuit Court of Alexandria, *in which a summary [199 judgment has been given for the recovery of a contributiou demanded of the members of the Mutual Assurance Society conformably to its by-laws.

The plaintiffs here contest their liability upon several grounds.

1. Because, by the separation of Alexandria from the state of Virginia, they virtually ceased to be members of the institution.

2. That, by having omitted to revalue within seven years, they were no longer insured, and, of consequence, not liable to contribute.

3. That, by the alteration of the charter in 1805, their security and liability became so materially changed as to discharge them from their contract.

4. That their revaluation in 1805 ought not to be obligatory upon them, because they were deluded into it by false or incorrect suggestions.

5. That they are not liable, under the description of persons who had insured prior to 1804, as they ought to be considered only as having insured at the time of their revaluation.

On the first of these points the court are of opinion, that the separation of Alexandria from the state of Virginia could have no effect upon existing contracts of individuals. Such divisions of territory are entirely political; a separation of jurisdiction takes place, but private interests and private contracts remain unaffected, and every individual relation continues the same, except that of being associated under the same government. The circumstance that the law of Virginia has limited the company to the bounds of the state, in performing its functions, could only prevent them from making new contracts subsequent to the separation, and until they had received additional powers, 200] *but could not release them from their liability to individuals with whom they had previously contracted. Nor can the circumstance of the members of the legislature being authorized to represent their respective counties, affect the case; for, although the Alexandria property could no longer be represented in that mode, there was nothing to prevent their appearing in person, or by proxy, at the meetings of the company.

The court are further of opinion, that all the other grounds assumed by the plaintiffs are equally untenable. Although, at the first view, it would appear reasonable that he who is not insured is not bound to contribute, yet there may exist strong reasons why, under the peculiar organization of this company, a different rule should be adopted; and certain it is that the individual may, by his own act, subject himself to such a state of things. The liability of the members of this institution is of a twofold nature. It results both from an obligation to conform to the laws of their own making, as members of the body politic, and from a particular assumption or declaration which every individual signs on becoming a member. The latter is remarkably comprehensive. "We will abide by, observe and adhere to, the constitution, rules and regulations which are already established, or may hereafter be established, by a majority of the insured present in person, or by representatives, or by the majority of the property insured, represented either by the persons themselves or their proxy, duly authorized, or their deputy, as established by law, at any general meeting to be held by the said assurance society, or which are, or may hereafter be, established by the president and directors of the society." It would be difficult to find words of more extensive signification than these, or better calculated to aid, explain, and enforce the general principle, that the majority of a corporate body must have power to bind its individuals. It is true that the words of this declaration, as well as the general power of a corporate body, must be restricted by the nature and object of its institution; but apply this rule to the case before us, and it cannot avail the plaintiffs, for both the rule which suspends the security *and the alteration [201 made in its constitution, under a vote of the majorty, are strictly conformable to the general objects for which the company was instituted.

We are of opinion that while Korn & Wiseminer continued members of the society, they remain subject to the general liability which that state imposes; and that, after becoming members, their ceasing to be so must be determined by the rules of the society, which rules, as far as we are at present advised, admit of only two cases; one is, where the house insured is consumed by fire, and the other, upon giving the notice, and conforming to the other regulations imposed by the by-laws.

It is observable that the rule which imposes the necessity of a septennial valuation of the property insured, does not contemplate a total rescission or annihilation of the contract; on the contrary, it is express in declaring that, upon a revaluation being made, the party shall continue insured by virtue of his former policy. We, therefore, consider this suspension of his security merely as a penalty imposed upon the member for neglecting to conform to a rule of the society. And it is certainly much more reasonable that he should be subject to a loss or inconvenience for his own neglect than that he should be released from his liability to the society, in consequence of it.

As to what is contended to be a material alteration in their charter, we consider it merely as a new arrangement or distribution of their funds; and whether just or unjust, reasonable or unreasonable, beneficial or otherwise, to all concerned, was certainly a mere matter of speculation, proper for the consideration of the society, and which no individual is at liberty to complain of, as he is bound to consider it as his own individual act. Every member, in fact, stands in the peculiar situation of being party of both sides, insurer and insured. Certainly the general submission which they have signed will cover their liability to submit to this alteration.

*The view which we have taken [202 of this subject affords an answer to the fifth ground, and, in a great measure, to the fourth.

We consider the insured, upon every revaluation, as in under his former right of membership, and, of consequence, that the plaintiffs come under the description of persons who had insured before 1804; and, for the same reason, the representation of Scott (could any effect at all be given to the circumstances to which he testifies) was true, as to the membership of the plaintiffs, and as to their liability in that capacity. They must have known it was a question of law on which Scott possessed no power to commit the society, and on which the plaintiffs themselves ought to have been as well informed as any other individual.

Judgment affirmed.

ATKINSON
v.
THE MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY AGAINST FIRE, ON BUILDINGS OF THE STATE OF VIRGINIA.

The additional premium upon a revaluation under the rules of the society, is only upon the excess.

THIS case differed from the case of Korn & Wisemiller v. The Mutual Assurance Society; that being for a half quota, and this for the additional premium upon a revaluation, under the 7th section of the act of 1805. (See Virginia Laws, v. 2, App., 81.)

The question (which was submitted without argument) was, whether the additional premium should be charged on the whole sum at which the buildings were revalued, or only on the excess between the old and new valuation.

JOHNSON, J. The court is of opinion that the rule on the subject of premium imposes the additional premium only on the excess of the revaluation beyond the former valuation.

Judgment reversed.

v.
SHIP HELEN.

A vessel having violated a law of the United States, cannot be seized for such violation, after the law has expired, unless some special provision be made therefor by statute.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the District Court of the United States for the District of New Orleans, which dismissed the libel.

The ship Helen, a vessel of the United States, during the existence of the act of Congress of the 28th of February, 1806, "to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain ports of the island of St. Domingo, had traded with one of the prohibited ports, contrary to that act. The act was suffered to expire on the 25th of April, 1808. Afterwards, to wit, on the 20th of September, 1808, she was seized, on account of that violation of the act, by the collector of the port of New Orleans; but the libel was dismissed by the judge, on the ground that the law had expired.

The United States appealed.

The case was now submitted without argument; and upon the authority of the case of ————, at last term,

The sentence was affirmed.

STEWART v. ANDERSON.

In an action in Virginia by the assignee of a negotiable promissory note against the maker, the latter may set off a negotiable note of the assignor which he held at the time of receiving notice of the assignment of his own note, although the note thus set off was not due at the time of the notice, but became due before the note upon which the suit was brought.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Stewart, the indorsee of a promissory note, brought his action of debt, under the statute of Virginia, against Anderson, the maker. The note was made payable to W. Hodgson, and by him assigned to Stewart. It *was dated [*204 the 25th of April, 1807, and payable 180 days after date, for 330 dollars and 56 cents.

The defendant pleaded,

1. Nil debet; and,

2. That at the time the note became due, and before the defendant had notice of the assignment thereof to the plaintiff by W. Hodgson, the latter became, and now is, indebted to the defendant in the sum of 566 dollars and 67 cents, by note dated the 29th of June, 1807, and payable 60 days after its date. That the defendant has been, and still is, ready and doth offer to set off against the money due from him by the note mentioned in the declaration, so much of the 566 dollars and 67 cents, as will be and is sufficient to discharge all that is due and owing from him for and on account of the note in the declaration mentioned.

Upon the trial in the court below the jury found a special verdict, which states, that Hodgson transferred to the plaintiff the note in the declaration mentioned; and afterwards, on the 14th of August, 1807, for the first time informed the defendant that the note was transferred, but did not say to whom. At the time of that information, the defendant held a note of W. Hodgson, dated the 29th of June, 1807, for 566 dollars and 67 cents, which was given for a full and valuable consideration, and payable 60 days after date. When the defendant was informed of the transfer of the note he made no reply. The jury finally conclude by saying that they "find for the defendant, provided the court are of opinion that the verbal notice given by Hodgson to the defendant, on the 14th of August, of the transfer of the note in the declaration mentioned, was not sufficient to bar the defendant's right of offsetting his aforesaid note of 566 dollars and 67 cents, against the plaintiff's note in the declaration mentioned. But should the court be of opinion that the said notice was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the money in the declaration mentioned, as against the defendant, then they find for the plaintiff," &c.

*Upon this special verdict the judg- [*205 ment of the court below was for the defendant; and the plaintiff brought his writ of error.

Youngs, for the plaintiff in error, contended, that the note offered in discount was not a good set-off, because it was not payable at the time the defendant had notice of the assignment.

The act of assembly of Virginia (P. P. 36) provides, that "assignments of bonds, bills, and promissory notes, and other writings obligatory, for payment of money or tobacco, shall be valid; and an assignee of any such may thereupon maintain an action of debt, in his own name, but shall allow all just discounts, not only against himself, but against the assignor, before notice of the assignment was given to the defendant."

Under this act of assembly it must be a just discount before notice; this could not be a just discount until it became payable. Money cannot be offset before it be due.

The act of assembly was not intended to embrace commercial cases. If it did, it would destroy the negotiability of notes, and all credit and confidence in mercantile transactions.

The court stopped E. J. Lee, contra.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. If Hodgson's note had not been payable till after Andersou's, it would have been a different case; but being payable before Anderson's, and holden by Anderson before notice, it is such an offset as he might avail himself of at the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

206*] *THE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY OF ALEXANDRIA

v.

HODGSON.

The refusal of an inferior court to allow a plea to be amended, or a new plea to be filed, or to grant a new trial, or to continue a cause, cannot be assigned as error.

After a cause is remanded to the inferior court, such court may receive additional pleas, or admit amendments to those already filed, even after the Appellate Court has decided such pleas to be bad upon demurrer.

In an action of covenant on a policy under seal, all special matter of defense must be pleaded. Under the plea of covenants performed, the defendant cannot give evidence which goes to vacate the policy.

In order to prove the condemnation of a vessel it is only necessary to produce the libel and sentence.

It is a useless practice to read the proceedings at length. The depositions stated in such proceedings are not evidence in an action upon the policy of insurance.

In an action upon a valued policy, it is not competent for the underwriters to give parol evidence that the real value of the subject insured is different from that stated in the policy.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia.

The former judgment of the court below in this cause, in favor of the now plaintiffs in error, having been reversed in this court, and the cause sent back for the trial of the issues of fact,[1] the plaintiffs in error, before the cause could be regularly called for trial according to the rules and practice of the court, moved the court below for leave to amend the pleadings by adding to the former eight pleas, a ninth and a tenth plea, in the words followiug:

9th plea. And the said defendants, by their attorney aforesaid, by leave of the court, and by virtue of the statutes in such cases made and provided, for further plea in this behalf say, that the said plaintiff ought not to have aud maintain his action aforesaid against them, because they say, that the said Marine Insurance Company (by the act of assembly of Virginia incorporating said compauy, which act of assembly they now bring here into court) are authorized to make rules and regulations for the conducting the business of the said corporation, and that one of their said rules and regulations requires that every order for insurance shall be made in writing, and shall contain the uame of the vesscl and master, the place from whence and to which insurance is required to be made, with as full a deseription of the vessel and voyage as can be given thereof, and especially as to her age, tonnage and equipment, and that it was always and is the practice of the said insurance company to make no insurance upon the body of a ship, her tackle, apparel and furniture, beyond the reasonable value thereof according to the representation and description given thereof as to her age, tonnage and equipment, which rule and praetice dimiuishes the risks of insurance in regard *to losses contrived, designed, effected [*207 and concealed by the insured when they are greatly over insured; and that the said rule and practice was, at the time of making and concluding the contract aforesaid in the declaration mentioned, well known to each of the said parties making the said contract; and that to induce them, the said defendants, to sign, seal and deliver the aforesaid policy of insurance, thereby insuring to the value of eight thousaud dollars upon the body, tackle, apparel and other furniture of the brigantine Hope aforesaid, he, the said plaintiff, in effecting the said poliey on the 30th of September, in the year 1799, at the county aforesaid, stated and represented that the said brigantiue in the month of July, in the year last meutioued, was a stout, well built vessel of about 250 tous burden, in good order, aud well found in sails, rigging, &c., built in Massachusetts, and from six to seven years old, and requested an insurance upon the said brigautine, her tackle, apparel and furniture, rating her value at the sum of 10,000 dollars for the voyage in the declaration mentioned at the commeucement of the risks to be insured. And the plaintiff represented to the defendants on the same 30th day of September, in the year 1799, at the county aforesaid, that the said brigantine, her tackle, apparel and furniture, were of the value of 10,000 dollars, at the time the risks of the voyage to be insured by the contract aforesaid, would commenee; and the defendants aver, that in cousequenee of the said representation, and placing full faith and credit therein, they were induced to sign, seal and deliver, and did sign, seal and deliver the said policy of insurance on the said 30th day of September, in the year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, to the plaintiff, thereby agreeing in the said policy to fix the value of the said brigantine, her tackle and apparel and other furniture, at the sum of 10,000 dollars, and thereby insuring to the amount of 8,000 dollars for the voyage aforesaid, upon the said brigantine, her tackle, apparel and furniture. And the said defendants further aver, that the said brigantine Hope was not, in the month of July, in the year aforesaid, or at any time, a well built vessel of the burden of about 250 tons, and was *not from six to seven years [*208 old in the said month of July, in the year aforesaid, but was much older than from six to seven years old in the said month of July, in the said year, that is to say, more than eight and a half years old, and had been ill built in the year 1790, in the province of Maine, in Massachusetts, and thereafter was raised upon and rebuilt; that the valuc of the said brigantine, her tackle, apparel and furuiture, was never at any time whatever equal to one-half the said sum of 8,000 dollars. And the defendants say that the differencc aforesaid between the true built, age, tonnage and value of the said ship, and the aforesaid represcnted built, age, tonnage and value thereof was material in regard to the risks of the voyage in the said policy of insurance mentioned, and this they are ready to verify; wherefore they pray judgment, &c.

10th plea. And the said defendants by their attorney aforesaid, by leave of the court and of the statutes in such cases made and provided, for further plea in this behalf say, that the said plaintiff ought not to have or maintain his action aforesaid against them, because they say that the said policy of insurance was had and obtained of them by means of the fraud of the said George F. Straas in the declaration mcntioned, with intent to deceive and defraud the said defendants of a large sum of money, that is to say, of the difference between the just and fair value of the said brigantine, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the sum of 8,000 dollars intended to be insured by the said policy, which difference exceeded one-half the sum last mentioned, that is to say, exceeded 4,000 dollars, and this they are ready to verify; wherefore they pray judgment, &c.

But the court below refused to permit the pleadings to be so amended, in consequence of which the cause went to trial upon the three issues of fact which had already been joined, viz.:

1. That the defendants "have well and truly [*209 done *and performed all things they by the said policy of insurance were bound to perform."

2. That the brigantine Hope "was not taken and seized by certain British vessels and carried into Jamaica and there libeled, condemned and sold in manner and form as in the declaration is set forth;" and,

3. That the brigantine Hope was not, when she sailed from her last port in the island of St. Domingo, on the voyage insured, a good, sound, staunch, seaworthy ship, able to perform the voyage insured.

Upon the trial of these issues the defendants offered evidence of the facts stated in the ninth and tenth pleas, which the court rejected as inapplicable to either of the issues. To which refusal the defendants excepted.

The defendants also offered in mitigation of damages, evidence to prove that the vessel, at the time she sailed upon the voyage insured, was not worth one-half the sum insured, and that the high valuation in the policy was produced by an untrue and unfair representation, on the part of the insured, of the age, tonnage and built of the vessel, and that the misrepresentation in those respects was material to the contract of insurance, and thereupon prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they found the facts to be so, they ought not to take the valuation stated in the policy as the true value of the subject intended to be insured, but in assessing the damages of the plaintiff, they ought to take the just value of the said brig, &c., at the commencement of the risk insured, although all the issues of fact should be found for the plaintiff. Which instruction the court refused to give, having already instructed the jury, in case they should find the issues for the plaintiff, to reserve, for the decision of the court, the question as to the principle upon which the damages should be estimated and assessed. To which refusal the defendants also excepted.

The plaintiff, for the purpose of proving the libel *and condemnation in the declara- [*210 tion mentioned, produced and read to the jury, without objection at the time on the part of the defendants, a copy of the whole record and proceedings in the Vice-Admiralty Court at Jamaica, respecting which the counsel for the parties had entered into the following agreement, viz.: "The defendants waive all exceptions to the authentication of the record of the proceedings in admiralty concerning the condemnation of the brig Hope, but save every objection to the contents of the said record excepting the matter of authentication. The plaintiff admits, as evidence, the affidavit of Gibson & Evans."

After the reading of which, the defendants, in order to prove that the vessel was not, at the time of capture, in the due course of the voyage insured, and the condition she was then in, offered to read in evidence to the jury, from the said record of proceedings, a copy of the deposition of William Murray, taken in preparatorio, to be used in the said Court of Vice-Admiralty.

But the court instructed the jury that the said deposition of the said William Murray, so taken, is not competent evidence in this cause to prove the said facts. To which instruction the defendants excepted.

The plaintiff moved the court to direct the jury, that if, from the evidence, they find all the issues of fact for the plaintiff, then they should find their verdict in the following form, viz.: "We of the jury find all the issues of fact joined in this cause for the plaintiff, and do assess his damages by reason of the breach of covenant in the declaration mentioned, to the sum of ——. The amount of damages so assessed to be nevertheless subject to the opinion of the court upon the following point reserved, viz., if the value fixed in the policy, set out in the declaration be not conclusive upon the parties, and it be competent to the jury, under any of the issues of fact joined in this cause, to hear evidence concerning, and to inquire into the real value of the vessel in the said policy mentioned, so as to reduce the agreed value mentioned in the said policy, and *to estimate the plaintiff's damages ac- [*211 cording to such reduced value, as actually proved, then, and not otherwise, we assess the plaintiff's damages (in lieu of the sum above assessed) to the sum of ——. To which direction the defendants objected, and prayed the court if they gave the jury any instruction upon the subject, to direct them to find the smaller sum in damages, if the court should be of opinion that it was competent for the jury to hear evidence concerning the misrepresentation as to the age, built, and tonnage of the vessel.

But the court refused to give the instruction prayed by the defendants, having before refused to suffer the defendants to give evidence of misrepresentation by the plaintiff in obtaining the policy, under either of the issues of fact joined in this cause, to which refusal the defendants had taken a bill of exceptions. But the plaintiff having consented to permit the defendants to give evidence of the real value of the vessel at the time the risks insured commenced, (saving the objection to the competency of any parol evidence upon any of the said issues of fact, concerning the real value of the said subject insured,) the court directed the jury to find their verdict as prayed by the plaintiff.

To which refusal and instruction the defendants excepted.

The jury found a verdict in the form directed by the court, and filled the first blank with the sum of 11,452 dollars and 34 cents, and the other with the sum of 6,441 dollars and 71 cents.

The court, after consideration, rendered judgment for the largest sum, being of opinion that the value stated in the policy was conclusive between the parties.

The defendants brought their writ of error.

C. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error.

1. The court below ought to have permitted 212] the additional *pleas to be filed. When a cause is sent back from this court with a mandate "that such further and other proceedings be had in the said cause, as, according to right and justice and the laws of the United States, and agreeably to the judgment of the said Supreme Court, ought to be had," it is open to all amendments as if it were an original cause, and as if the former plea had been adjudged bad by the court below in the first instance.

Amendments are permitted, even after judgment upon demurrer, according to the discretion of the court. And this court will reverse the judgment of the court below, if it has not soundly exercised its discretion. (5 Term Rep., 112, Wilkins v. Despard; 7 Term Rep., 703, The King v. The Grantford Corporation; 1 Cranch, 117, Resler v. Shehee; 1 Wash., Downman v. Downman; 1 Burr., 317, 322; 1 Wash., 313; 4 Cranch, 433, Pollard v. Dwight.)

The 9th plea was different from any before offered. And it was not necessary that the plea of fraud should have been more specific. (3 Wentw., 414; 3 Dall., 321, Wiscart v. Dauchy; 1 Woodd., 207; 3 Co., 77, Ferrer's case.)

The court ought to have received evidence of fraud and misrepresentation upon the first issue, which was in the nature of a general issue. The plea might perhaps have been adjudged bad upon demurrer; but it is aided by the joinder of issue upon it, and everything which could show that the defendants were not bound by their covenant to do anything, was admissible upon this issue.

(System of Pleading, 321; 5 Com. Dig. tit. Pleader, E. pl. 37, C.; 5 Esp. Rep., 38.)

If the evidence was not directly admissible upon either of the issues, it ought still to have been received in mitigation of damages. The contract of insurance is only a contract for indemnity; and if, upon a total loss, the insured 213] receive the full value of the subject *insured, it is all that he can in equity and in good faith require. (4 Burr., 1966, Da Costa v. Perth; Cowp., 583, Grant v. Parkinson.)

In this very case this court has intimated an opinion that the misrepresentation might be a subject of consideration in inquiring of damages.

Upon a total loss, the value stated in the policy is only prima facie evidence. (Marshall, 110, 111, 199, 612, 701; 2 Atk., 554. Sadlers' Company v. Babcock.)

The court ought to have admitted the deposition of Murray to be read from the record of the vice-admiralty. By the British treaty the whole proceedings are made evidence.

The court also erred in rendering judgment upon the verdict for the larger sum. It was competent for the jury to hear evidence of the real value of the vessel, and to assess damages accordingly.

Swann, contra.

The court below committed no error in rejecting the 9th and 10th pleas. They were offered after the cause had been remanded from this court. There will be no end to delay if the party be permitted to amend after judgment against him upon a writ of error.

As a matter of discretion also, the court did right in rejecting the 9th plea. They ought not to have indulged the defendants with filing a plea at that late stage of the cause, which tendered the same issue which they had refused to join when tendered by the plaintiff in his replication to the 6th plea. Besides, the matter of the plea was covered by the implied warranty of seaworthiness; for if the facts stated in the plea were at all material, they must have been so only in regard to the ability of the vessel to perform the voyage. The substance of this plea was therefore included in the issue of seaworthiness.

The admission or rejection of a plea after an issue *is joined, is not an error for [214 which the judgment can be reversed. It is a mere matter of discretion; the party can have no legal ground to insist upon it. (7 Term Rep., 703.) The principle that this court will not reverse a judgment for a proceeding in the court below which was within its discretion, has been decided in regard to the continuance of causes, and the granting new trials.

If it be a case in which a writ of error lies, still no error was committed by the court in the exercise of its discretion in rejecting the 10th plea. It is not a direct allegation of fraud, nor does it aver that any damage was sustained by the defendants in consequence of the fraud. The plea is not sufficiently explicit in charging the fraud; it does not state in what particulars the fraud consisted. Neither of the pleas could be considered as a fair plea to the merits. They must have produced demurrers, and additional delay.

There was no error in rejecting the evidence of the facts stated in the 9th and 10th pleas, because there was no issue to which those facts could apply.

The plea that the defendants had performed all that they were bound to perform must be considered as an averment of a matter of fact, not of a matter of law. The only act which the defendants were bound to perform was to pay the money if a loss happened. The plea therefore amounts to an averment that they had paid the money.

There was no error in rejecting the copy of Murray's deposition, for it was not taken in the cause. The plaintiff had no opportunity to cross-examine him. It was entirely an ex parte proceeding.

There could be no error in the direction given by the court to the jury to find their damages in the alternative, or conditional manner; it is often done when a question of law is to be saved. It is a kind of special verdict. The error, if any, must have been in rendering the judgment for the largest sum.

215*] *The correctness of this judgment depends upon the question whether it was competent for the jury, upon either of the issues, to hear parol evidence of the value.

The policy was sealed, and subject to all the incidents of a sealed instrument at common law. The value agreed upon by the parties, under seal, cannot be denied by parol evidence. (4 Bac., 106; Salk., 276; 2 Burr., 1171, Lewis v. Rucker; 4 Burr., 2228, Lowe v. Peers.)

But even if it were a policy without seal, the agreed value in the policy would be conclusive. (Park, 104, 267, 1167.)

The agreed value is conclusive unless it appears to be a cover for a wager. An inquiry of the actual value is never made upon a valued policy but with a view to ascertain whether it be a wager policy. There is not an instance in the English books of the agreed value ever being reduced to a smaller sum. Upon a total loss, the agreed value is to be recovered, or nothing. If this be not the case, and you can go into the question of the actual value, every policy is reduced to an open policy.

Suppose a man should make a bad bargain, and purchase a vessel for 10,000 dollars, not worth 5,000. He insures, and it is agreed that the vessel shall be valued at 10,000 dollars. A total loss happens; shall he be obliged to receive only the value of the vessel to be ascertained by a jury?

This is like every other case of liquidated damages; it is conclusive between the parties.

As to plea of fraud, it was too vague. The precedent cited from Wentworth is against them; the vessel in that case was stated to have been fraudulently consumed by fire. The case from Dallas is not relevant. The case of Pollard and Dwight is against them. The court there refused to direct the amendment to be made. The case from 1 Wash., 313, was upon a special demurrer, and it was most clear that 216*] the *justice of the case required the amendment. It was a case clearly within the equity of the statute of jeofails. In the case from 7 Term Rep., 703, the court did give leave to amend under the statute of jeofails, but it was in the exercise of its discretion.

E. J. Lee, in reply.

Amendments may be made at any time, even after verdict, and for that purpose a new trial will be granted. (7 Term Rep., 132, Tompkinson v. Blacksmith; Str., 1151, 1162, Comb., 4; 3 Call, 522, Jude v. Syme; 2 Salk., 622.)

If the facts in the 9th plea would have vacated a policy not under seal, the court ought to have suffered them to be pleaded to a sealed instrument, especially after the 6th plea (which had been formerly adjudged good by the court below) had been rejected by this court. By that rejection the defendants were entirely shut out from the benefit of these facts upon the trial.

The misrepresentation was material to the risks of the voyage, and every such misrepresentation, whether fraudulently or innocently made, destroys the policy. (Marshall, 335.)

Fraud vitiates every contract, and may be examined into by a court of law. It has been decided that courts of equity have no jurisdiction of insurance cases. (3 Bro. Parl. Cas., 525, De Ghetoff v. The London Assurance Company.) The contract of insurance is founded upon the principles of equity, and governed in all its parts by plain justice and good faith.

In a court of law a defendant may show that the consideration of a bond is bad. (Collins v. Blantern, 2 Wils., 347; Guichard v. Roberts, 1 W. Bl., 445; 4 Dall., 269; Jenk., 254, pl. 45; 1 Burr., 396; 1 Term. Rep., 619, Winch v. Keely.)

In covenant the plaintiff can recover only such damages as he has actually sustained, and the defendant may *give in evidence [217 anything which shows that no damage has been sustained by reason of the breach of any covenant which the defendants were bound to perform. Evidence of fraud and misrepresentation went to show that the defendants were not bound to perform any of the covenants, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to damages. (2 Selwyn, 464.)

March 17. LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an action of covenant, on a policy of insurance, to which the defendants pleaded, 1. That they had performed all things which, by the policy, they were bound to perform; 2. That the vessel insured was not captured and condemned as in the declaration is mentioned; and, 3. That the vessel insured was not seaworthy; on which pleas issues were taken by the plaintiff.

There were, also, five special pleas, to which there were demurrers, all of which were allowed by the Circuit Court, except the one to the sixth plea, which, on a writ of error to this court, heretofore brought, was allowed here, and the cause then remanded to the Circuit Court, for further proceedings to be had therein. On the return of the cause to the Circuit Court, the defendants moved for leave to file two additional pleas; which motion was denied, and is now relied on as one of the errors for which the present judgment should be reversed.

This court does not think that the refusal of an inferior court to receive an additional plea, or to amend one already filed, can ever be assigned as error. This depends so much on the discretion of the court below, which must be regulated more by the particular circumstances of every case, than by any precise and known rule of law, and of which the superior court *can never become fully possess- [218 ed, that there would be more danger of injury in revising matters of this kind than what might result now and then from an arbitrary or improper exercise of this discretion. It may be very hard not to grant a new trial, or not to continue a cause, but in neither case can the party be relieved by a writ of error; nor is the court apprised that a refusal to amend or to add a plea was ever made the subject of complaint in this way. The court, therefore, does not feel itself obliged to give any opinion on the conduct of the inferior court, in refusing to receive these pleas. At the same time, it has no difficulty in saying that, even in that stage of the proceedings, the Circuit Court might, if it had thought proper, have received these additional pleas, or admitted of any amendment in those already filed.

The court below having refused to receive these pleas, the trial proceeded on the three on which issues were joined; and the defendants offered, under them, or some of them, to prove that it was one of the rules of their office, that every order for insuranee shall contain as full a description as can be giveu of the age, tonnage, and equipment of the vessel; and that it was always their practice to make no insurance on a vessel beyond her reasonable value, according to the representation given of her age, tonnage, and equipment; and that such rule was known to the plaintiff; and that, to induce them to insure eight thousand dollars on the brig Hope, the plaintiff represented her as a stout, well built vessel of about 250 tons burden, and from six to seven years old, and that she was worth ten thousand dollars; in consequence of which they insured her for eight thousand dollars; that, on the contrary, she was not a well built vessel of 250 tons burden, and was not from six to seven years old, but was more than eight and a half years old, and had been ill built; and that this difference between her true and her represented built, age, and tonnage, was material to the risks of the voyage insured. This evidence, being objected to, was deemed inadmissible; and this court is now called on to say whether, in this opinion, there was any error.

219*] *However desirable it may be to admit in evidence, on the general issue in an action of covenant on a policy of insurance, everything which may avoid the coutract, or lessen the damages, as is done in actions on the case, this court does not know that it possesses the power of changing the law of pleading, or to admit of evidence inconsistent with the forms which it has prescribed. No rule on this subject is more inflexible than that, in actions on deeds, all special matter of defense must be pleaded. Of this rule it is very certain, from a mere inspection of the record, that the defendants caunot allege ignorance. If everything, then, which is relied on to avoid a contract under seal, must be pleaded, it will at once be conceded that none of the matter offered in evidence applied to either of the pleas. The defendants could not thus set up an excuse for not doing that which, by one of the pleas, they professed to have done; and, as to the other pleas, which denied the capture and seaworthiness of the vessel, it will not be pretended that any of this matter supported either of them. The same remarks apply to the second and third bills of exeeption. Neither fraud nor misrepresentation, as to the value of the vessel, or her age, or tonnage, could be received in evidence, under either of these issues, no more than infancy or coverture, on a plea of non est factum; for, most certainly, none of the matters here offered by the defendants, the rejection of which occasioned these exceptions, went, in any degree, to prove either of the pleas on which issue had been joined.

The fourth exception is to the refusal of the court to admit the deposition of William Murray, which appeared among the admiralty proceedings, and which was offered by the defendants to prove that the vessel was not in the due course of her voyage when she was captured, and the condition she was in, at the time of capture. As the defendants have not, in either of their pleas, relied on a deviation, it may be doubted whether any evidence of that fact were admissible; but, if it were proper, for the purpose of discrediting any testimony which had beeu offered by the plaintiff, to show where the Hope had been taken, it is not thought that *the Circuit Court erred in instructing [220 the jury that the deposition of Murray was not competent evidence to prove that fact. If all the proceedings in the admiralty had been read by the plaintiff without any previous agreement, on the part of the defeudants, to save every objection to their conteuts, excepting the matter of authentication, the court will not say that the defendants might not have insisted on using any deposition, among the papers, which made in their favor; but, as the plaintiff could have read them for no other purpose than to prove the libel and condemation, and must have attempted to prove no other fact by them, for which purpose it is expressly stated that they were offered, and as the defendants had, by their agreement, explicitly reserved to themselves every objection to their contents, it does not appear reasonable to permit them, to select a deposition, as evidence for them, while the plaiutiff could not have made use of that, or any other, if ever so favorable to himself. The Circuit Court, therefore, did not err in the iustruction which it gave to the jury on this subject. This court cannot forbear remarking here, that it can never be necessary, in order to prove a condemnation, to produce anything more than the libel and sentence; although it is a frequeut but useless practice to read the proceedings at length.

The fifth exception is taken to a refusal of the Circuit Court to direct the jury to find damages for the value of the vessel, as agreed in the policy, and, conditionally, for her actual value, if, in the opinion of the court, it was competent for the jury, under any of the issues joined, to inquire into the real value of the vessel. As it had already been decided, and, as this court thinks, correctly, to receive no evidence of the real value of the vessel, there was no error in refusing to give this directiou; and, although the plaintiff, at length, consented to permit the defendants to give evidence of the real value of the vessel, saving objections to the competency of such evidence, upon any of the issues of fact, and the jury, thereupon, found conditional damages, this court is of opinion that, as evidence of the real value of the vessel, under any of these issues, was incompetent, and as objections to its competency *were [221 saved to the plaintiff, the Circuit Court did right in giving judgment for the damages found by the jury, according to the value of the vessel, fixed in the policy; which judgment this court affirms with costs.

SLACUM v. POMERY.

In an action by the indorsee against the indorser of a foreign bill of exchange, the defendant is liable for damages according to the law of the place where the bill was indorsed.

The indorsement is a new and substantive contract.

In an action of debt against the indorser of a bill of exchange, under the statute of Virginia, it is necessary that the declaration should aver notice of the protest for non-payment.

It is not too late to allege, as error, in the appellate court, a fault in the declaration which ought to have prevented the rendition of a judgment in the court below.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in Alexandria, in an action of debt (under the law of Virginia), brought by Pomery against Slacum, as indorser of a bill of exchange, dated the 6th of August, 1807, drawn in the island of Barbadoes by Charles Cadogan, a merchant residing there, at 60 days' sight, upon Barton, Irlam & Higginson, at Liverpool, in England, for 138*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, sterling, payable to Slacum or order, who indorsed it, at Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the plaintiff.

The declaration was "of a plea that he render unto him one hundred and thirty-eight pounds, seventeen shillings and ninepence sterling money of Great Britain, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum, from the 23d day of December, eighteen hundred and seven, until paid, together with fifteen per cent. damages on the said one hundred and thirty-eight pounds, seventeen shillings and ninepence, and ten shillings and sixpence sterling, of the value of two dollars and thirty-three cents, current money of the United States, costs of protest, which to him he owes," &c.

It then stated the making and indorsing of the bill, the non-acceptance and non-payment, and the protest for non-payment, "by reason of which premises, and by force of the statute in that case made and provided, action hath accrued to the plaintiff to demand and have of the defendant the said sum of 138*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* sterling, and interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, from the 23d of December, 1807, until paid, *together with fifteen per [*222 cent. damages, and ten shillings and sixpence sterling, of the value," &c.

Upon the trial of the cause on the issue of nil debet, the defendant below took a bill of exceptions, stating that evidence was offered of the bill, the indorsement by the defendant to the plaintiff in Alexandria (both parties being inhabitants of that town), the protest for non-payment, and that, by the laws of Barbadoes, the damages, upon protested bills of exchange, were only ten per cent. upon the principal and interest due upon the bill. Whereupon the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover more than the damages allowed upon protested bills according to the law of Barbadoes, and that he was not entitled in this case to fifteen per cent. damages, which instruction the court refused to give.

The verdict and judgment being for the plaintiff, for the whole amount demanded in the declaration, the defendant brought his writ of error.

The act of assembly of Virginia (P. P., 113,) provides, "that where any bill of exchange is or shall be drawn for the payment of any sum of money, in which the value is or shall be expressed to be received, and such bill is or shall be protested for non-acceptance or non-payment, the drawer or indorser shall be subject to fifteen per centum damages thereon, and the bill shall carry an interest of five per centum per annum, from the date of protest, until the money therein drawn for shall be fully satisfied and paid." "And that it shall be lawful for any person or persons having a right to demand any sum of money upon a protested bill of exchange to commence and prosecute an action of debt for principal, damages, interest and charges of protest, against the drawers or indorsers jointly, or against either of them separately; and judgment shall and may be given for such principal, damages and charges, and interest upon such principal, after the rate

NOTE.—The general principle adopted by civilized nations is, that the nature, validity, effect and interpretation of contracts, including notes, are to be governed by the laws of the country where the contracts are made, or are to be performed. But the remedies are to be governed by the laws of the country where the suit is brought.

A note made, dated, and payable at some place in New York, is, on the question of usury, to be treated as a New York contract, and governed by the laws of New York, although negotiated in a foreign country, at a rate lawful there, but usurious in New York, and is invalid. Swann, for the plaintiff in error, conteuded,

1. That the damages must be according to the law of the place where the bill was drawn.

2. That it was uot averred iu the declaratiou that the defendaut had notice of the protest for non-payment. And although this might have been taken advantage of iu the court below in arrest of judgment, yet it was also a fatal objection upon a writ of error. The record does not show that the plaiutiff was eutitled to his judgment. (Doug., 679.)

Youngs, contra.

This is not an action upon the custom of merchants, but upon the statute of Virginia.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. It has never been doubted in Virginia, that uotice is as necessary in an action upon the statute as upou the custom of merchants.

Youngs. There was no motion in arrest of judgment. This objection was not taken iu the court below.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. There can be no doubt that anything appearing upon the record, which would have been fatal upon a motion in arrest of judgmeut is equally fatal upon a writ of error.

Youngs. This court, in the case of Mandeville v. Riddle (1 Cranch, 290), decided, that an action by a holder of a promissory note against an indorser is only by reason of the value received, and yet in the case of Wilson v. Codman (3 Crauch, 193, 208), this court decided that the averment of value received was an immaterial averment, and need not be proved.

In our case if uotice were uecessary to enti-
224*] tle the *plaintiff to a verdict, it will be presumed, after verdict, that notice was proved.

The statute upon which this action is founded does not require notice. The declaration avers all that the statute requires to constitute a cause of actiou. The want of notice is only to be taken advantage of by the defendant in his defense at the trial. The time of bringing this action shows that reasouable notice was giveu. This court has decided that it is not neccssary to give notice of a protest for non-acceptance.

As to the question of damages. The law of the place where the contract was made must prevail. The contract of the defendant as indorser, was made in Alexandria. Every indorsement creates a uew contract, and is in the nature of a new bill.

March 5. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

Upon a critical examiuation of the act of assembly on which this action is founded, the court is of opinion that it is rightly brought. Although the drawer of the bill was not liable to the damages of Virginia, the indorser is subject to them, he having indorsed the bill in Alexandria. The words of the act are, that where a bill of exchange shall be protested, "the drawer or indorser shall be subject to 15 per cent. damages thereon." The third section gives an action of debt "against the drawers or indorsers jointly, or against either of them separately. The act of assembly appears to contemplate a distinct liability iu the indorser, founded on the contract created by his own indorsement, which is not affected by the extent of the liability of the drawer. This is the more reasonable, as a bill of exchange is taken as much on the credit of the indorser as of the drawer; and the indorsement is understood to be not simply the transfer of the paper, but a new and a substantive contract.

*There is, however, an objection [*225 taken to this declaration. It omits to allege notice of the protest; an omissiou which is deemed fatal.

It has been argued that the act of assembly, which gives the actiou of debt, not requiring notice to be laid in the declaration, that requisite, which is only essential in au action founded on the custom of merchants, is totally dispensed

Bills of exchange drawn at Boston by G to his own order, upon defendant, (a resident of N. Y.,) at, and accepted payable at 107 West St., New York, were negotiated in Boston at a rate usurious in New York, held, that they were governed by the New York law. Hildreth v. Shepard, 65 Barb., 173, (1873). In this case it is stated that the true rule seems to be that where a note is dated and made payable in one state, and taken out of that state into another for negotiation or sale, it is still to be considered as a contract made subject to the laws of the state where dated and made payable. But when the note is made in one state, negotiated and sold in that state at a rate of interest there allowed, the same is to be governed by the laws of that state, and not of the state where it is payable.

As to the maker of a note, his liabilities are controlled by the law of the place where the note is made; unless it be payable elsewhere, then by the law of the place where payable. Wilson v. Lazier, 11 Gratt., 482; Chartres v. Cairnes, 16 Mart. (La.), 1; Yeatman v. Cullen, 5 Blackf., 241; Stacy v. Baker, 1 Scammon, 417; Brabston v. Gibson, 9 How., 263; Harrison v. Edwards, 12 Vt., 648.

As to the acceptor of a bill, his contract is governed by the law of the place where the acceptance is made if the bill is payable there, or if no place of payment be named, but if payable elsewhere, then by the law of the place of payment. Bright v. Judson, 47 Barb., 29; Everett v. Vendryes, 19 N. Y., 436; Frazier v. Warfield, 9 Smedes & M., 220; Barney v. Newcomb, 9 Cush., 46.

As to the drawer of a bill, his contract is to be governed by the law of the place where the bill is drawn. Freese v. Brownell, 35 N. J. L., 286; Hunt v. Standart, 15 Ind., 33; Raymond v. Holmes, 11 Texas, 55; Kuenzi v. Elvers, 14 La. An., 391; Lennig v. Ralston, 23 Penn. St., 137; Price v. Page, 24 Mo., 67, 595, 596; Bk. U. S. v. U. S., 2 How., 711.

The liability of an indorser of a bill or note is governed by the law of the place where indorsement was made, though the bill or note be payable elsewhere.

In case of a bill of exchange, payable in New York, but drawn and indorsed in a foreign country, the law of New York controls the interpretation and validity of the indorsement, as between indorsee and drawer. Everett v. Vendryes, 19 N. Y., 436.

with. But this court is not of that opinion. In giving the action of debt to the holder of a bill of exchange, and in giving it the dignity of a specialty, the legislature has not altered the character of the paper in other respects. It is still a pure commercial transaction governed by commercial law. Notice of the protest is still necessary, and the omission to aver it in the declaration is still fatal.

Had this error been moved in arrest of judgment, it is presumable the judgment would have been arrested; but it is not too late to allege, as error, in this court, a fault in the declaration, which ought to have prevented the rendition of a judgment in the court below.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded with direction that the judgment be arrested.

After the opinion was delivered, Youngs prayed that the cause might be remanded with leave to amend.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. Here is a verdict which must be set aside before an amendment can be allowed.

It might be set aside by the court below, but this court can see no reason in the record for setting it aside.

226*] *VASSE v. SMITH.

Infancy is a bar to an action by an owner against his supercargo for breach of instructions; but not to an action of trover for the goods. Still, however, infancy may be given in evidence in an action of trover, upon the plea of not guilty: not as a bar, but to show the nature of the act which is supposed to be a conversion.

An infant is liable in trover, although the goods were delivered to him under a contract, and although they were not actually converted to his own use.

A bill of exceptions ought to state that evidence was offered of the facts upon which the opinion of the court was prayed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

The declaration had two counts; first, a special count, charging the defendant Smith, who was a supercargo, with breach of orders; second, trover.

The first count stated that Vasse, the plaintiff, was owner and possessed of 70 barrels of flour, and, at the instance and request of the defendant, put it on board a schooner at Alexandria to be shipped to Norfolk, under the care, management and direction of the defendant, to be by him sold for and on account of the plaintiff, at Norfolk, for cash, or on a credit at 60 days, in good drafts on Alexandria, and negotiable in the bank of Alexandria. That the defendant was retained and employed by the plaintiff for the purpose of selling the flour as aforesaid, for which service the plaintiff was to pay him a reasonable compensation. That the defendant received the flour at Alexandria, put it on board the schooner, and sailed, with the flour under his care and direction, to Norfolk; "yet the defendant, not regarding the duty of his said employment, so badly, carelessly, negligently, and improvidently behaved himself in said service and employment, and took such little care of the said flour by him so received as aforesaid, that he did not sell the same, or any part thereof, at Norfolk, for cash, or on a credit of 60 days for drafts on Alexandria, negotiable in the bank of Alexandria, but the said defendant, on the contrary thereof, by and through his own neglect and default, and through his wrongful conduct, carelessness and improvidence, suffered the same, and every part of the said 70 barrels of flour, in his possession as aforesaid, to be embezzled, or otherwise to be wholly lost, wasted, and destroyed."

*The second count was a common [*227 count in trover for the flour.

The defendant, besides the plea of not guilty, pleaded infancy to both counts; to which last plea the plaintiff demurred generally.

The court below rendered judgment for the defendant upon the demurrer to the plea of infancy to the first count; and for the plaintiff upon the demurrer to that plea to the second count. Upon the trial, in the court below, of the issue of not guilty, to the count for trover, three bills of exception were taken by the plaintiff.

The first bill of exceptions stated, that the defendant offered evidence to prove that the flour was consigned and delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff under the following letter of instructions.

"Mr. Samuel Smith—Sir—I have shipped on board the schooner Sisters, Captain ———, bound to Norfolk, 70 barrels of superfine flour, marked A. V. to you consigned. As soon as you arrive there I will be obliged to you to dispose of it as soon as you can to the best advantage for cash, or credit at 60 days in a good draft on this place, negotiable at the bank of Alexandria. I should prefer the first, if not much difference; however, do for the best of my interest. (Signed) Amb. Vasse."

And that the defendant received the flour in consequence of that letter of instructions, and upon the terms therein mentioned. That the flour was not sold by the defendant at Norfolk, but was shipped from thence by him, without other authority than the said letter of instructions, to the West Indies, for and on account of one Joseph Smith, as stated in the bill of lading, which was for 398 barrels, 70 of which were stated in the margin to be marked A. V., 198 I. S., 100 D. I. S., and 30 P. T.

*That the defendant, when he received [*228 the flour, and long after he shipped it, was an infant under the age of twenty-one years. Whereupon the court, at the prayer of the defendant, instructed the jury that if they found the facts as stated, the defendant was not liable upon the count for trover.

The second exception was the admission of evidence of the defendant's infancy.

NOTE.—Infancy is not a defense in an action of trover, nor for any tort. Catts v. Phalen, 2 How., 376; Baxter v. Bush, 29 Vt., 465; Lewis v. Littlefield, 15 Me., 233; Matthews v. Cowan, 59 Ill., 341; Walker v. Davis, 1 Gray, 506; Towne v. Wiley, 23 Vt., 355; Homer v. Thwing, 3 Pick., 492; Ray v. Tubbs, 50 Vt., 688; Eaton v. Hill, 5 N. H., 235; Burnard v. Haggis, 14 C. B. (N. S.), 45; Campbell v. Stakes, 2 Wend., 137; Conway v. Reed, 66 Mo., 346.

"If an infant is old and cunning enough to contrive and carry out a fraud, he ought to make satisfaction of it." 2 Eq. Cas. Abr., 515.

The third exception stated that, "upon the facts aforesaid (the facts in the first bill of exceptions mentioned), the plaintiff prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they shall be of opinion that the defendant was under the age of twenty-one years, and between the age of nineteen and twenty years, and that the defendant of his own head shipped the flour to the West Indies, in a vessel which has been lost by the perils of the sea, and that the said shipment was made with other flour, on account of his father Joseph Smith, in such case the defendant has thereby committed a tort in regard to the plaintiff, for which he is liable in this action, notwithstanding his infancy aforesaid, which instruction the court refused to give.

The verdict and judgment being against the plaintiff, he brought his writ of error.

E. J. Lee and C. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

1. The infancy of the defendant was no bar to the first count, because it was a count in tort, and not upon contract, and infants are liable for torts and injuries of a private nature. (3 East, 62, Govett v. Radnidge and others; 3 Bac. Abr., 132; Noy, 129; Roll. Abr., 530; Fearnes v. Smith, 3 Bac. Abr., 126.)

2. The shipping of the flour without authority was a conversion. (Peake's Ni. Pr. Cases, 49; Youl v. Harbottle, 4 T. R. 260; Syeds v. Hay, 1 Wils., 328; Perkins v. Smith, Bull. N. P. 35, 6 Mod., 212; 6 East, 539, M'Combie v. Davis.)

229*] *3. Infancy cannot be given in evidence upon the issue of not guilty.

It is admitted that if the possession had been obtained by a tort, the infant would be liable; but it is contended that the possession having been rightfully obtained, a subsequent misapplication of the property by an infant cannot be a conversion unless it be actually a conversion to his own use.

But there are no cases to justify such a doctrine, and it is contrary to the principles of analogous cases. In an action of trespass for mesne profits infancy is no bar, although he becomes a trespasser by implication of law. (Latch., 21; 1 Bac. Abr., 132; 1 Esp. Rep., 172.) So a feme covert is liable in an action of trover, because the conversion is a tort. (Yelv., 166.)

Although infancy may be given in evidence upon non assumpsit, yet it cannot upon any other general issue. (Gilb. L. E., 164, 216, 217; 2 Term Rep., 166.) Upon not guilty, the defendant cannot give in evidence a license, nor a right to a way, nor any other matter of justification. (Str., 1200; 1 Tidd., 591, 598, 600.)

Any act which, if done by a person of full age, would be a conversion, will be a conversion if done by an infant.

In the present case the bill of lading, which is a negotiable instrument, being in the name of Joseph Smith, the plaintiff had no power or control over it. It would unquestionably be a conversion if done by an adult. The only question is, whether the nature of the act is altered by being done by an infant. (1 Term Rep., 215, 745; 2 Term Rep., 63; 6 Term Rep., 131; 5 Term Rep., 583.)

Swann, contra.

An infant is liable for actual, not for constructive torts founded upon contract, or bailment, which is in the nature of a contract. In this case the action might as well have been brought upon the contract, as upon *the [230 tort. If it had been brought upon the contract, infancy would have been a bar.

The case is clearly within the reason of the law of infancy, and it cannot be in the power of the plaintiff by his form of action to deprive the defendant of his defense. The case cited from Peake's Cases arose entirely ex delicto. There are cases in which infancy may be given in evidence upon not guilty. (5 Burr., 2826.)

March 5. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The first error alleged in this record, consists in sustaining the plea of infancy to the first count in the declaration.

This count states a contract between the plaintiff and defendant, by which the plaintiff committed seventy barrels of flour to the care of the defendant, to be carried to Norfolk, and there sold for money, or on sixty days' credit payable in drafts on Alexandria, negotiable in the bank. The plaintiff then alleges that the defendant did not perform his duty in selling conformably to his instructions, but, by his negligence, permitted the flour to be wasted so that it was lost to the plaintiff.

This case, as stated, is completely a case of contract, and exhibits no feature of such a tort as will charge an infant. There can be no doubt but that the court did right in sustaining the plea.

The second count is in trover, and charges a conversion of the flour.

That an infant is liable for a conversion is not contested. The Circuit Court was itself of that opinion, and therefore sustained the demurrer to this plea. But, in the progress of the cause, it appeared *that the goods [231 were not taken wrongfully by the defendant, but were committed to his care by the plaintiff, and that the conversion, if made, was made while they were in his custody under a contract. The court then permitted infancy to be given in evidence on the plea of not guilty. To this opinion an exception was taken.

If infancy was a bar to a suit of trover brought in such a case, the court can perceive no reason why it may not be given in evidence on this plea. If it may be given in evidence on non assumpsit, because the infant cannot contract, with at least as equal reason may it be given in evidence in an action of trover in a case in which he cannot convert.

But this court is of opinion that infancy is no complete bar to an action of trover, although the goods converted be in his possession, in virtue of a previous contract. The conversion is still in its nature a tort; it is not an act of omission but of commission, and is within that class of offenses for which infancy cannot afford protection. Yet it may be given in evidence, for it may have some influence on the question, whether the act complained of be really a conversion or not.

The court, therefore, does not consider the admission of this testimony as error.

The defendant exhibited the letter of instructions under which he acted, which is in these words: "Sir," &c., but the plaintiff offered evidence that the flour was not sold in Norfolk, but was shipped by the defendant to the West Indies, for and on account of a certain Joseph Smith, as by the bill of lading which was produced. The defendant then gave his infancy in evidence, and prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the testimony, he was not liable on the second count stated in the plaintiff's declaration, which instruction the court gave, and to this opinion an exception was taken.

This instruction of the court must have been founded on the opinion that infancy is a bar 232] to an action of *trover for goods committed to the infant, under a contract, or that the fact proved did not amount to a conversion.

This court has already stated its opinion to be, that an infant is chargeable with a conversion, although it be of goods which came lawfully to his possession. It remains to inquire whether this is so clearly shown not to be a conversion as to justify the court in saying to the jury, the defendant was not liable in this action.

The proof offered was, that the defendant shipped the goods on account of Joseph Smith. This fact, standing unconnected with any other, would unquestionably be testimony which, if not conclusive in favor of the plaintiff, was, at least, proper to be left to the jury. But it is urged that this statement refers to the bill of lading, from the notes in the margin of which it appears that, although the bill of lading, which was for a much larger quantity of flour, was made out in the name of Joseph Smith, yet, in point of fact, the shipment was made for various persons, and, among others, for the plaintiff.

The court perceive, in this bill of exceptions, no evidence explanatory of the terms under which this shipment was made, and the marks in the margin of the bill of lading do not, in themselves, prove that the shipment was not made for the person in whose name the bill was filled up.

It is possible that it may have been proved to the jury that this flour was really intended to be shipped on account of the plaintiff, and that the defendant did not mean to convert it to his own use. But the letter did not authorize him so to act. It was not, therefore, a complete discharge; and should it be admitted that an infant is not chargeable with a conversion made by mistake, this testimony ought still to have been left to the jury. The defendant would certainly be at liberty to prove that the shipment was in fact made for Vasse, and that he acquiesced in it so far as to consider the transaction not as a conversion; but without 233] any of *these circumstances which, if given in evidence, ought to have been left to the jury, the court has declared the action not sustainable.

This court is of opinion that the Circuit Court has erred in directing the jury that, upon the evidence given, the defendant was not liable under the second count; for which their judgment is to be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.[1]

1.—The Chief Justice noticed also the phraseology of the third bill of exceptions. It prays the opinion of the court upon certain facts, without stating that any evidence of those facts was given to the jury. It is doubtful whether those facts exist in the case, and whether the court would be bound to give an opinion upon them.

CUSTISS
v.
THE GEORGETOWN AND ALEXANDRIA TURNPIKE COMPANY.

An appeal lies in the Supreme Court from an order of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, quashing an inquisition in the nature of a writ ad quod damnum.

The Circuit Court for the District of Columbia has no jurisdiction, upon motion, to quash an inquisition taken under the act "to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causey to Alexandria."

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, which had quashed an inquisition taken by the marshal condemning land of Mr. Custiss for a turnpike road.

The inquisition was taken under the 7th section of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1809, "to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causey to Alexandria" (vol. 9. p. 276), which provides, that it shall be lawful for the president and directors of the turnpike company to agree with the owners of any ground to be occupied by the road and the necessary toll-houses and gates, for the right thereof; and, in case of disagreement, "on application to one of the judges of the Circuit Court, he shall issue a warrant directed to the marshal of the district to summon a jury of 24 inhabitants of the District of Columbia, of property and reputation, not related to the parties, nor in any manner interested, to meet on the land to be valued, at a day to be expressed in the warrant, not less than ten nor more than twenty thereafter; and the marshal, upon receiving the said warrant, shall forthwith summon *the [234 said jury, and when met, provided there be not less than twelve, shall administer an oath or affirmation to every juryman that shall appear, that he shall faithfully, justly and impartially value the lands, and all damages the owner thereof shall sustain, by opening the road through such land, according to the best of his skill and judgment; and that the inquisition thereupon taken shall be signed by the marshal and the jurymen present, and returned by the marshal to the clerk of the county, to be by him recorded; and upon every such valuation the jury is hereby directed to describe and ascertain the bounds of the land by them valued, and their valuation shall be conclusive upon all persons; and shall be paid by the president and directors to the owner of the land, or his or her legal representatives; and on payment thereof, the said land shall be taken and occupied for a public road, and for the necessary toll-houses and gates forever."

On the application of the president and directors of the company, a warrant was granted, and an inquisition taken and returned to the clerk. Before it was recorded, the president and directors obtained from the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, a rule upon Mr. Custiss to show cause why the inquisition should not be quashed. Mr. Custiss appeared and objected to the jurisdiction of the court, but the court overruled the objection, and, upon hearing, quashed the inquest.

From this order Mr. Custiss appealed to this court.

E. J. Lee, for the appellant.

The Circuit Court had no jurisdiction of the case upon motion. No such jurisdiction is given by the act of Congress. It directs the marshal to return the inquisition to the office of the clerk, to be by him recorded. The remedy, if any exists, is by a bill in equity. This was an application to the court as a court of law. Even the court itself, in recording deeds, acts in a ministerial capacity. (2 Hen. & Munf., 132, 135; 1 W. Bl., 605; Rex. v. Justices of Derbyshire, 6 Term, Rep., 88.)

235*] F. S. Key* and C. Lee, contra.

The court must of necessity possess a power and control over its own record. Suppose the clerk should refuse to record the inquisition; or suppose he is about to record an irregular and informal inquisition, will not the court control him? Such a jurisdiction is exercised by the courts in England without the authority of any statute.

The case from Hening & Munford only decides that the court could not inquire into the right of the party to make the deed, or to inquire into the title or contending claims. But the court must see whether it be a deed or not; whether it be proved by the proper number of witnesses, and whether it be sealed.

The clerk of the court could not put anything upon record without the authority of the court.

This court cannot correct the error, if it be one. No writ of error will lie in such a case. This court can correct only error in law, and this, if it be an error, is an error in fact.

March 5. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

At the opening of this case, some doubt was entertained respecting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but that doubt is removed by an inspection of the act by which the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia is constituted. The words of that act, descriptive of the appellate jurisdiction of this court, are more ample than those employed in the judicial act. They are, that "any final judgment, order or decree in said Circuit Court, wherein the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the value of 100 dollars, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court."

The jurisdiction of this court being admitted, the proceedings of the Circuit Court, in order-

236*] ing the inquisition *taken between these parties to be quashed, comes on to be examined.

The first objection to this proceeding is, that the court of Alexandria could take no cognizance of the subject, by way of motion.

The validity of this objection depends entirely on the act of Congress under which this inquisition was taken. If it was to be recorded by order of the court, if the judgment of the court was, in any manner, to be exercised upon it, then, in all which has been done, the court has exercised its jurisdiction, and the inquiry will be whether there was sufficient cause for refusing to permit the inquisition to be recorded. If, on the other hand, the clerk was a mere ministerial officer directed, by law, to perform a ministerial act, without any superintending agency on the part of the court, then the court could not, upon motion, prohibit the clerk to perform his duty, and could not legitimately quash the inquisition.

The act of Congress directs "that the inquisition, when taken, shall be signed by the marshal and by the jurymen present, and returned by the marshal to the clerk of the county, to be by him recorded."

That the legislature may direct the clerk of a court to perform a specified service, without making his act the act of the court, will not be controverted: and, if this may be done, it is difficult to conceive words which convey this idea more clearly than those which are employed in this act.

The inquisition is not returnable to the court, but to the clerk. It is not to be recorded by order of the court, but is to be recorded by the clerk, on receiving it from the marshal. It does not derive its validity from being recorded, but remains afterwards liable to all the objections which might be taken to it, previous thereto. If, for example, an inquisition should be recorded which was found by eleven jurors, that inquisition would neither vest the land in the company, nor give a right to *the for- [237 mer proprietor to demand the money to which it was valued. The inquisition, then, is to be recorded solely for preservation, and the act of recording is a ministerial act which the law directs the clerk to perform, without submitting the paper to the judgment of the court. The law asks not the intervention of the court, and requires no exercise of judicial functions.

The difference between this act and those, the execution of which is superintended by the court, is apparent. In those cases the instrument is to be brought into court, and acted upon by the court: in this it is to be delivered to the clerk at any time, and acted on by him without the intervention of the court.

This court is unanimously of opinion that the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria could not legally entertain the motion for quashing the inquisition found in this case, nor legally prevent their clerk from recording it. Their judgment, therefore, is reversed, and the motion to be dismissed.

LODGE'S LESSEE v. LEE.

A grant of an island, by name, in the Potomac River, superadding the courses and distances of the lines thereof, which on resurvey are now found to exclude part of the island, will pass the whole island.

EJECTMENT by Lodge against Lee, for part of an island in the Potomac River, called Eden, but now generally called Lee's island.

The plaintiff's lessor had taken up the land in the year 1804, as vacant, supposing that the defendant's claim must be bounded by the course and distance, allowing one degree of variation for every 20 years since the certificate of survey was made under which the defendant claims.

The defendant claimed under a patent from the lord proprietor of Maryland, dated in 1723, which granted to Thomas Lee "all that tract or upper island of land, called Eden, lying and 238] being in Prince George *county, beginning at a bounded maple, near ten miles above the second falls, and opposite to a large run on the Virginia side called Hickory Run, and standing upon a point at the foot of the said island, and running thence north sixty degrees, west sixty perches," (&c., &c., giving the course and distance of every line to the beginning tree,) "containing and laid out for 320 acres of land, more or less."

The court below instructed the jury that the grant to Thomas Lee passed the whole of the island called Eden, and that the lessor of the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff; which opinion and judgment were, by this court, without argument, affirmed.

FINLEY v. LYNN.

A bond, executed in pursuance of articles of agreement, may, in equity, be restrained by those articles.

A complainant in equity may have relief even against the admissions in his bill.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in a suit in chancery, brought by Finley against Lynn.

The bill stated that on the 27th of February, 1804, the plaintiff and defendant entered into articles of copartnership, by which the stock to be furnished by the plaintiff was to consist of one-half of the ship United States and 5,000 dollars; and by the defendant, his gold and silver manufactory, two lots in the city of Washington, all his stock of merchandise, and the rents of two houses. That a part of the merchandise agreed to be furnished consisted of plate, jewelry, &c., purchased by the defendant of Messrs. Lemuel Wells & Co., to the amount, as was then supposed, of 2,300 dollars; and, in consideration of its being brought into the joint stock, the plaintiff agreed to pay one-half of the debt due to Wells & Co. therefor.

That the business of the concern was conducted in two separate stores, viz., a hardware 239] store principally *under the management of the plaintiff; and a jewelry store under the management of the defendant, containing the stock of jewelry, &c., brought into the joint concern by the defendant, and that which was purchased of Wells & Co. The business of the copartnership was carried on until the 1st of March, 1805, when a dissolution took place. During that period goods were bought and carried into the jewelry store, and at the time of the dissolution "the jewelry store was indebted to said concern" in the sum of 2,825 dollars and 27 cents, besides which the concern had paid Wells & Co. in part of their debt, the sum of 263 dollars and 56 cents. That the dissolution was upon the following terms, viz., that the defendant should withdraw all the property put into the joint stock by him; and should have the goods in the jewelry store, and all the debts due to that store, as a compensation and in lieu of the profits arising upon the whole business. And the plaintiff was to take on his account the goods in the hardware store, and the goods which were ordered for the spring; and was to indemnify the defendant from all claims or demands upon the concern, or which might arise from goods then ordered, and not at that time received; which articles of dissolution were under seal. That when the plaintiff signed the articles of dissolution he did not intend to commit himself to the payment of the debt due to Wells & Co. For although, by the articles of copartnership, he had agreed to pay half the debt, yet as the goods were given up to the defendant upon the dissolution, he considered himself absolved from that obligation. And the plaintiff contends that the defendant ought to have been satisfied when the plaintiff "returned to him the whole jewelry store, with the accession of nearly 3,000 dollars' worth of merchandise, and gave up to him the profits of the said store, which he believes to be equal to 2,500 dollars more."

That upon the dissolution the plaintiff agreed to give the defendant security for his performance of the terms of the dissolution, and the defendant had a bond prepared, which was signed by the plaintiff and his sureties; that the plaintiff did not see the bond until he was called *on to sign it, and that he is satisfied he [240 never read it, taking it for granted that it was a bond to compel him to perform what he was bound to perform by the terms of the dissolution; and that his sureties executed it under the same circumstances and impression. That the defendant did not claim payment of the debt due to Wells & Co. for a year after the bond was executed, although Wells & Co. before the dissolution had brought suit against the defendant therefor; that the defendant had rendered the plaintiff some accounts in which that debt was not mentioned. That the defendant afterwards brought suit upon the plaintiff's bond, and gave notice that he should claim the whole amount of the debt due to Wells & Co. That the plaintiff's counsel was of opinion that the bond was so worded as to bind the plaintiff to the payment of that debt, whereupon the plaintiff confessed a judgment at law, saving his right to relief in equity. That the bond was executed under a mistaken impression of its contents; and that the defendant will take out execution upon the judgment at law. The bill then prays an injunction to stay execution until the matter in dispute can be heard and decided in equity, and the accounts between the plaintiff and defendant examined and settled, and for general relief.

The injunction was granted by one of the judges out of court.

In the articles of copartnership, after stating what stock the plaintiff should bring into the joint concern, the debt to Wells & Co. is mentioned in the following manner, viz.: "And on the part of Adam Lynn, his gold and silver manufactory, two lots in the city of Washington, all his stock of merchandise (the said O. P. Finley and Adam Lynn, jointly and severally, by these presents, binding themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to pay to Lemuel Wells & Co. of New York, two thousand three hundred dollars, money due to them on account of said merchandise), the rents of one house," &c.

The account against the jewelry store was an 241] account *opened in the books of the company, charging that store with goods purchased and put into it for sale on the joint account; and giving it credit by cash and by goods sold to sundry persons; showing a balance of goods remaining in that store of 2,825 dollars and 27 1-2 cents, over and above the goods which were in it at the commencement of the copartnership.

The articles of dissolution were truly recited in the bill.

The condition of the bond of indemnity was as follows: "Whereas the said O. P. Finley and Adam Lynn, late joint merchants and copartners under the firm of Finley & Lynn, have by mutual consent dissolved the said copartnership on the first day of the present month, on which dissolution it was, among other things, agreed between the said Oliver P. Finley and the said Adam Lynn, that the said Oliver P. Finley should satisfy and pay all debts and contracts due from or entered into by the said copartnership, or either of the said copartners, for or on account of, or for the benefit of the said copartnership, including certain debts due from the said Adam Lynn, for goods by him ordered, which have been received by the said copartnership; and also all debts which may arise from merchandise hereafter shipped to the said concern in consequence of any orders heretofore made; now the condition of the above obligation is such, that if the said Oliver P. Finley shall well and truly satisfy and discharge all the debts and contracts herein before described, so as to indemnify and save harmless the said Adam Lynn from the payment of the same, and from any suit or prosecution in law or equity, for or on account of the said debts and contracts, then this obligation to be void."

There was also raised in the books of the concern an account against "merchandise," the balance to the debit of which was 4,028 dollars and 89 cents. And a statement of hardware imported on the joint account before March, 1805, amounting to 7,653 dollars and 8 242] *cents. And of debts of the concern paid by Finley amounting to about 6,000 dollars.

The defendant's answer admits the original articles of copartnership, and of dissolution, and the bond as referred to in the bill. It denies that the plaintiff advanced the 5,000 dollars in cash; and avers that the profits of the ship United States never came to the use of the concern, but were retained by Rickets & Newton, to whom the plaintiff had transferred his half of that ship. It avers that by the articles of copartnership, each party was to bring into the joint stock 11,000 dollars. That the defendant brought in 2,429 dollars more than his proportion, which was the reason of making the debt to Wells & Co. a partnership debt; after which there was still an excess of capital, amounting to 129 dollars furnished by the defendant, for which he had credit upon the first opening of the partnership books.

The entry of stock on the 1st of March, 1804, was as follows:

	l.	s.	d.	l.	s.	d.
Cash in England,	1,500	0	0
One-half ship U. States,	1,800	0	0
Real estate,	1,290	0	0
Manufactory,	1,200	0	0
Merchandise,	1,538	14	0
				7,328	14	0
Due from stock to L. Wells & Co., of New York,				690	0	0
To Adam Lynn,				38	14	0

It avers that the debt to Wells & Co. was, from this period, always considered by both parties as a copartnership debt, and that it was by the advice of the plaintiff that the defendant suffered himself to be sued for that debt.

It admits that some goods were brought from the hardware store to the jewelry store, but avers goods to a large amount were also taken from the latter to *the former store, of [243 which no account was kept. It denies that the account exhibited by the plaintiff against the jewelry store is correct; and avers that if a true account had been kept, the balance would have been in favor of that store. It avers that it was the intention of the defendant, and he believes of the plaintiff also, in the articles of dissolution, to include the debt due to Wells & Co. under the description of "all claims and demands on the concern." That it was adopted as a social debt by the articles of copartnership, and was placed to the credit of Wells & Co. on the books of the concern, and a partial payment made out of the joint funds. That if this credit had not been so given, the defendant would have been a creditor of the concern to the amount of 2,429 dollars instead of 129. That the plaintiff had paid many of the debts due from the jewelry store which were situated exactly like that of Wells & Co.

The answer expressly avers that the plaintiff did read, examine, and, as the defendant believes, perfectly understand the bond of indemnity before he executed it. That it was left with him some hours before he signed it. And it avers also, positively, that the plaintiff's sureties read it and made remarks to the defendant in the presence of the plaintiff upon the manner in which it was drawn.

It states that the defendant offered the plaintiff two propositions as the basis of the dissolution. One was, that a dividend should be made of the debts, the profits, and the stock; and if any difference should arise, on settlement, it should be submitted to three merchants. The other was, that the defendant should have the merchandise in the jewelry store, and the debts due to that store, as a compensation in lieu of the profits of the whole business; that the plaintiff should hold the merchandise in the hardware store, and the debts due to it, and the profits of the trade, and should pay all debts and contracts as stated in the bond; the latter of which propositions was accepted by the plaintiff.

*The answer denies that the defend- [244 ant received back the jewelry store with the accession of 3,000 dollars' worth of merchandise, or that the profits were equal to 2,500 dollars. It avers that the defendant believes they did not exceed 1,250 dollars, and were less than those of the hardware store. That the profits of the ship United States were at least 4,000 dollars. These the defendant relinquished to obtain indemnity against the debts of the concern. That the plaintiff refused to take an inventory at the time of dissolution, so that an accurate account cannot be taken. That the reason why he did not sooner claim from the plaintiff the amount due to Wells & Co. was, that he was under an erroneous opinion that he could have no recourse to the plaintiff until he should first have paid and discharged that debt.

The answer denies any agreement between the plaintiff and defendant to acquit each other of their private debts.

The only testimony in the cause related to the profits of the ship United States; and the accounts exhibited being true copies from the books.

The court below, conceiving that the whole equity of the bill was completely denied by the answer, and not supported by the evidence in the cause, dissolved the injunction, and, upon final hearing, dismissed the bill; whereupon the plaintiff brought his writ of error.

Swann and Youngs, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That Finley was not bound to pay the debt due to Wells & Co.; and,

2. That Finley was entitled to the amount standing on the books of the concern to the debit of the jewelry store, it being (as they contended) a debt due to the hardware store, and that, by the true construction of the articles of dissolution, Finley was entitled to the debts due to that store.

245] *1. In support of the first point it was said that by the articles of dissolution Finley was bound to indemnify Lynn from "claims and demands upon the concern" only. That the claim of Wells & Co. was against Lynn only for goods originally sold to him upon his sole credit, and that although the goods afterwards came to the use of the concern, and although Finley and Lynn might agree between themselves to consider it as a joint debt, yet that would give Wells & Co. no claim upon the concern. That the bond was given merely to carry into effect the articles of dissolution, and will not in equity be extended beyond the expressions of those articles. The bond does not alter the equitable obligations of the parties. (1 Fonb., 106, 188, 192; 2 Atk., 203; 2 P. Wms., 349; 1 P. Wms., 123.)

2. Although the article of dissolution do not expressly give Finley the debts due to the hardware store, yet it is to be implied from the principle of reciprocity which seems intended between the parties, and from the circumstance that he was bound to pay all the debts of the concern. (1 Fonb., 427.) Although the account makes the jewelry store debtor to Finley and Lynn, yet it means Finley and Lynn's hardware store, because that store was carried on in the name of Finley & Lynn, the jewelry store in the name of Lynn only.

Although the plaintiff has not in his bill claimed this balance, yet that is no objection to his recovery. He has prayed for general relief, and the court will give him everything which in equity he ought to have. (3 Atk., 523.)

Although the defendant denies that balance to be due, because he says goods, of which no account was taken, had been carried from the jewelry to the hardware store, yet he admits that the goods charged in the account were furnished and sent to the jewelry store, and his answer is no evidence that goods were carried from the jewelry to the hardware store. It is not an averment responsive to the bill, and must be proved by other evidence than the defendant's answer.

*One witness will authorize a decree [246 against an answer. (1 Atk., 19.) And here was a witness who testified that both the parties admitted the entries in that account to be correct.

E. J. Lee and Jones, contra.

The whole equity of the bill consists in the allegation that the bond does not agree with the articles of dissolution, and was obtained by surprise. It contains no other ground of complaint. The answer completely denies this equity, and there is no proof to support it.

The bond is warranted by the articles of dissolution and the articles of copartnership. The ground of surprise and mistake is denied absolutely by the answer. It is a rule in equity that the ground of mistake or surprise must be clearly proved before a court of equity will interfere. (1 Vezey, 317.) In this case there is a total failure of proof altogether. Nothing can be clearer than the liability of the plaintiff to pay the debt of Wells & Co. The articles of copartnership are express and pointed to that effect. The articles of dissolution, taken in connection with the articles of copartnership, are equally explicit, and the bond is unequivocal.

With regard to the account raised against the jewelry store, it is no more than a memorandum of the amount of goods placed there for sale. The account is with the concern. The plaintiff in his bill expressly states it to be so. It is no more than if the company had chosen to keep a separate account of the profits arising from any particular article of merchandise. It is very common for merchants to open an account against flour, or rum, or tobacco, or wine, or any other article in which they have large dealings, yet no one ever thought that such an account created a debt. If this account against the jewelry store created a debt, it was Finley & Lynn's debt to Finley & Lynn. The jewelry store was Finley & Lynn's store. An account against the store was, therefore, an account *against Finley & Lynn. [247 It was merely the right hand made debtor to the left.

Besides, it was clearly the intention of the parties that something should be given to Lynn in lieu of his share of the profits of the trade: If you give him the goods in the jewelry store, and still make him debtor for the goods, you give him nothing. He might as well have bought the goods elsewhere. The plaintiff in his bill makes a merit of having given up to the defendant the whole jewelry store, with the accession of nearly 3,000 dollars' worth of merchandise, and the whole profits of that store to the amount of 2,500 dollars. This could not possibly have been the case if the defendant was to be made debtor for those goods. Although a person is not bound in equity by the admission of a principle of law, yet he is by the admission of a fact; and here is a clear admission of a fact as to the understanding and the intention of the parties at the time of the dissolution.

The plaintiff and defendant had been copartners in trade, and had carried on their business in two stores; the one a jewelry store in the name of Lynn, to be conducted exclusively by him; the other a hardware store in the name of Finley & Lynn, to be under the joint management of the partners.

Previous to the commencement of their partnership, Lynn had contracted a debt to Lemuel Wells & Co., of New York, for goods ordered for a jewelry store carried on by himself, which goods it was mutually agreed to transfer to the new concern, and the debt to Lemuel Wells & Co., should become a debt chargeable on the social fund.

In February, 1805, it was agreed to dissolve the copartnership; and articles were entered into 248] to take *effect on the first day of March. The terms were, "that Adam Lynn shall withdraw all the property put into the joint stock by him, and that he shall have the goods in the jewelry store, and all the debts due to that store, as a compensation in lieu of the profits arising from the whole business; and the said Finley agrees to take, on his own account, the goods in the hardware store, and the goods which are ordered in the spring, and to indemnify the said Adam Lynn from all claims or demands upon the said concern, or which may arise for goods now ordered, and not yet arrived."

On the second of March, a bond of indemnity was executed, the condition of which, after stating the dissolution, proceeds thus: "On which dissolution it was, among other things, agreed that the said Oliver P. Finley should satisfy and pay all debts and contracts due from, or entered into by, the said copartnership, or either of the said copartners, for or on account of or for the benefit of the said copartnership, including certain debts due from the said Adam Lynn for goods by him ordered, which have been received by the said copartnership, and also all debts which may arise from merchandise hereafter shipped to the said concern, in consequence of any orders heretofore made.

"Now, the condition of the above obligation is such, that if the said Oliver P. Finley shall well and truly satisfy and discharge all the debts and contracts herein before described, so as to indemnify and save harmless the said Adam Lynn from the payment of the same, and from any suit or prosecution in law or equity for or on account of the said debts and contracts, then this obligation to be void."

Some time previous to the dissolution, an action had been brought by Lemuel Wells & Co. against Adam Lynn for the recovery of their debt which was then depending.

In December, 1806, Adam Lynn, for the first time, claimed, under the bond of indemnity, 249] the amount of *the debt to Lemuel Wells & Co., and, payment being refused, instituted a suit on the bond. Supposing that no defense could be made at law, judgment was confessed, with a reservation of all equitable objections to the payment. A bill was then filed suggesting that the bond was executed by mistake, and in the confidence that it was in exact conformity with the articles, and praying that it might be restrained by the articles. Several extrinsic circumstances are also detailed and relied upon as demonstrating that Lynn himself did not suppose, until so informed by counsel, that the bond comprehended this debt.

An injunction was granted, which, on the coming in of the answer, was dissolved, and, on a final hearing, the bill was dismissed.

The answer denies all the allegations of the bill which go to the mistake under which the bond was executed; insists that it conforms to the true meaning of the articles and intent of the parties; and endeavors to explain those extrinsic circumstances on which the plaintiff relied.

That a bond, executed in pursuance of articles, may be restrained by those articles, if the departure from them be clearly shown, is not to be controverted. But in this case, the majority of the court is of opinion that no such departure is manifested with sufficient clearness to justify the interposition of a court of equity.

By the articles of copartnership, the debt to Lemuel Wells & Co. was assumed by the firm of Finley & Lynn, and was payable out of the partnership fund. It is true that, at law, it did not constitute a demand against the partnership, but the court is much inclined to the opinion, that, had Lynn become insolvent, a suit in equity might have been sustained, on this claim, against Finley & Lynn.

If it might in equity, though not in law, be a "claim *or demand upon the con- [250 cern," there does not appear to be such a repugnancy between the bond and the articles as to induce the court to say that the bond, which, so far as is shown in this cause, was executed without imposition, and with a knowledge of its contents, binds the obligors further than they intended to be bound. The extrinsic circumstances relied on are certainly entitled to much consideration; but they are not thought sufficiently decisive and unequivocal in their character to justify a court of equity in restraining legal rights acquired under a solemn contract.

Though this is the principal object of the bill, it may be understood to contemplate something further. It prays for a settlement of all accounts, and for general relief.

So far as the accounts between the parties are closed by the articles of dissolution, no reason can be assigned for opening them. But if rights, growing out of those articles, require a settlement, the plaintiff is entitled to an account.

By a majority of the court it is conceived that if any profits had arisen on the jewelry store, independent of the goods on hand and of the debts due to the store, the plaintiff is entitled to them. It is not probable that there are such profits; but it is very possible that there may be. Large sums of money may have been received, and might either be on hand when the dissolution took place, or have been diverted to various uses. If such be the fact, the majority of the court is of opinion that any fair construction of the articles gives those profits to the plaintiff. The contract is, that Adam Lynn shall have "the goods in the jewelry store, and all the debts due to that store, as a compensation in lieu of the profits arising from the whole business." Now the profits of the jewelry store, if any, not existing in debts or goods, were certainly a part of the "profits of the whole business," and are, consequently, yielded to the plaintiff.

That this was the deliberate intention of the 251]defendant, *is avowed in his answer. A proposition for a dissolution was, he says, made by him in writing and accepted by the plaintiff. That proposition is, "that the defendant should have the merchandise in the jewelry store, and the debts due to that store, as a compensation in lieu of the profits of the whole business; that the complainant should hold the merchandise in the hardware store, and the debts due to it, and the profits of the trade."

Now, the profits of the jewelry store are certainly a part of the "profits of the trade."

The plaintiff also claims a debt said to be due from the jewelry store to the hardware store.

As all the debts due to the hardware store are obviously assigned to Finley, this debt becomes his property, unless his claim to it is relinquished by the undertaking to pay all debts due from the concern.

The words of this undertaking are to be looked for in the condition of his bond. He is to "satisfy and pay all debts and contracts due from, or entered into by, the said copartnership, or either of the said copartners, for or on account of or for the benefit of the said copartnership."

The terms of this stipulation appear to the court to be applicable to claims upon the copartnership, and not to claims of a part of the company on the other part. He is to satisfy and pay all debts and contracts due from, or entered into by, the said copartnership, not to release the claim of one store upon the other. This is a claim which did not exist upon the copartnership, and which grows out of the articles of dissolution. Those articles assign to the plaintiff all the profits of the hardware store, as well as the debts due to it. They separate what was before united. They draw the distinction between the hardware and the jewelry store, and make the debt due to the hardware store a part of the profits of that store.

252*] *The residue of the condition does not affect the question, and need not be recited.

It is, then, the opinion of a majority of the court that, if there was really a debt due from the jewelry store to the hardware store, Finley is entitled to that debt.

This is a proper subject for an account.

The plaintiff has probably not applied for this account in the court below, and it does not appear to be a principal object of his bill. This court, therefore, doubted whether it would be most proper to affirm the decree dismissing the bill with the addition that it should be without prejudice to any future claim for profits, and for the debt due from one store to the other, or to open the decree and direct the account. The latter was deemed the more equitable course. The decree, therefore, is to be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to take an account between the two stores, and an account of the profits of the jewelry store, if the same shall be required by the plaintiff.

TODD, J., concurred in the opinion of the court that the debt of Wells & Co. was a debt to be paid by Finley, but he differed upon the other part of the case, being of opinion that the complainant was not entitled to a relief which by his bill he had made a merit of waiving.

Decree reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to reinstate the injunction, and take an account, &c.

DE BUTTS v. BACON AND OTHERS. (a)

If an agent, who has, by permission of his principal, sold 8 per cent. stock, applies the money to his own use, and being pressed for payment gives a mortgage to secure the repayment of the amount of the stock with 8 per cent. interest thereon, it is usury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in a suit in chancery, brought by Samuel De *Butts against James [253 Bacon and others, the object of which was to foreclose a mortgage made by Bacon to De Butts. The condition of the mortgage was, that if the defendant, Bacon, should pay to the complainant the interest of eight per cent. upon one thousand dollars of eight per cent. stock of the United States, loaned by the complainant to the defendant, and should further pay to the complainant "the said sum of one thousand dollars, &c., the deed should be void.

The defendant, Bacon, pleaded the statute of usury, alleging that it was a loan of money and not of stock.

The facts of the case appeared to be, that the complainant, Samuel De Butts, intending to speculate in a voyage with Captain Elias De Butts, authorized the latter to sell one thousand dollars of eight per cent. stock of the United States, which he did through the agency of the defendant, Bacon, who received the money. The plan of the voyage not having been prosecuted, the complainant wished to get his stock back again, but could not get either the stock or the money from Bacon. It was, however, finally agreed, that Bacon should be considered as answerable for the stock, and should give a mortgage to secure the repayment of the stock, and eight per cent. interest.

The court below decided the contract to be usurious, and decreed the mortgage to be void. Which decree, this court, after argument, by Swann, for the appellant, and Youngs, for the appellees, Affirmed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in an 254] action of assumpsit *brought by Sheehy against Joseph Mandeville and R. B. Jamesson.

The declaration consisted of three counts.

The first count was upon a promissory note as follows, viz.: "James Sheehy complains of Joseph Mandeville and Robert Brown Jamesson, lately tradiug under the firm of Robert Brown Jamesson, of a plea of trespass on the ease, for that whereas, on the seveuteenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and four, the said defendant Joseph Mandeville, seeretly trading with the defendant Robert B. Jamesson, by way of buying and selling merchandise, at Alexandria, in the county aforesaid, under the name, title, style, and firm of Robert Brown Jamesson; and whereas the said defendants under the said name, firm and style, on the said seventeenth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, at, &e., made their certain note in writing, ealled a promissory note, subseribed by them by and under the name, style, title and firm of Robert B. Jamesson, bearing date the same day and year, aud then and there delivered the said note to the plaintiff, and by the said note did, under their firm aforesaid, promise to pay to the said plaintiff, or to his order, six hundred and four dollars and ninety-one eents, for value received, negotiable at the bank of Alexandria, by reason whereof, and by force of the law in sueh cases made and provided, the said defendants beeame liable to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of money eontained in the said note, aecording to the tenor aud effect of the said note; and being so liable, they, the said defendants, under the name and firm aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, the same day and year aforesaid, at Alexandria aforesaid, undertook," &c.

The second count was indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered to the defendants, under the name and firm of Robert B. Jamesson.

The third couut was a quantum valebant for the same goods.

255*] *The defendants were duly arrested, but Jamesson was discharged by a judge upon entering a eommon appearance, he having been before discharged under the act of Congress for the relief of insolvent debtors within the Distriet of Columbia; and no further proeeedings seem to have been had against him.

The defendant Mandeville appeared and filed two pleas.

1st plea. "And the said defendant, by George Youngs, his attorney, comes aud defends the wrong and injury, when, &c., protesting that the said goods, wares and merchandise, in the declaration mentioned, were not sold and delivered to the said Robert B. Jamesson aud this defendant jointly; for plea saith, that the said James ought not to have and maintain his actiou aforesaid against him, because he says, that heretofore, to wit, on the seventeenth day of July, 1804, at Alexandria, the said Robert B. Jamesson, in the declaration named, made his promissory note, payable to the said James Sheehy or order, sixty days after date, for 604 dollars and 91 cents, negotiable at the bank of Alexandria, which said note, so as aforesaid made by the said Jamesson, was given by the said Jamesson, to the said James Sheehy, and by him received, for and in discharge of an aecount or bill of the said James Sheehy against the said R. B. Jamesson, for sundry goods, wares and merehandise, at the speeial instance and request of the said R. B. Jamessou, sold and delivered by the said James to the said Robert B. Jamessou. And the said defendant Joseph avers that the said goods, wares and merehandise, mentioued in the plaintiff's deelaration, are the same goods, wares and merchandise, so as aforesaid sold and delivered to the said Robert B. Jamesson by the said James Sheehy, aud the same for which the said R. B. Jamesson gave his aforesaid negotiable note, and none other; and afterwards, to wit, on the 8th day of June, 1805, the said James Sheehy sued out of the elerk's offiee of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the county of Alexandria, his writ in an aetiou of debt upou the aforesaid note against the said Robert B. Jamesson, and such proeeedings *were [256 had therein, that at the July term of the said court, in the year 1806, a judgment was rendered in favor of the said James Sheehy, against the said R. B. Jamesson, for the debt and damages mentioned in the deelaration filed in that action, to be diseharged by the payment of the said six hundred and four dollars and ninety-one eents, with interest from the 15th of September, 1804, till paid, which will at large appear by the reeords of the said court uow here remaining in the said Cireuit Court of the Distriet of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria, which judgment still remains unreversed and in full foree; all of whieh the said defendant is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment whether the said plaintiff his aetiou aforesaid ought to have and maintain against him upon the seeond and third counts in the said declaration," &e.

2d plea. "And the said defendant, by leave of the eourt," &e., "for further plea saith, that the plaintiff his aetion aforesaid against him ought not to have and maintain, on the first eount in his said deelaration, because he saith, that heretofore, to wit, on the 8th day of June, 1805, the said James Sheehy sued out of the elerk's office of the Circuit Court of the Distriet of Columbia, for the eounty of Alexandria, his writ in an action of debt against the said Robert B. Jamesson, and afterwards, in July, filed his deelaration therein upon a note of the said Robert B. Jamesson to the said James Sheehy, dated the 17th day of July, 1804, payable sixty days after date, for 604 dollars and 91 cents, for value reeeived, negotiable at the bank of Alexandria; and afterwards sueh proceedings were had iu the said suit, that at July term of the said court, in the year 1806, judgment was rendered therein in favor of the said James Sheehy against the said Robert B. Jamesson, for the debt and damages in the said declaration mentioned to be discharged by the payment of 604 dollars and 91 cents, with interest from the 15th of September, 1804, until paid, and also costs of suit; all which the said defendant is ready to verify by the record and proceedings of the said court," &c., "which said judgment still remains unreversed and in full force, also to be verified by 257] the record, &c. And the *said defendant avers that the promissory note in the first count in the plaintiff's declaration mentioned and described, is the same note upon which the aforesaid judgment was rendered and obtained, against the said Robert B. Jamesson, as aforesaid, and not other or different, and this the said defendant is ready to verify; whereupon the defendant prays judgment if the said plaintiff ought to have and maintain his action aforesaid against him upon the first count in the said declaration," &c.

To the first plea the plaintiff demurred, and assigned as causes of demurrer,

1. That the plea does not traverse the assumpsit laid in the declaration.

2. It does not expressly confess or deny that the goods were sold and delivered to the said Joseph Mandeville and Robert B. Jamesson; nor that the note in the declaration mentioned was given by the said house and firm of Robert B. Jamesson.

3. An unsatisfied judgment against Robert B. Jamesson is no bar to an action upon the same cause of action against the other defendant, against whom no judgment has been rendered.

4. It does not aver that the judgment against Jamesson has been satisfied.

5. It does not deny or admit that the defendant, Mandeville, assumed to pay for the goods.

6. The plea is no answer to the declaration.

To the second plea the plaintiff also demurred, and assigned the same causes of demurrer.

The judgment of the court below, upon these demurrers, was in favor of the defendant Mandeville; and the plaintiff brought his writ of error.

258*] E. J. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

A debt due from joint partners is joint and several. Each is liable for the whole. (Rice v. Shute, 5 Burr., 2613; Watson's Law of Partnership, 238; 3 N. Y. Term Rep., 5; 14 Vin. Abr., 607, pl. 3; 6 Co., 40, b, Mildmay's case; 6 Co., 46, a, Higgins's case; Yelv., 67; 2 Atk., 510, Darwent v. Walton; 3 N. Y. Term Rep., 4; 5 East, 147; Cro. Jac., 74.) A judgment against one partner alone does not bind the other. It is therefore no bar to a suit against this other partner. The obligation of the note of Mandeville & Jamesson is not merged in the judgment against Jamesson. Mandeville cannot say he has been twice vexed for the same cause of action.

A secret partner is liable when discovered. (Watson, 42; Doug., 371.) If the creditor has obtained judgment against the open partner before the discovery of the secret partner, the latter may be sued upon the original cause of action. As to him it is not merged in the judgment. An unsatisfied execution is no bar to a second remedy against another person liable for the same debt. (5 Co., 86, b; Cro. Jac., 73; 1 Mod., 207.)

A promissory note, given for goods, is no bar to an action for the price of the goods founded on the sale. In the present case it is not pleaded as an accord and satisfaction, and it is in that form only that the defendant can avail himself of it. It is not satisfaction unless it be paid. (1 Esp., 148; 9 Co., 79, b; 1 Selw., 107; 1 Str., 426; 1 Burr., 9; 2 Term Rep., 24; 1 Selw., 108, 109.)

Although the plea states that the note was received in discharge of the account for goods sold, yet it was not a discharge without payment. (Cro. Car., 85, 86, Brainthwait v. Cornwallis; 6 Co., 44, b, 45, b; Cro. Eliz., 240, Ashbrook v. Snape; 3 East, 250, Drake v. Mitchel; 3 Call, 234, M'Guire v. Gadsby; 1 Cranch, 181; 1 Esp. Rep., 3, 5, Stedman v. Gooch; 6 Term Rep., 52, Puckford v. Maxwell.)

*The judgment (against Jamesson) [259 upon the note is no discharge of Mandeville. The cause of action against Jamesson only is merged in the judgment; not the joint cause of action against Mandeville & Jamesson. The reason why the cause of action merges in the judgment is, that the party has obtained a remedy of a higher nature against his debtor. But a judgment against Jamesson gives no remedy against Mandeville. The plaintiff could not lose his remedy upon the note against Mandeville until he had obtained another remedy of a higher nature against him. This he has not obtained, and, therefore, has not lost his remedy upon the note.

In the former action the declaration does not state it to be a joint note. If it had, there might perhaps be some doubt. But it was sued as the separate note of Jamesson. If the note had been in terms joint and several, a judgment against one would not have been a bar to a subsequent action upon the note against the other.

Youngs and C. Lee, contra.

The contracts made by copartners are joint, and not several. It is true that the effect of a judgment is several, that is, the execution may be served on both, or either of the defendants; but that does not alter the nature of the contract.

In joint contracts, both are bound, or neither is bound. If one be discharged the other is discharged; a release to one is a release to both. If the contract be destroyed, or vacated, as to one, it is as to the other also. When it has once passed into a judgment it is extinct; a plaintiff may if he pleases sue only one of the copartners, and if the defendant does not plead in abatement the action may be maintained; and if the plaintiff obtains a judgment against one he cannot have another action upon the same original cause of action against the other. This would enable the plaintiff to split and multiply actions at his pleasure. Upon a joint cause of action you cannot have several judgments *as you can in trespass, although [260 the defendants should plead severally.

If a note be given for a preexistent debt, you cannot have an action on the original cause of action, unless you can prove the note to be lost. (1 Johns., 36; 4 Esp. Rep., 159; 1 Com. Dig., 143, 144; 4 Bac. Abr., 48, 49; 2 Salk., 609; 2 Atk., 510, 609.)

But the plea states that the note was given and received in discharge of the prior debt; and there can be no doubt that, by agreement of the parties, a debt may be discharged in that way.

The declaration does not state any reason for not having made Mandeville a defendant to the first suit. It ought at least to have stated that the plaintiff did not know that Mandeville was a partner at the time of obtaining the judgment against Jamesson. If the plaintiff has any remedy, it must be in equity. If there can be a remedy at law, it must be upon a very special action on the case, setting forth all the circumstances.

If the plaintiff had at first an option to sue for goods sold and delivered, or upon the note, he has made his election to sue on the note, and having prosecuted that suit to judgment, he cannot afterwards sue for the goods sold and delivered. A man cannot have two judgments for the same cause of action. If the note did not destroy the right of action for goods sold, yet a judgment upon that note does.

A written instrument cannot be contradicted by parol evidence. The note purports to be the separate note of Jamesson. To show that it was a joint note is to contradict the tenor of the instrument.

If the defendants in a joint action of assumpsit sever in their pleas, this does not make it a separate action against each; and if the plaintiff does not show a joint cause of action against both, he cannot recover against either. There 261] could be no doubt that it would *be a good plea for Jamesson to say that the plaintiff had already recovered a judgment against him upon the same cause of action, which judgment was still in force. And a plea that would discharge Jamesson would discharge Mandeville also, because the plaintiff having declared upon a joint cause of action must prove it as laid; and if he had no cause of action against Jamesson, as well as against Mandeville, he had no joint cause of action as laid in his declaration.

Jones, in reply.

A judgment against one severally, upon a joint cause of action is no bar to a subsequent action against the others, upon the same cause of action.

A note given by one, for the precedent debt due by two, is nudum pactum.

A note cannot be a satisfaction of a precedent debt, unless payment be actually made of the note. (2 Cro., 152; 5 Co., 119; Whelpdale's case; 14 Vin., 607; 6 Co., 40, b; Cro. Jac., 74; 12 Mod., 538; 5 Mod., 136; Cro. Car., 85, 86; 1 Esp. Rep., 3, 5; 3 East, 256.)

Judgment may be severed when the parties plead severally. (Co. Litt., 127, b; Lutw., 9; 5 Com. Dig., 8 tit. Pleader, B., 9, 10; 11 Co., 5, Hayden's case; 1 Wils., 89; 1 Burr., 357.)

Jamesson is no party to this suit. Although arrested, he has never appeared, and the suit as against him has been abandoned. The court can give judgment against Mandeville only.

The plea amounts to the general issue, and therefore is bad upon demurrer. (Cro. Eliz., 201; 5 Mod., 314.)

March 14. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

The plaintiff sold certain goods to Robert B. 262] Jamesson, *a merchant of Alexandria, and took his note for the amount, which he put in suit, and prosecuted to a judgment. Afterwards, supposing the other defendant Mandeville to be a secret partner, he instituted a suit against Mandeville and Jamesson. The declaration contains three counts. The first is on the note, and charges it to have been made by the defendants under the name, firm and style of Robert B. Jamesson. The 2d and 3d counts are for goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendants, trading under the firm of Robert B. Jamesson.

The defendant Mandeville pleads two pleas in bar. The first goes to the whole declaration, and the second applies only to the first count.

The first commences with a protestation that the goods, &c., in the declaration mentioned were not sold to the defendants jointly, and then pleads in bar the promissory note which is averred to have been given and received for, and in discharge of, an account for sundry goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered to the said Jamesson, and that the goods in the declaration mentioned are the same which were sold and delivered to the said Jamesson, and for which the said note was given. The plea also avers, that a suit was instituted and judgment obtained on the note, and concludes in bar.

The second plea pleads the judgment in bar of the action.

To the first plea, the plaintiff demurs specially, and assigns for cause of demurrer,

1. That the defendant does not traverse the assumpsit laid in the declaration.

2. That he does not expressly confess or deny that the goods, &c., were sold and delivered to the defendants, trading under the firm of R. B. Jamesson, or that the note was given by the said firm.

*3. Because an unsatisfied judgment [263 against Jamesson is no bar to an action against Mandeville.

4. It is not averred that the judgment has been satisfied.

5. The defendant does not deny or admit that he assumed to pay for the goods, &c., in the declaration mentioned.

6. Because the plea is no answer to the declaration, or any count thereof, and is informal.

The defendant joins in demurrer.

To the second plea the plaintiff also demurs specially, and assigns, for cause of demurrer, the same, in substance, which had been assigned to the first plea, and the defendant joins in the demurrer to this plea likewise.

The other defendant, Jamesson, has put in no plea, nor are there any proceedings against him subsequent to the declaration.

Although the first plea is not expressly limited to the 2d and 3d counts, yet it would seem, from its terms, to be intended to apply to them alone. It sets up a bar to an action on an assumpsit for goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered, and no such assumpsit is laid in the first count.

If, however, it be considered as pleaded to the first count, it is clearly ill on demurrer. For it does not deny or avoid the joint assumpsit laid in that count.

It remains to inquire whether this plea contains a sufficient bar to the 2d and 3d counts.

The plea is, that the note was given and received for, and in discharge of, an account or bill for goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered by the plaintiff to Robert B. Jamesson, which are the same goods, &c., that are mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration.

264*] *That a note, without a special contract, would not, of itself, discharge the original cause of action, is not denied. But it is insisted that if, by express agreement, the note is received as payment, it satisfies the original contract, and the party receiving it must take his remedy on it.

This principle appears to be well settled. The note of one of the parties or of a third person may, by agreement, be received in payment. The doctrine of nudum pactum does not apply to such a case; for a man may, if such be his will, discharge his debtor without any consideration. But, if it did apply, there may be inducements to take a note from one partner liquidating and evidencing a claim on a firm which might be a sufficient consideration for discharging the firm. Since, then, the plaintiff has not taken issue on the averment that the note was given and received in discharge of the account, but has demurred to the plea, that fact is admitted; and, being admitted, it bars the action for the goods.

The special causes of demurrer which are assigned do not, in any manner, affect the case. Whether the promise was made by Mandeville, or not, ceases to be material, if a note has been received in discharge of that promise, and the payment of the note need not be averred, since its non-payment cannot revive the extinguished assumpsit.

The next subject of consideration is the second plea, which applies singly to the first count.

That count is on a note charged to have been made by Mandeville and Jamesson, trading under the firm of Robert B. Jamesson. This, not being denied, must be taken as true.

The plea is, that a judgment was rendered on this note against Robert B. Jamesson.

265*] *Were it admitted that this judgment bars an action against Robert B. Jamesson, the inquiry still remains, if Mandeville was originally bound; if a suit could be originally maintained against him; is the note, as to him, also merged in the judgment?

Had the action, in which judgment was obtained against Jamesson, been brought against the firm, the whole note would most probably have merged in that judgment. But that action was not brought against the firm. It was brought against Robert Brown Jamesson singly, and whatever other objections may be made to any subsequent proceedings on the same note, it cannot be correctly said that it is carried into judgment as respects Mandeville. If it were, the judgment ought in some manner to bind him, which most certainly it does not. The doctrine of merger (even admitting that a judgment against one of several joint obligors would terminate the whole obligation, so that a distinct action could not afterwards be maintained against the others, which is not admitted) can be applied only to a case in which the original declaration was on a joint covenant, not to a case in which the declaration in the first suit was on a sole contract.

In point of real justice there can be no reason why an unsatisfied judgment against Jamesson should bar a claim upon Mandeville; and it appears to the court that this claim is not barred by any technical rule of law, since the proceedings in the first action were instituted upon the assumpsit of Jamesson individually.

It is not necessary to decide whether this action could have been maintained against Mandeville singly with an averment that the note was made by Mandeville and Jamesson. The declaration being against both partners, that question does not arise. The declaration is clearly good in itself, and the plaintiff may recover under it, unless he be barred by a sufficient plea.

Admitting, for the present, that a previous judgment *against Jamesson would be [266 a sufficient bar, as to him, had Jamesson and Mandeville joined in the same plea, it would have presented an inquiry of some intricacy, how far the benefit of that bar could be extended to Maudeville.

But they have not joined in the same plea. They have severed; and as the whole note is not merged in a judgment obtained against Jamesson, on his individual assumpsit, the court is not of opinion that Mandeville has so pleaded this matter as to bar the action.

In this plea it was necessary to negative the averment of the declaration, that the note was made by Mandeville as well as Jamesson, or to show that the judgment was satisfied. The defendant has not done so. He has only stated affirmatively new matter in bar of the action, which new matter, as stated, does not furnish a sufficient bar. It is not certain that this plea would have been good on a general demurrer, but on a special demurrer it is clearly ill.

The judgment, therefore, is to be reversed, and, as no other plea is pleaded, judgment must be rendered, on the first count, in favor of the plaintiff.

The judgment of the court was as follows: This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof the court is of opinion, that there is error in the judgment of the Circuit Court in overruling the demurrer to the first plea, so far as the same is pleaded in bar of the first count in the declaration, and that there is error in overruling the demurrer to the second plea; wherefore it is considered by this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the first plea so far as the same is pleaded in bar of the first count, in the plaintiff's declaration, and also to sustain the demurrer to the second plea, and to render *judgment in favor of the [267 plaintiff on his said first count, and to award a writ of inquiry of damages.[1]

1.—After the opinion was given, C. Lee moved for a direction to the court below to allow a plea of non assumpsit. The court said they had never given directions respecting amendments, but had left that question to the court below. This court cannot now undertake to say whether the court below would be justified in granting leave to amend.

SKILLERN'S EXECUTORS
v.
MAY'S EXECUTORS.

It is too late to question the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court after the cause has been sent back by mandate.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, the judges of that court being divided in opinion.

The former decree of the court below had been reversed in this court, and the cause "remanded for further proceedings to be had therein, in order that an equal and just partition of the 2,500 acres of land, mentioned in the assignment of the 6th of March, 1785, be made between the legal representatives of the said George Skillern and the said John May." (Vide ante, vol. 4, p. 141.)

The cause being before the court below upon the mandate, the question occurred which is stated in the following certificate, viz.: "In this case a final decree had been pronounced, and by writ of error removed to the Supreme Court, who reversed the decree, and after the cause was sent back to this court it was discovered to be a cause not within the jurisdiction of the court; but a question arose whether it can now be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, after the Supreme Court had acted thereon. The opinion of the judges of this court being opposed on this question, it is ordered "that the same be adjourned to the Supreme Court for their decision," &c.

This court, after consideration, directed the following opinion to be certified to the court below, viz.:

268*] *"It appearing that the merits of this cause had been finally decided in this court, and that its mandate required only the execution of its decree, it is the opinion of this court that the Circuit Court is bound to carry that decree into execution, although the jurisdiction of that court be not alleged in the pleadings."

THE CHESAPEAKE INSURANCE COMPANY
v.
STARK.

The agent who makes insurance for his principal has authority to abandon without a formal letter of attorney.

The informality of a deed of session is unimportant, because, if the abandonment be unexceptionable, the property vests immediately in the underwriters, and the deed is not essential to the right of either party.

If the abandonment be legal, it puts the underwriters completely in the place of the assured, and the agent of the assured becomes the agent of the underwriters.

A special verdict is defective which does not find whether the abandonment was in reasonable time.

What is reasonable time of abandonment is a question compounded of fact and law, which must be found by a jury under the direction of the court.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant upon a policy of insurance upon goods on board the ship Minerva, from Philadelphia to Laguira, and back to Philadelphia.

The cause was tried upon the issue of non infregit conventionem, and the jury found a special verdict, stating the following facts:

On the 5th of March, 1807, Christian Dannenberg, as agent of the plaintiff, who was a citizen of Pennsylvania, shipped for Laguira, on account, and at the sole risk, of the plaintiff, sundry goods, being American property, and regularly documented as such, to the value of 8,700 dollars and upwards, on board the ship Minerva, and consigned them to William Parker, supercargo on board. On the 12th of March she sailed with the goods from Philadelphia for Laguira.

On the 21st of March, Charles G. Boerstler, for the plaintiff, effected an insurance with the Chesapeake Insurance Company, who are citizens of the state of Marylaud, upou the goods, to the amount of 8,700 dollars, by the policy mentioned in the declaration, which was exeeuted under the common seal of the company.

On the outward voyage she was captured by a British privateer and carried iuto Curracoa. On the 29th of April, 1807, the captain made a protest. On the 13th *of June, 1807, [269 the ship and goods being still in possession of the captors at Curracoa, and there detained by them, the said Charles G. Boerstler, "for the plaintiff," abandoned to the Chesapeake Insurance Company, the goods shipped by Dannenberg for the plaintiff, by a letter to the president and directors of the Chesapeake Insurance Company, the defendauts, in the words and figures following:

"Baltimore, June 13, 1807.

"President and Directors of the Chesapeake Insurance Company,

"Gentlemen,

"Having this morning received a letter from Mr. C. Dannenberg, of Philadelphia, the agent for Mr. John Philip Stark, of Hanover, ordering me to abandon the goods shipped by him, for Mr. Stark's account, on board the American ship Minerva, Captain Neweomb, carried into and detained at Curracoa, on her voyage from Philadelphia to Laguira, whereby the object of the expedition is totally frustrated and destroyed; I herewith abandon to you the whole of Mr. Stark's interest in the cargo of the Minerva, which you have insured in your office.

"I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your "most obedient servant,

"CHARLES G. BOERSTLER."

Which abandonment the defendants then refused to aecept.

W. Parker, the supercargo, addressed a memorial to the governor of Curracoa, on the 19th of June, 1810, in which he complains of the detention as being of the most ruinous consequences to the owners.

On the 25th of July, 1807, the vessel and cargo being still detained at Curracoa, in the possession of the captors, Parker entered into an agreement with I. F. Burke, the owner of the privateer, by which a certain *part of the [270 goods should be appraised and the price paid by Parker, to be repaid by Burke in case the goods should not be adjudged good prize; and that a certain other part should be kept by Burke, upon his engaging to pay the value thereof in the like ease. In consequence of which agreement the vessel was liberated, and proceeded to Laguira, where the goods were sold, and produced about 5,900 dollars.

Parker employed an agent to attend the trial at Tortola, and to claim the goods for the plaintiff; but a trial was never had, nor any proceedings instituted for the purpose of obtaining an adjudication.

On the 22d of August, 1807, Dannenberg, as agent of the plaintiff, executed a deed to the Chesapeake Insurance Company, transferring to them all his right and title to the goods, as attorney of the plaintiff, which deed they refused to receive.

Winder and Martin, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the contract by Parker with Burke was either the personal contract of Parker or the contract of Stark, and was the cause of the loss.

2. That there was no sufficient abandonment. Dannenberg was the agent of the plaintiff to make the shipment, but he had no power to abandon, nor to transfer to the defendants the rights of the plaintiff. Much less could Boerstler, the friend of Dannenberg. If the vessel and cargo had returned after the abandonment, there was nothing to prevent Stark from claiming. The deed of cession ought to have been under the plaintiff's seal, or a power of attorney, under seal, should be produced.

3. The abandonment was not in due time.

Harper, contra.

If the authority of Dannenberg to abandon 271] does not *appear in the special verdict, nor the time when he received notice of the loss, this court will award a venire facias de novo, because the jury have found the evidence of the authority and time, but not the fact of authority, nor the reasonableness of the time.

In a mercantile transaction no instrument under seal is necessary. The letter is found which states the fact of abandonment, and the jury find the agency of Dannenberg. The letter states the authority of Boerstler, and the jury have found his authority. This throws the burden of proof on the other side. The deed of cession from Dannenberg states that he acts for Stark, and as his attorney. The jury find that it was done by Dannenberg for Stark. It was not necessary that the deed should have been executed in the name of Stark. It is as well if it be signed by Dannenberg, as his agent or attorney.

After the abandonment Parker became the agent of the underwriters, who were then the owners. It is a general principle that all acts done bona fide for the best interest of all concerned, are the acts of the underwriters, after a rightful abandonment. The assured cannot then revoke: nor can the underwriters throw back the property, without the consent of the assured.

Martin, in reply.

The question is, whether the assured can elect by attorney to abandon. Parker could not be considered as the agent of the underwriters, in doing an act which could not benefit them.

The plea of non infregit was decided, before the statute of jeofails, to be an informal, but not an immaterial plea. (1 Sid., 183; 1 Lev., 290.) It would have been bad upon special demurrer, but it is aided by the verdict. No other form of pleading has ever been used in Maryland, upon a sealed policy.

*March 14. MARSHALL, Ch. J., deliv- [272
ered the opinion of the court as follows:

On the principal question in this case the court can entertain no doubt. On the capture of the Minerva, the right to abandon was complete, and this right was exercised during her detention.

The objections to the form of the abandonment are not deemed substantial. The agent who made the insurance might certainly be credited, and, in transactions of this kind, always is credited, when he declares that, by the order of his principal, he abandons to the underwriters. In this case, the jury find that the abandonment was made for the plaintiff; and this finding establishes that fact.

The informality of the deed of cession is thought unimportant, because, if the abandonment was unexceptionable, the property vested immediately in the underwriters, and the deed was not essential to the right of either party. Had it been demanded and refused, that circumstance might have altered the law of the case.

If the abandonment was legal, it put the underwriters completely in the place of the assured, and Parker became their agent. When he contracts on behalf of the owners of the goods, he contracts on behalf of the underwriters, who have become owners, not on behalf of Stark, who has ceased to be one. His act is no longer the act of Stark, and is not to be considered as an interference, on his part, which may affect the abandonment. If any particular instructions had been given on this subject, if any act of ownership had been exerted by Stark himself, such conduct might be construed into a relinquishment of an abandonment which had not been accepted; but as nothing of the kind exists, the act of the supercargo is to be considered as the act of the persons interested, whoever they may be.

*The only point which presents any [273
difficulty in the opinion of the court, is the objection founded on the omission, in the verdict, to find that the abandonment was made in reasonable time.

The law is settled that an abandonment, to be effectual, must be made in reasonable time; but what time is reasonable is a question compounded of fact and law, which has not yet been reduced to such certainty as to enable the court to pronounce upon it, without the aid of a jury. Certainly the delay may be so great as to enable every man to declare, without hesitation, that it is unreasonable, or the abandonment may be so immediate that all will admit it to have been made in reasonable time; but there may be such a medium between these extremes as to render it doubtful whether the delay has been reasonable or otherwise. If it was a mere question of law which the court might decide, then the law would determine, to a day or an hour, on the time left for deliberation, after receiving notice of the loss. But the law has not so determined, and it therefore remains a question compounded of fact and law, which must be found by a jury under the direction of the court.

In this case the jury have found an abandonment, but have not found whether it was made in due time or otherwise. The fact is, therefore, found defectively; and for that reason a venire facias de novo must be awarded.

It may not be amiss to remark that the judicial opinions which we generally find in the books, on these subjects, are usually given by way of instruction to the jury, or on a motion for a new trial, not on special verdicts. The distinction between the cases deserves consideration.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to award a venire facias de novo.

274*] *LIVINGSTON AND GILCHRIST v. THE MARYLAND INSURANCE CO.

If the interest of one joint owner of a cargo be insured, and if that interest be neutral, it is no breach of the warranty of neutrality if the other joint owner, whose interest is not insured, be a belligerent.

The assured are not understood to warrant that the whole cargo is neutral, but that the interest insured is neutral.

The effect of a misrepresentation or concealment, upon a policy, depends upon its materiality to the risk, which must be decided by a jury under the direction of a court.

The right to abandon may be kept in suspense by mutual consent.

If foreign laws and regulations respecting trade be not proved to have been in writing as public edicts, they may be proved by parol.

If a vessel take on board papers which increase the risk of capture, and if it be not the regular usage of the trade insured to take such papers, the non-disclosure of the fact that they would be on board will vacate the policy.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant upon a policy (of insurance against capture only) upon goods laden on board the ship Herkimer from Guyaquil, or her last port of discharge in South America, to New York; the goods were warranted to be American property, "proof of which to be required in the United States only." The ship and cargo were captured by a British ship of war and condemned at Halifax as prize.

The defense set up by the underwriters was,

1. That one Baruso, a Spanish subject, was interested in the cargo, and that Baruso being a subject of one of the belligerents, the warranty of neutrality was forfeited.

2. That certain Spanish papers were found on board stating the cargo to be the property of Baruso, and although Baruso might not be interested in the cargo, yet these papers, not being necessary, according to the usual course of the trade, were the cause of the condemnation, and as this cause proceeded from the act of the insured, the underwriters were not liable.

3. That although the interest of the plaintiffs Livingston & Gilchrist, was neutral, yet the concealment of the interest of Baruso vitiated the policy.

4. That the abandonment was not made in due time.

To these objections the plaintiffs answered,

1. That Baruso was not part owner of the goods; he had only a contingent interest in the profits of the voyage. That the subject insured was only the interest *of the plaintiffs, [*275 which was strictly neutral property.

2. That the Spanish papers were necessary to carry on the voyage insured, according to the nature and course of the trade.

3. That the interest of Baruso was not such as they were bound to disclose.

Upon the trial of the issue of non infregit conventionem, the jury found a special verdict; and a bill of exceptions was taken by the plaintiffs in error to the instruction of the court to the jury, that parol evidence was not competent to prove, "that according to the uniform and long-standing laws of Spain, relative to the trade of her colonies in America, and especially of Peru, no goods could, at and about the time of the making the policy in the declaration mentioned, be imported into, or exported from, the colony of Peru, from, or to any other than a Spanish port in Europe, or in any other than a Spanish bottom, without a special license from the King of Spain for that purpose, and that such licenses, at and about the said time, were never granted, with respect to the said colony of Peru, to any but Spanish subjects; and that, according to the constant course and usage of the trade, to and from that colony, under such licenses, it was usual and necessary for the property to appear, in the said colony, and at its departure therefrom, as the property of a Spanish subject, and of the person holding the license, to be accompanied by such Spanish papers as were necessary to give it that appearance, and to be cleared out as such from the port of departure in Peru; such licenses, not being avowedly transferable; although by observing the above-mentioned formalities and precautions, American property, at and about the said time, might be, and sometimes was, imported into, and exported from, the said colony by American citizens, by virtue, and under the protection, of such licenses."

The order for insurance, which was supposed to *amount to a representation that the [*276 whole cargo was neutral property, was contained in a letter from the plaintiff Gilchrist to Webster & Co., at Baltimore, in which he says: "On the recommendation of Messrs. Church & Demmill, I take the liberty of requesting you to effect insurance in your city on the cargo of the ship Herkimer, Church, master, from Guyaquil, or her last port of departure in South America, to New York, against loss by capture only, warranted American property, and free from all loss on account of seizure, for illicit or prohibited trade. The owners are already insured against the dangers of the seas, and all other risks except that of capture. You will please to insure to the amount of fifty thousand dollars in valued policies. You have already had a description of the ship from Messrs. Church & Demmill, the agents of Mr. Jackson, who is the owner, and which I presume is correct. By a letter received from Mr. James Baxter, the supercargo, dated at Lima, the 23d of September, 1805, he did not expect the Herkimer would sail from Guyaquil until the last of February. I think proper to mention that the insurance will be on account of Mr. Brockholst Livingston and myself. Mr.

Baxter and Mr. Griswold are also concerned, but the first gentleman thinks there is so little danger of capture, that in his letter from Lima he expressly directs no insurance to be made for him against this risk, and Mr. Griswold is not here to consult. Both these gentlemen, as well as those for whom you are desired to make insurance, are native Americans."

The description of the ship, as given by Church & Demmill, and referred to in the above letter, was as follows: "She is a fine ship of about 400 tons burden, about three years old, sheathed and coppered to the bends, built in the state of New York, and her owner a native American citizen. She sailed from Boston on the 12th day of May last, bound for Lima, with liberty to go to one other port in South America, not west of Guyaquil and from thence to New York.

"She has permission to trade there."

277*] *On the 5th of June, 1806, the plaintiff, Gilchrist, wrote to Webster & Co. at Baltimore, informing them of the capture of the vessel, and that the plaintiffs had sent an agent to Halifax to act in behalf of the concerned, and desiring that this information should be communicated to the underwriters, and assurances that the plaintiffs should act throughout with due regard to their respective interests. He then says: "I should like them to approbate the owners in taking every measure they may judge best for our mutual interest, without prejudice to our right. I ought likewise to mention that one of the owners has also gone in her, so the underwriters will observe every measure calculated to protect their and our interest has been speedily pursued." This letter was laid before the underwriters, who returned it with their answer indorsed thereon "read and approved."

On the 22d of August, 1806, after the condemnation in the Court of Vice-Admiralty, the plaintiffs abandoned to the underwriters.

The cause was argued at great length by Harper, for the plaintiffs in error, and by Winder, Key and Martin, for the defendants, but their arguments were principally upon points not decided by the court.

March 16. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In this case several questions have occurred, on which the court has not yet formed an opinion. The application of rules and principles, which have been framed for an action on the case, to an action of covenant, is an operation of some difficulty. The court has not decided with precision, on the extent of the plea, that the defendant has not broken his covenant, nor on the testimony which may be admitted under that plea. Some difficulty, also, arises from the circumstances, that the parties have gone to trial under the expectation that the whole 278*] merits of the case were *open, under the issue which was joined, and that such expectation was authorized by the invariable usage of the courts of Maryland, and of the Circuit Court sitting in that state.

Upon the inspection of the special verdict in this case, it is supposed that, however these points may be decided, a venire facias de novo would probably be awarded; and, as the delay of a term would be a great inconvenience to the parties, it is deemed advisable to award it now.

There are, however, some points, which have been argued at great length, on which an opinion has been formed, which will now be delivered.

It is essential, in this form of action especially, to distinguish accurately between the warranty contained in the policy and those extrinsic circumstances, such as misrepresentation or concealment, which have been deemed sufficient to discharge the underwriters. Although the effect of a breach of a warranty and of a material misrepresentation may be the same on a policy, yet they cannot be confounded together in deciding on pleadings or on a special verdict.

The warranty, in this case, is in these words: "Warranted, by the assured, to be American property, proof of which to be required in the United States only."

The interest insured is admitted to be American property, in the strictest sense of the term; but it is contended that Baruso, a Spanish subject, had an interest in the cargo, which falsifies the warranty.

Whether Baruso could be considered as having an interest in the cargo, or not, is a question of some intricacy, which the court has not decided; and which, if determined in the one way or the other, would not affect the warranty; because, the assured are not understood to warrant that the whole cargo is neutral, but that the interest insured is neutral.

*If the assured represented the whole [279 cargo to be neutral, when it was not, or if they concealed the interest of a belligerent, when it ought to have been disclosed, which facts this court neither affirm nor deny, the effect of the misrepresentation or concealment on the policy depends on its materiality to the risk. This must be decided by a jury under the direction of a court. In this case, it has not been decided. Consequently, were it even to be admitted that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, these facts might be taken into consideration, without being specially pleaded, a venire facias de novo would be necessary, in order to ascertain their materiality.

So, too, with respect to the Spanish papers found on board.

It is said that the verdict finds their materiality, by finding that the fair premium on American property disguised as Spanish, on the voyage insured, was twenty-five per cent., whereas the premium, in this case, was only ten per cent.

But, it does not appear to the court that this property was, by these papers, disguised as Spanish. It is found to have been the constant course of the trade to have them on board, and, consequently, they cannot be understood to disguise the property as Spanish, when there are other papers which prove it to be American.

It is, too, as yet, undecided that this matter could be given in evidence on this issue.

Although this verdict, and these pleadings, do not present the merits of the cause in such form as to enable the court to decide them, there are some insulated points from which the cause may be relieved.

The reference to the letter of Church and Demmill, which was made by the assured, in their letter of the 26th of March, to Alexander 280*] Webster & Co., has *been treated both as a representation, and as a warranty, which is falsified by the sentence of condemnation.

There is no color for this opinion.

Most clearly it is not a warranty, for it is not introduced into the policy; and if it were a representation, it only goes to the actnal state of the ship at the time, not to her future conduct.

But it is not even a representation. Marshall, 336, is full and clear on this point.

The letter of the assnred, of the 5th of June, is understood to ask the permission of the underwriters to keep their right to abandon in a state of snspense, and the note made by the president and directors, on that letter, is understood as granting that permission. It is difficult to ascribe this letter to any other motive.

It has been asked, for how long a time is this permission given? The answer is obvious. It is, at least, to continue while the property continued in its then situation, unless it should be sooner determined by one of the parties. The assured might abandon previous to the sentence, or immediately afterwards; and the underwriters might, at any time, require the assured to elect immediately, either to abandon or to waive the right so to do. Since they have not made this communication, their original permission continued in force. But the jury have not found that the abandonment was or was not in due time.

It is, also, the opinion of the court that, as the laws and regulations by which this trade was regulated are not proved to have been in writing, as public edicts, bnt may have depended on instructions to the governor, they may be proved by parol.

The judgment is to be reversed, because the special verdict is defective; and the cause remanded, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

281*] *In the second case, it is ordered to be certified, that, if the jury should be of opinion that the Spanish papers, mentioned in this case, were material to the risk, and that it was not the regular usage of the trade insured to take such papers on board, the non-disclosure of the fact that they would be on board would vitiate the policy; but if the jury should be of opinion that they were not material to the risk, or that it was the regular usage of the trade to take such papers on board, that they would not vitiate the policy.

HUDSON AND SMITH v. GUESTIER.

The jurisdiction of the French courts as to seizures, is not confined to seizures made within two leagues of the coast.

A seizure, beyond the limits of the territorial jurisdiction, for breach of a municipal regulation, is warranted by the law of nations.

When the reversal is in favor of the defendant upon a bill of exceptions, a new trial must be awarded by the court below.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland; in an action of trover for coffee and logwood, the cargo of the brig Sea Flower, which had been captured by the French, for trading to the revolted ports of the island of Hispaniola, contrary to the ordinances of France, and carried into the Spanish port of Baracoa, but condemned by a French tribunal at Gnadaloupe, and sold for the benefit of the captors, and purchased by the defendant Guestier.

Upon the former trial of this case in the court below, a statement of certain facts was agreed to by the counsel for the parties, and read in evidence to the jury, who then found a verdict for the plaintiffs. One of the facts so admitted, and which was then deemed wholly immaterial by both parties, was, that the Sea Flower was captured within one league of the coast of the island of Hispaniola. Upon this fact, which was the only fact in which this case differed from that of Rose v. Himely (ante, vol. 4, p. 241), the Supreme Court reversed the first judgment of the court below (see ante, vol. 4, p. 293), which had been for the plaintiffs, and remanded the cause for further proceedings.

Upon the second trial in the court below, the verdict and judgment were for the defendant.

*The plaintiffs took a bill of exceptions [282 to the opinion of the court, who directed the jury "that if they find from the evidence produced, that the brig Sea Flower had traded with the insurgents at Port au Prince, in the island of St. Domingo, and had there purchased a cargo of coffee and logwood, and, having cleared at the said port, and coming from the same, was captured by a French privateer, duly commissioned as such, within six leagues of the island of St. Heneague, a dependency of St. Domingo, for a breach of said municipal regulations, that in such case the capture of the Sea Flower was legal, although such capture was made at the distance of six leagues from the said island of St. Domingo, or St. Heneague, its dependency, and beyond the territorial limits or jurisdiction of said island, and that the said capture, possession, subsequent condemnation and sale of the said Sea Flower, with her cargo, devested the said cargo out of the plaintiffs, and the property therein became vested in the purchaser."

Harper, for the plaintiffs in error.

The main question in this case is, whether the French tribunal at Gnadaloupe had jurisdiction of a seizure, under the municipal law of St. Domingo, of a vessel seized more than two leagues distant from the coast.

This question was decided by this court in this cause when it was here before. In the case of Rose v. Himely (ante, vol. 4, p. 241), this court decided, that the French tribnnal had not jurisdiction because the seizure was made more than two leagnes' distance from the coast; and in this case (ante, vol. 4, p. 293), this court decided that the French tribunal had jurisdiction, because it appeared by the statement of facts that the vessel was seized within one league from the coast. So also the cases of Palmer & Higgins v. Dutilli, and Hargous v. The Brig Ceres (ante, vol. 4, p. 298, in note), were remanded for further proceedings, because it did not appear whether the seizures in those cases were made within two leagues of the coast.

P. B. Key and Martin, contra. A nation has a *right to use all the means necessary [283 to enforce obedience to its municipal regulations and laws. It has a right to enforce its municipal laws of trade beyond its territorial jurisdiction. This right is exercised, both by Great Britain and America, to enforce their respective revenue laws. The only limit to this right is the principle that you do not thereby invade the exclusive rights of other nations. The arretes relative to the trade of St. Domingo do not limit the jurisdiction of their tribunals to seizures made within two leagues of the coast.

The French ordonnances, referred to in the sentence of condemnation, embrace four distinct descriptions of vessels.

1. Those found at anchor, &c.

2. Those cleared for ports in possession of the revolters.

3. Those coming out of the interdicted ports, with or without a cargo; and,

4. Vessels sailing in the territorial extent of the island, found within two leagues of the coast.

The distance of two leagues expressed in the ordonnance, is limited to the last description, and does not apply to either of the three first. It is tantamount to the hovering acts of Great Britain and the United States. Neither the object nor the policy of the law would admit such a construction. If a vessel had been trading with the blacks, she had only to wait for a fair wind, slip out of port, and in half an hour to be beyond the line of the jurisdiction.

March 17. LIVINGSTON, J. In this case, when here before, I dissented from the opinion of the court, because I did not think that the condemnation of a French court at Guadaloupe, of a vessel and cargo lying in the port of 284] *another nation, had changed the property: but this ground, which was the only one taken by two of the judges in this case, and by three in that of Himely v. Rose, and was principally and almost solely relied on at bar, was overruled by a majority of the court, as will appear by examining those two cases, which were decided the same day. I am not, therefore, in determining this cause as it now comes up, at liberty to proceed upon it; and such must have been the opinion of Judge Chase, on the trial of it, who was one of the court who had proceeded on that principle.

Considering it, then, as settled that the French tribunal had jurisdiction of property seized under a municipal regulation, within the territorial jurisdiction of the government of St. Domingo, it only remains for me to say whether it will make any difference if, as now appears to have been the case, the vessel were taken on the high seas, or more than two leagues from the coast. If the res can be proceeded against when not in the possession or under the control of the court, I am not able to perceive how it can be material whether the capture were made within or beyond the jurisdictional limits of France; or in the exercise of a belligerent or municipal right. By a seizure on the high seas she interfered with the jurisdiction of no other nation, the authority of each being there concurrent. It would seem also that, if jurisdiction be at all permitted where the thing is elsewhere, the court exercising it must necessarily decide, and that ultimately, or subject only to the review of a superior tribunal of its own state, whether, in the particular case, she had jurisdiction, if any objection be made to it. And, although it be now stated, as a reason why we should examine whether a jurisdiction was rightfully exercised over the Sea Flower, that she was captured more than two leagues at sea, who can say that this very allegation, if it had been essential, may not have been urged before the French court, and the fact decided in the negative? And, if so, why should not its decision be as conclusive on this as on any other point? The judge must have had a right to dispose of every question which was made on behalf of the owner of the property, *whether it related to his own jur- [285 isdiction or arose out of the law of nations, or out of the French decrees, or in any other way: and, even if the reasons of his judgment should not appear satisfactory, it would be no reason for a foreign court to review his proceedings, or not to consider his sentence as conclusive on the property.

Believing, therefore, that this property was changed by its condemnation at Guadaloupe, the original owner can have no right to pursue it in the hands of any vendee under that sentence, and the judgment below must, therefore, be affirmed.

The other judges (except the Chief Justice) concurred.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., observed, that he had supposed that the former opinion delivered in these cases upon this point had been concurred in by four judges. But in this he was mistaken.

The opinion was concurred in by one judge. He was still of opinion that the construction then given was correct.

He understood the expression en sortant, in the arrete, as confining the case of vessels coming out, to vessels taken in the act of coming out. If it included vessels captured on the return voyage, he should concur in the opinion now delivered.

However, the principle of that case (Rose v. Himely) is now overruled.

Judgment affirmed.[1]

*SMITH [286

v.

THE STATE OF MARYLAND, AT THE INSTANCE AND FOR THE USE OF CARROLL AND MACCUBBIN.

A writ of error lies to the highest court of a state, in a case where the question is whether a confisea-

1.—TODD, J., stated that in the case of Rose v. Himely, at February term, 1808, he concurred in opinion with Judge Johnson.

Harper stated that one of the judges of the court below had doubted whether, when a case is reversed upon a bill of exceptions and remanded, the court below ought to grant a new trial.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. If it be upon a special verdict, or case agreed, the court above will proceed to give judgment. But when a verdict in favor of a plaintiff is reversed, on a bill of exceptions to instructions given to the jury, there must be a new trial awarded by the court below.

tion under the law of the state was complete before the treaty of peace with Great Britain.

By the confiscating acts of Maryland the equitable interests of British subjects were confiscated, without office found, or entry or other act done, and although such equitable interests were not discovered until long after the peace.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Maryland, being the highest court of law and equity in that state; and which affirmed the decree of the chancellor of Maryland.

The facts of the case appear to be correctly stated in the decree of the chancellor, which was as follows:

"The material facts appearing in this case are, that on the 4th of July, 1774, the lands mentioned in the bill were conveyed by Anne Ottey, heir at law of William Ottey, to William Smith, one of the defendants, and that an act of assembly passed in June, 1779, for recording the deed of conveyance which had not been recorded within the time limited by law. That on the 5th of July, 1774, Smith executed a bond of conveyance to Anne Ottey, widow of William Ottey, and that at the time of passing the act of October, 1780, (c. 45), 'to seize, confiscate and appropriate all British property within this state,' he held the said lands under the said deed, subject to the terms of the said bond of conveyance, and in trust for the said Anne Ottey, then and now a British subject, and that the lands are now held in the same manner. That on the 27th of April, 1801, the complainants, Carroll and Maccubbin, gave information of this property being so held, to the state's agent, and claimed the composition held out by law on the said information. That on the 22d of February, 1803, the Governor and council agreed to sell the state's right to the said lands to the said Carroll and Maccubbin. That a survey was made and a plat returned and bond given for the purchase money on the 30th of April, 1803.

"The object of the bill is to compel the defendant Smith to produce in this court all deeds, papers and writings respecting the said 287] land, and to convey the *same to the said Carroll and Maccubbin, and for general relief, &c.

"The positions relied on by the complainants in their notes are, that the property so held in trust for a British subject, or in which a British subject had an equitable interest, but no legal estate, was liable to confiscation under the laws of this state, and was confiscated by them; and that there is nothing in any treaty between the United States and Great Britain to protect the said property, or to prevent its being liable to their claim.

"For the defendants it is contended that the 6th article of the treaty of the 3d of September, 1783, declaring that there should be no future confiscations made, had the effect of preventing any transfer, by the executive, of property which might have been confiscated, but was only legally, and not actually, transferred from private to public use, or from the possessor to the state; and that such transfer by the executive must be considered as a future confiscation, or setting apart for the public, property, the use of which an individual had, and therefore contrary to the stipulations of the treaty. And it is also contended that under the 9th article of the British treaty of the 19th of November, 1794, (by which it was agreed that the British subjects who then held lands in the territories of the United States should continue to hold them according to the nature and tenor of their respective estates and titles therein), this property is protected, being then held by the defendant Smith, as agent of and for Anne Ottey, a British subject, and therefore then held by her.

"In a case of this nature where an important question as to the operation of a treaty arises, it would be satisfactory to the chancellor to have the opinion of a court of law, or its judges. The late change in the judiciary has, however, rendered the obtaining such an opinion less practicable than it formerly was; and it appears also that the most material ground taken by the defendants has been already decided on by the general court in the case of Norwood's Lessee v. Owings.

*"A number of points were decided in [288 that case, but the one most applicable to the present question was the determination by the court, or the opinion expressed, that the state of Maryland by their commissioners was in possession of all British property within the limits of the state, under and by virtue of the act of confiscation, October, 1780, (c. 45), and the act of the same session (c. 49), to appoint commissioners, &c.: and the possession of the said land was in the state of Maryland at the time the said Edward Norwood obtained his escheat warrant, and that no British subject could hold land in the state of Maryland on the 19th of November, 1794, the time when the treaty was entered into between Great Britain and the United States.

"It is not necessary at this time to declare any opinion as to the intent and meaning of the 9th article of that treaty, or to ascertain to what part of the territories of the United States it might have applied. It is sufficient to observe that according to the opinion of the general court, standing as yet unreversed, it could not apply to this state.

"There is nothing in this case to induce the chancellor to determine contrary to that opinion; and if the holding of the land by Smith for Anne Ottey was a holding by her in October, 1780, and occasioned its confiscation, it cannot be considered that she held the land in November, 1794, so as to be enabled, by the 9th article of the treaty with Great Britain then made, to continue to hold it according to the nature and tenor of her estate.

"The words of the 2d section of the act of October, 1780, (c. 45), are, 'That all property within this state (debts only excepted), belonging to British subjects shall be seized, and is hereby confiscated to the use of this state,' and under this general expression, it is considered that land in which the legal title was held by a citizen of this state in trust for a British subject (as is the case now in question), was included.

*"That this was the construction [289 given to the act appears from the subsequent conduct of the legislature and the executive of this state, and particularly by the first section of the act of 1784 (c. 81), which directs, that the intendant of the revenue be authorized and required to call on all persons having confiscated British property in their possession, or the title papers thereof, or relating thereto, to discover and deliver up the same; and if the said intendant has probable and good ground to suspect that any person holds the same in trust for any British subject, or conceals the same, or any deeds, writings or evidence of the titles to such property, he may and shall direct the Attorney-General to file a bill in the High Court of Chancery, on behalf of this state, for the discovery of such trust or concealed property, and for delivering up such deeds, writings, and evidence of title, to the same; thereupon proceedings shall be had, and decree made, according to the rules of the High Court of Chancery in such cases.

"And it will be observed that, by the fifth article of the treaty of 1783, the recommendation to be made for a restitution of property confiscated, extends to all estates, rights and properties.

"If, then, this property was confiscated, and the right to it vested in the state by the acts of October, 1780, (c. 45, and c. 49), the chancellor does not perceive how it can be affected by the sixth article of the treaty of 1783, declaring that there should be no future confiscations made.

"The future acts of confiscation to be restrained by that article were absolute confiscations, and not the dispositions that might be necessary for those which had been made.

"Such dispositions might have been the subject of consideration, if the recommendations made for a restitution of property confiscated, had been complied with by this state.

"Considering, then, the lands in question to 290] have been *confiscated, and that the right of the state, or those claiming under the state, is not affected by either of the treaties which have been relied on, it remains only to inquire as to the grounds of the complainants' application to this court, and the nature of the relief to which they may be entitled.

"The act of 1802 (c. 100), under which the complainants allege that the purchase was made, declares, that it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons purchasing as aforesaid any confiscated British property under the authority of this act, to prosecute any suit or suits, either in law or equity, in the name of the state, for recovery of said property for their use.

"If this property had not been sold, it might have been competent for the state to have proceeded by suit to devest the legal estate from the defendant William Smith; and it seems consonant to equity, and to the provisions of the act just mentioned, that in the present case it should be vested in the complainants, who were the purchasers from the state."

Then follows the formal part of the decree, that Smith should convey the land to Carroll and Maccubbin. From this decree Smith appealed to the Court of Appeals of Maryland, who confirmed the decree; whereupon he brought his writ of error to this court, under the provisions of the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, (Laws U. S., vol. 1, p. 63), the decision being against the right claimed under the treaty.

Johnson, for the plaintiff in error.

The question in the case is, whether a British subject, who, in fact, by her agent and trustee, held land in Maryland, before the revolution, and continued to hold it undisturbed until the year 1802, is protected by the treaties; or whether our acts of confiscation were so operative as to enable an informer, in a court of equity, to compel the trustee to convey the legal estate to him.

*This depends upon the true con- [291 struction of the acts of assembly of Maryland, and of the treaties with Great Britain.

It is for this court to decide whether the construction which the Maryland courts have given to their acts of assembly be consistent with the true construction of those treaties.

The 5th and 6th articles of the treaty of peace of the 3d of September, 1783, (Laws U. S., vol. 1, p. 482), relate to this subject, and are both to be taken into view in order to ascertain what the 6th article means when it says "there shall be no future confiscations made."

By the 5th article it is agreed that Congress shall earnestly recommend the restitution of confiscated property belonging to real British subjects, and also of persons resident in districts in the possession of His Majesty's arms, who had not borne arms against the United States. This was contemplated to be done without payment therefor. But as to the refugees who had borne arms against the United States, Congress was to recommend restitution only upon the terms of payment (to any person who might then be in possession) of the price which had been paid for the purchase thereof since confiscation. But if the property had not been sold, even they were not to pay for their estates, although the state might have discovered, seized and possessed them. This was the spirit of reconciliation which was entertained between the parties at that time, and ought not to be forgotten in construing the treaty. These, however, were cases where the state had actually possessed themselves of the property, and had used or disposed of it. In those cases the interposition of the state was necessary to give effect to the intention of that part of the treaty. The fifth section, therefore, relates entirely to confiscations actually made and finished, and where the state sovereignties had possessed, and used, or disposed of the property. But the cases of inchoate confiscation, where the possession had not been devested, where the party still enjoyed the property, but where the states would, under the *existing [292 laws, have a right to seize and possess themselves of the property, and where some act still remained to be performed in order to completely vest the title and possession in the state, such cases were reserved for the subject of the 6th article; which stipulates "that there shall be no future confiscations made; nor any prosecutions commenced against any person or persons for or by reason of the part which he or they may have taken in the present war; and that no person shall on that account suffer any future loss or damage, either in his person, liberty, or property; and that those who may be in confinement on such charges at the time of the ratification of the treaty in America, shall be immediately set at liberty, and the prosecutions so commenced be discontinued." The cases in the 5th article required some act to be done by the states to restore the property, because the party was out of possession; but where the party was already in the possession and enjoyment of the property, no act of the states was necessary. It was competent for the treaty to provide for the case; and to stipulate, as the 6th article does in effect, that the party shall not be put in a worse situation than he then was in, either as to his person, his liberty, or his property. The treaty did not consider property as confiscated, if any further act was necessary to give the state a complete legal title.

To ascertain the true construction of the 6th article of the treaty, it is necessary to fix the meaning of the term confiscation.

1. What is confiscation?

2. On what principles does the right of confiscation depend?

1. To confiscate, is to transfer property from private to public use. But the public cannot have the use of property not known to exist. The state of Maryland had not the use of this property before it was discovered in 1801. It was not before that time transferred from private to public use, and, consequently, was not confiscated.

293*] *2. The right to confiscate the property of an enemy during war is derived from a state of war, and is called one of the rights of war. The right originates in the principle of self-preservation. It is a means of weakening the enemy, and of strengthening ourselves. (3 Dallas, 227; Vat. lib. 3, c. 8, § 138, p. 519; Lib. 3, c. 9, § 161, p. 541.)

The right to confiscate ceases with the principle upon which it is founded. In time of peace we are in no danger, and therefore self-preservation will not then justify confiscation. We have no enemy to disable, and therefore no right to strengthen ourselves at the expense of another, although he had been an enemy.

But we are told that the state is not now confiscating the property of him who was our enemy. That was done during the war. We are not now depriving him of the possession, and excluding him from the use of the land. All this was done during the war. And this is said in the same breath which admits that the party has remained in the possession, use and enjoyment of the land until this moment, and that the property was not discovered to have been the property of an enemy until twenty years after the end of the war. The right to confiscate the goods of an enemy is merely the belligerent right of capture. If the property be not taken during the war it can never be seized afterwards. This property, while it remained undiscovered, could neither weaken our enemy nor strengthen ourselves.

It would be difficult to establish the position by reason, or by the law of nations, that you can ever be placed in a situation where, although it be unlawful to pass an act declaring you will seize and confiscate enemies' property, yet that you may because you declared you had seized it when in fact you had not deprived him of the possession and use of it. As to him the effect is the same; and it is equally a just cause of hostility, whether in fact you take from him what he in fact held, without a previous declara-

294*] tion *of your intention to do so, or first make the declaration, and then do it. In order to evade the positive prohibition of the treaty, you set up a mere legal fiction in opposition to the truth of the case, and in violation of the spirit as well as the letter of a solemn national compact.

This construction deprives the words of all meaning and effect. It was absurd to make provisions against future confiscations, if everything was already confiscated. No construction of a treaty is to be admitted which leads to an absurdity, or renders the treaty null and without effect. (Vattel, 380, 381, 382.)

It is contended that the first provision in the 6th article can never apply to Maryland, because there the confiscations were complete whether the property were discovered or not, and whether the state by its agents had taken the possession or not; the law having vested the title and possession. Let it be conceded that the law, of itself, had all these effects, yet the treaty, if fairly construed, annulled the future operations of the law, and prevented the state or its assigns from making the confiscation more complete, either by taking actual possession or compelling the trustees to convey the legal estate.

We contend that the provision that no future confiscations shall be made, protects all property in fact held by British or American subjects at the time of the treaty, and prevents the laws of confiscation from having the least operation in respect to such property; or at any rate prevents the courts of justice from depriving the holder of the possession, and from forcing his trustee to convey, and from doing any other act to carry into effect an incomplete confiscation. Acts done under a law during its existence cannot be affected by the repeal of the law. But if a law authorizes an act to be done, but before the act be done, the law be repealed, there is no authority to do the act. So if the act be done in part, and be incomplete at the time of the repeal, nothing further can be done. The treaty was a repeal of all the confiscation laws, so *far as to suspend their confis- [295 cating effects; and no court of judicature could carry them into execution.

The stipulation "that there should be no future confiscations made," was not intended to prevent the passing of future laws of confiscation. There could be no right to pass such laws during peace. Such laws would have been a most flagrant violation of the law of nations; and would have been a good cause of war.

If it be said that the stipulation was intended to apply only to those states where the confiscation laws were incomplete, we answer, that the confiscation was incomplete even in the case now before the court. The circumstance of an application to a court of chancery to complete the title of the state, is conclusive evidence that the title was not complete; and if the title was not completely in the state, the confiscation was not complete.

In those states where an inquest of office was necessary to gain a seizin by the state, such a proceeding could not be had after the treaty; this point has been admitted by all the states. No solid reason can be given why the treaty should not equally bar a proceeding in equity, to obtain the same object.

No reason can be given why one of the states more than another should be enabled to derive a continuing revenue from the discovery of property after the peace, which had belonged to an enemy during the war.

If it be said that the act of confiscation vested the equitable title in the state, and that that equitable title is transferred to the complainants, Carroll and Maccubbin, and that as in equity, what ought to have been done is presumed to have been done, and therefore a conveyance is to be made now as if it had been made then.

We admit that this is true in ordinary cases of equity; but this is not an ordinary case of equity; there is no equity in compelling a for- [*296
296*] feiture accruing jure belli. It is a mere exercise of superior power, or at most a case of the strictest law. It is not the province of a court of equity to enforce penalties and forfeitures (especially those growing out of a state of war), but to relieve against them. No man will contend that a British subject was bound in law, conscience or morality, to make a disclosure of his property to his enemy, for the purpose of being deprived of it. The same right of war which justified us in confiscating the property of British subjects, justified them in concealing it.

The general purview of the 6th article of the treaty shows that the intention of the contracting parties was, that things should remain as they then were; no future confiscations were to be made; that is, no property was to be transferred from private to public use; no person then in possession was to be turned out on account of the part he took in the war; no prosecution was to be commenced; no person was to suffer any future loss or damage, either in his person, liberty or property, on that account. To deprive a man of his property, to turn him out of a possession which he had enjoyed until that moment, to deprive him of his daily bread, is to make him suffer a loss and damage on account of the part he took in the war, and is therefore a direct violation of the treaty.

The right of confiscation is in substance the same as the right of capture; it depends upon the same principle, the right of self preservation. If the property be taken flagrante bello, it becomes the property of the captor. But if it be not taken during the war, he cannot afterwards claim and take it because he might have taken it during the war, if he had known where it was. He cannot make it his own by a mere declaration that it is his. The right to take can only be exercised during the war. If there be only a declaration during the war, it does not change the property. At the cessation of hostilities, the right of capture ceases. The state of Maryland cannot say, I am not now taking your property. I only take my own; and it is my own because I declared it to be so during the war.

297*] *With much more truth might Great Britain, when we charge her with a violation of the 7th article of the treaty, by carrying away the negroes and other property of Americans, say, I did not take away the property of the Americans; I only took my own. It was mine, not by a mere declaration that it was mine, but by an actual seizure of it during the war, and according to the rights of war.

But this construction of the 7th article is not admissible, because it would defeat the whole object and intent of that article. So we say the construction given by the courts of Maryland, to the term "confiscations," in the 6th article, is not admissible, because it defeats the whole object and intent of that provision.

The words of the act of October, 1780, (c. 45), entitled "An act to seize, confiscate and appropriate all British property within this state," are these: "Be it enacted," &c., "that all property within this state, debts only excepted, belonging to British subjects, shall be seized, and is hereby confiscated to the use of the state."

By the act of the same session (c. 49), entitled "An act to appoint commissioners to preserve confiscated British property," it is enacted. "William Paca, Uriah Forest, and Clement Hollyday, Esquires, or any two of them, shall be, and are hereby appointed commissioners for the purpose of preserving all British property seized and confiscated by the act of the present session to seize, confiscate and appropriate, all British property within this state; and that the said commissioners shall be, and are hereby declared to be in the full and actual seizin and possession of all British property seized and confiscated by the said act, without any office found, entry, or other act to be done. And the said commissioners shall, and may, as soon as may be, appoint proper persons, in all cases that they may think necessary, to enter into, and take possession of any part of the said property, and to preserve and keep the *same from waste and de- [*298 struction, or to occupy and employ the same for the benefit of the public, and to inventory the same, or any other of the said property which the said commissioners may not think proper or necessary to put into the keeping of any person as aforesaid; and the said commissioners shall return to the next general assembly a list or account of all such British property by them discovered, to whom the same belonged, the persons, if any, to whose keeping they committed the same, and the sums to which the same shall be valued in the next valuation of property; and the inventory aforesaid shall also be returned to the general assembly, with the list or account aforesaid; but in case any person shall be in possession of any of the said property, and claim the same, such property shall not be taken out of his possession, if he gives good and sufficient security, in double the value thereof, that the same, if moveable, shall be produced when called for by the commissioners, not any way damaged, or injured, or, if real, that no waste or destruction shall be committed thereon, but that the same shall be kept and preserved in as good order and repair as the same may then be in, until the title thereto shall be determined."

By the 4th section of the same act it is enacted, "that the said commissioners are also hereby declared to be in the full and actual seizin and possession of all property within this state which belonged to any person outlawed for treason; and may appoint proper persons to take care of and preserve the same from waste or destruction, and inventory and return the same to the general assembly at the next session, in the same manner as if the same was confiscated British property, to the end that proper measures may be taken for the disposition thereof in the manner most advantageous for the public, and the purpose to which the same is appropriated."

These acts clearly contemplate an actual seizure of the property during the existence of the war. The title of the first act is, "to seize, confiscate, and appropriate;" and the enacting clause declares, that the property 299] *"shall be seized." The second act declares the commissioners to be in the full and actual seizin and possession of all British property seized and confiscated by the former act. It also authorizes the commissioners to appoint other persons to enter and take possession. It directs an account of the property discovered to be returned to the next general assembly, and it provides that if the party in possession claim title, he shall not be turned out of possession until the question of title be decided.

The act of the same session (c. 51, section 6) speaks of certain manors and lands, "which are seized and confiscated as British property, in consequence of the said act." And the preamble of the 8th section of the act of November, 1802, (c. 100, sect. 8), under which Carroll and Maccubbin claim a right to apply to a court of equity in the name of the state, speaks of the discoverers of property liable to confiscation in the following terms: "Whereas many persons have made discoveries of British property, confiscated property, or property liable to confiscation, to the Governor and council, the late intendant and late agents of the state, and have made application to purchase the same upon the terms held out by law to the discoverers; and whereas there is no person invested with authority to estimate the value, or fix a reasonable price for the said property, and to compound with the person or persons making such discovery, or with the person or persons applying to purchase the same; be it enacted, that the Governor and council be and they are hereby empowered to compound with all persons who have heretofore made discovery of British property, confiscated property, or property liable to confiscation, either to the Governor and council, the late intendant, or any of the state agents, and to allow not exceeding one-third of the value of such property to any person or persons having made such discovery, and who shall make application to the governor and council on or before the first day of May next, to compound for and purchase the same, and the said Governor and council are hereby authorized to dispose of such property to such applicants, and take bonds, with 300] good and sufficient *security, to be approved of by the treasurer of the western shore, for the purchase money, bearing interest payable to the state at the periods that may be agreed on."

The 9th section provides, that if the discoverer "shall not make known to the Governor and council the title of the state to the property aforesaid" before the 1st of May, then next, &c., the Governor and council are to sell and dispose of the "state's right" to the property, &c. And by the 10th section it is enacted, "that it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons purchasing as aforesaid any confiscated British property under the authority of this act, to prosecute any suit or suits, either in law or equity, in the name of the state, for the recovery of said property for their use: provided, that the said state shall not be liable to pay any costs incurred in prosecution of said suits;" "and provided also, that in all such sales so to be made by the Governor and council, it shall be made known, and shall be a condition thereof, that they only sell the right of the state thereto, and that the state doth not guaranty the title to the same, or any part thereof, but that the purchase must be in all respects at the risk of the purchaser."

This act is clearly a legislative construction of the former acts respecting confiscation, and it takes a distinction between British property and confiscated property, and property liable to confiscation; it supposes the existence of British property not confiscated; which could be no other than property which was once liable to confiscation, but which had never been actually discovered and seized.

But this land was, at the time of the British treaty of 1794, holden by a British subject, through the medium of a trustee, so that it is a case within the benefit of the 9th article of that treaty.

As to the question of jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, the real question in the case is, whether the property was, before the treaty of peace, *actually confis- [301 cated, within the meaning of that treaty. It is a question upon the construction of the treaty only, and the judgment below has been against the right claimed under that treaty, and is therefore clearly within the letter of the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789.

Ridgeley, contra.

The act of Maryland, of October, 1780, (c. 45), actually and absolutely confiscates the property, whether found or not. And the act of the same session (c. 49) declares the commissioners to be in the actual seizin and possession of the property, "without any office found, entry, or other act to be done."

The courts of the United States have not jurisdiction in the case, because the only question is, whether, by the laws of Maryland, the property was completely confiscated before the treaty of peace. If it was, the treaty does not apply; if it was not, the treaty protects it. The laws of Maryland are to be construed by this court as they are construed in Maryland; and the judgment in this very suit is conclusive evidence of the construction given to their laws by the courts of that state.

The acts of confiscation make no distinction between legal and equitable estates.

Harper, on the same side.

This case presents two questions. The first, upon the jurisdiction; the second, upon the construction of the act of Maryland.

1. This is not a case depending upon the construction of the treaties, but upon the laws of Maryland. If by those laws the property was not confiscated before the treaty of peace, we admit that it cannot now be confiscated. If it was confiscated, the treaty does not apply. The general understanding in Maryland, and the uniform decisions of their courts have been, *that the act of assembly completely [302 confiscated all British property within that state, without office found, or entry, or seizure; so that at the peace there could not be any future confiscations, because, no British subject could then hold lands in Maryland. This is an answer to both treaties. The courts of Maryland are the exclusive judges of the construction of the laws of that state.

If this court can take cognizance of the cause, the only question which they can decide is that which arises upon the construction of the treaty. The question of the construction of the acts of Maryland is not open to this court.

Jones, in reply.

The right of Mrs. Ottey was not of such a nature as to be within the description of the act of assembly; and as it was a highly rigorous and penal law, creating a forfeiture of lands, it ought to be strictly construed. To include the case of a cestui que trust would require a special description. The only term used in the act is "property," which, in its general and most obvious signification, means the legal title and possession of the thing itself. By the common law, no trust estate or use was forfeitable for treason; and an alien might hold and enjoy the profits of land through the medium of a trustee. (4 Com., Dig., 231; 2 Coke, 513; 2 Inst., 18, 19, 21.) And this principle respecting forfeitures applies to confiscations. (3 Inst., 227.)

By the act of Maryland itself, no property was confiscated until it was first seized, and it could not be seized until it was found. But the question is not whether it was a confiscation of the kind contemplated by the act of Maryland, but whether it was a confiscation of the kind contemplated by the treaty. Treaties, especially those which put an end to the miseries of war, ought to be construed with liberality, and according to the spirit of the contract and the intention of the parties. The confiscation contemplated by the acts of Maryland, if the con-303] struction be correct which has *been given to them by their courts, was not an actual confiscation de facto, but a confiscation in contemplation of law. So far as it could be supposed to apply to property not discovered nor seized, it was a mere fiction of law. The contracting parties to the treaty could only have intended actual confiscations de facto; cases where in truth the property had already been seized and converted to public use. The spirit of the treaty is clearly discovered, from the whole tenor of the instrument, to be, that nothing which was not already actually converted to the public use should be taken from the individual on account of the part taken in the war. A future seizure of the property holden by the individual; a future conversion of it to public use, was therefore a future confiscation within the letter and the spirit of the prohibition contained in the 6th article of the treaty. The negotiators of that treaty must be presumed to have been perfectly acquainted with the laws of England relating to treason, and forfeitures of every kind. It was known that even by the high prerogative of the crown, the king gained no title until actual seizure. The writ of seizure was a necessary consequence of an office found. (2 Inst., 206, 207, 573, 689.) Until entry or seizure there was only a possibility of an estate which was to be gained by entry. The seizure or entry is the commencement of the title. (Co. Litt., 118, a.; 12 Mod., 92, Roberts v. Witherhead.) This seems also to have been the opinion of the legislature of Maryland, when they declared that the property should be seized and confiscated; and when they passed the subsequent acts of 1797 (c. 119) and 1802 (c. 100).

The right of Mrs. Ottey is protected by the clauses of the 6th article of the treaty of peace, prohibiting future confiscations and future loss on account of the part taken in the war; and by the 9th article of the treaty of 1794, in favor of those who then held lands in the United States. Mrs. Ottey then held the land; if not at law, yet she did in equity; and as this is a suit in equity, the court will consider her as within the equity of the treaty.

*March, 16. WASHINGTON, J.,[1] de-[304 livered the opinion of the court as follows:

This cause comes before the court upon a writ of error to the Court of Appeals of the state of Maryland; and the first question is, has the Supreme Court of the United States appellate jurisdiction in a case like the present? It is contended, by the defendants in error, that the question involved in the cause turns exclusively upon the construction of the confiscation laws of the state of Maryland, passed prior to the treaty of peace, and that no question relative to the construction of that treaty, did or could occur. That the only point in dispute was, whether the confiscation of the lands in controversy was complete, or not, by the mere operation of those laws, without any further act to be done. If the former, it was admitted, on the one side, that the right of Anne Ottey, the British subject, was not saved or protected by the treaty; if the latter, then it was agreed, on the other, that it was protected, and that no proceedings subsequent to the treaty, in order to perfect the confiscation, could be supported.

This argument proves nothing more than that the whole difficulty in this case depends upon that part of it which involves the construction of certain state laws, and that the operation and effect of the treaty, which constitutes the residue of the case, is obvious so soon as that construction is settled. But still the question recurs, is this a case where the construction of any clause in a treaty was drawn in question in the state court, and where the decision was against the title set up under such treaty? The only title asserted by the defendants in error, to the land in dispute, is founded upon an alleged confiscation of them by the state of Maryland, and a conveyance to them of the right thus acquired by the state. The title set up by the *plaintiffs in error, for Anne Ottey, [305 and the only one which could possibly resist that claimed by the grantees of the state, is under the treaty of peace; the 6th article of which protects her rights, provided the confiscation, by the laws of the state, was not complete prior to the treaty. The point to be decided was and is, whether this be a case of future confiscation, within the meaning of the 6th article of that treaty; and, in order to arrive at a correct result in the decision of that point, it became necessary, in the state court, and will be necessary in this, to inquire whether the confiscation, declared by the state laws, was final and complete at the time the treaty was made or not? The construction of those laws, then, is only a step in the cause leading to the construction and meaning of this article of the treaty; and it is perfectly immaterial to the point of jurisdiction that the first part of the way is the most difficult to explore. Although the defendant's counsel admit, and the Supreme Court of the state may, in this particular case, have decided that, where the confiscation is not complete before the treaty, the estate attempted to be confiscated is protected by the treaty, still, if, according to the true construction of the state laws, this court should be of opinion that the acts of confiscation left something to be done necessary to the perfection of the title claimed under them, which was not done at the time the treaty was made, we must say that, in this case, the construction of the treaty was drawn in question, and that the decision of the state court was against the right set up, under the treaty, by one of the parties.

This leads to the consideration of the merits of the cause, which depend upon the question before stated, viz., whether the confiscation of the lands in question was so far complete by the laws referred to that the title and estate of Anne Ottey was devested out of her and vested in the state, prior to the treaty of peace? This must depend upon the true construction of the acts passed in the year 1780 (chapters 45 and 49), as it is not pretended that any proceedings were instituted in the nature of an office, to 306] complete the forfeiture *of these lands, upon the ground of alienage or otherwise.

The first law declares generally that "all property within this state, belonging to British subjects, debts only excepted, shall be seized, and is hereby confiscated to the use of this state." Anticipating, as it would seem, that questions might arise, after peace, in respect to lands not proceeded against according to the rules of the common law, the legislature, in the same session, passed a second law, appointing certain commissioners, by name, to preserve all British property seized and confiscated by the former law, and declaring the said commissioners to be in the full and actual seizin and possession of all British property seized and confiscated by the said act, without any office found, entry, or other act to be done, with power to the said commissioners to appoint fit persons to enter and take possession of said property, for the purpose of its preservation.

It would seem difficult to draught a law more completely operative to devest the whole estate of the former owner, and to vest it in the state. The arguments against giving to these laws such an effect are, that the expressions used in these laws do not import a confiscation of merely equitable estates, and that no estates were intended to be confiscated but such as were discovered and seized into the hands of the state, prior to the treaty.

It is true that the word property, used in both laws, means the thing itself, intended to be affected by them, whether it were land or personal property; but then it is equally clear that the thing itself, whatever it might be, ceased, by the operation of these laws, to belong to the British subject, and became vested in the commissioners, for the use of the state. The cestui que trust, though not in possession of the property, was, nevertheless, the real owner of it, and, if the property or thing itself had come into the actual possession of the commissioners, who would have held it to the use of the state, it would seem difficult to maintain the position, 307] that a scintilla of interest *or estate remained, for an instant afterwards, in the former owner.

But no act of the commissioners was necessary in order to obtain seizin of the land, to support the use thus transferred from Anne Ottey to the state. No seizure was necessary. The second law considers that all property belonging to British subjects was, by the mere operation of the first law, seized and confiscated; and declares that the commissioners were then in full and actual seizin and possession of the property, so seized and confiscated by the first law, though no entry or other act had or should be made or done.

Being thus in the actual seizin, under the second law, which seizin had been declared, by the first law, to enure to the use of the state, it is perfectly immaterial at what time the right of the state to the lands now in controversy, thus completed prior to the treaty, was discovered, or at what time actual seizin and possession was obtained. From the time that the second law came into operation, the possession of the trustees of Anne Ottey either ceased to be legal, or it was to be considered as the possession of the commissioners to the new use which had been declared by law. The present suit is between persons claiming under the state, and others who either held the lands wrongfully, or for the use of the state, and it is, in no respect, necessary to the perfection of the change of property produced by the laws of confiscation.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

DUROUSSEAU AND OTHERS
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

The appellate powers of the Supreme Court of the United States, are given by the constitution; but they are limited and regulated by the judicial act, and other acts passed by Congress on the subject. This court has appellate jurisdiction of decisions in the district courts of Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, and Orleans, even in causes properly cognizable by the district courts of the United States. To an action of debt for the penalty of an embargo bond, it is a good plea, under the act of Congress of the 12th of March, 1808, s 3, that the party was prevented from relanding the goods in the United States, by unavoidable accident.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States, for the District of Orleans.

This was a suit brought by the United States against *Durousseau and others upon a [308 bond, given in pursuance of the act of Congress of December 22, 1807, usually called the embargo act. (Laws U. S., vol. 9, p. 7.) The bond bears date the 16th of May, 1808, and the condition is, that the goods therein mentioned should be "relanded in the United States, at the port of Charleston, or at some other port of the United States, the dangers of the seas excepted."

The proceedings in the court below are according to the forms of the civil law, by petition or libel and answer. The libel is in the nature of an action of debt for the penalty of the bond, and the plea is in the nature of a special plea, stating facts which were supposed to be sufficient evidence that the defendants were prevented by the dangers of the seas from relanding the goods in the United States.

The answer, or plea, states, that the vessel sailed from New Orleans with intent to proceed to the port of Charleston, and that in the due prosecution of her voyage from New Orleans to Charleston, she was, "on the 26th of May, 1808, and on divers days from the said 26th of May till the 1st of June then next following, upon the high seas by unavoidable accident by force of the winds and waves, so much injured and endamaged, that upon the said 1st day of June, for the preservation of the said vessel and cargo, and the lives of her crew and passengers, it was found necessary to put into the port of Havanna to refit the said vessel for her voyage aforesaid; and that the persons administering the government at the said port of Havanna, by force of arms, and against the will and consent of these defendants, and of the captain and supercargo of the said vessel, and all other persons having the charge and direction of the said vessel or cargo whatever, did detain the said vessel and cargo at the said port of Havanna, and by superior force did prevent the said vessel, with her cargo, from pursuing her said voyage to the port of Charleston aforesaid, or from going to any other port of the United States, and landing the said cargo therein pursuant to the condition of the said bond, and did also by force so as aforesaid prevent, and have 309] *always hitherto prevented the said cargo, or any part thereof, from being sent in any other manner to the said United States and landed therein pursuant to the condition of the said bond; and these defendants aver, that the damages and injuries aforesaid sustained by the said vessel were unavoidable, and by force of the winds and waves; and that by reason of the detention, and continuation thereof, as aforesaid, by superior force as aforesaid, they could not at any time heretofore, nor can they yet, land the said goods, wares and merchandises in the said United States, pursuant to the condition of the said bond in the said petition set forth, by reason whereof, and also by force of the statutes in such case made and provided, these defendants are, as they are advised, discharged from the payment of the said sum of money in the said boud or obligation mentioned, or any part thereof; these defendants, therefore, pray, that a jury may be empaneled to inquire of the facts aforesaid, should they be denied by the United States, and that these defendants may be hence dismissed with their reasonable costs and damages in this behalf most wrongfully expended." &c.

To this answer the attorney for the United States filed a general demurrer, and the court below, without argument, rendered judgment for the United States; whereupon the defendants sued out their writ of error.

Rodney, Attorney-General, and Jones, for the United States,

Contended, that this court has no jurisdiction, because there can be no writ of error to, or appeal from, the decisions of the District Court of Orleans.

By the act of Congress passed March 26, 1804, entitled an act erecting Louisiana into two territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof (vol. 7, p. 117, § 8), it is enacted, that "there shall be established in the said territory a district court, to consist of one judge, who shall reside therein, and be called the district judge, and who shall hold, in the city of Orleans, four sessions annully;" "he shall in all things have the same jurisdiction and powers which are by law *given [310 to, or may be exercised by, the judge of Kentucky district."

By the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, (vol. 1, p. 54, § 10), the District Court, besides the ordinary jurisdiction of a district court, has "jurisdiction of all other causes except of appeals and writs of error, hereinafter made cognizable in a circuit court, and shall proceed therein in the same manner as a circuit court, and writs of error and appeals shall lie from decisions therein to the Supreme Court in the same causes, as from a circuit to the Supreme Court, and under the same regulations."

By the ninth section of the same act the district courts have "exclusive original cognizance of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States."

Hence, it appears, that writs of error will lie to the Kentucky District Court in those causes only in which it acts in the capacity of a circuit court. The word "therein," means in causes other than those of which the district courts generally had cognizance under the 9th section of the act.

This court, in the cases of Clarke v. Bazadone (1 Cranch, 212), and Bollman and Swartwout (4 Cranch, 75), disclaimed any appellate jurisdiction not expressly given by law; and by a late act (vol. 8, p. 21, and vol. 9, p. 116), extending jurisdiction in certain cases to state judges and state courts, the jurisdiction is given without appeal; which shows that Congress are not anxious that there should be an appeal from all the courts to which they have given jurisdiction. There is no appeal from the judge of the District of Orleans in cases where he exercises only the District Court jurisdiction. In Kentucky there was no circuit court. The district judge, although he exercised the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court, yet he did not hold a circuit court. His court was merely a district court. The courts of the United States can exercise no jurisdiction not expressly given by statute. *(3 Dallas, [311 337.) Although this suit was upon a bond, yet it was in fact a suit for a penalty or forfeiture, like the case of the auctioneer's bond in 2 Anstruther, 586, 587.

This is as much a penalty as if it had been merely declared by the statute without having been put into the form of a bond.

E. Livingston, contra.

This court has jurisdiction in consequence of its being the Supreme Court, and the other an inferior court. The terms supreme and inferior are co-relative, and imply a power of revision in the Superior Court.

The judiciary act of 1789 gives a writ of error from the Supreme Court to the District Court of Kentucky, in all cases where a writ of error would lie to a district court from a circuit court, as well as in those cases where a writ of error lies generally from the Supreme Court to a circuit court. The word "therein," means in that court, and not those cases only in which that court exercises the jurisdiction of a circuit court.

The act of Congress gives the Orleans judge the same jurisdiction and powers as are given to the Kentucky judge. If it had been intended to give him the same jurisdiction without limiting his power by the right of appeal, Congress would not have used the word powers. The same powers, means no greater powers; but if the Kentucky judge had limited powers, and the Orleans judge has unlimited powers, the powers cannot be the same.

C. Lee, same side, cited the case of Morgan v. Callender (4 Cranch, 370), in which this court decided that it has jurisdiction in cases of appeal from the District Court of Orleans. He also suggested the inconvenience which would result from having a revenue court in Orleans not subject to the control of the Supreme Court; and from a difference of construction in the 312] laws respecting *trade, commerce and revenue in different parts of the territories of the United States.

Jones, in reply, observed, that the inconvenience arising from the want of uniformity of decision already exists with respect to all cases under 2,000 dollars value, in which there can be no appeal, or writ of error.

March 15. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, upon the question of jurisdiction, as follows:

This is the first of several writs of error to sundry judgments rendered by the court of the United States for the territory of Orleans.

The Attorney-General having moved to dismiss them, because no writ of error lies from this court to that in any case, or, if in any case, not in such a case as this; the jurisdiction of this court becomes the first subject for consideration.

The act erecting Louisiana into two territories establishes a district court in the territory of Orleans, consisting of one judge who "shall, in all things, have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers which are, by law, given to, or may be exercised by, the judge of Kentucky district."

On the part of the United States it is contended, that this description of the jurisdiction of the court of New Orleans does not imply a power of revision in this court similar to that which might have been exercised over the judgments of the District Court of Kentucky; or, if it does, that a writ of error could not have been sustained to a judgment rendered by the District Court of Kentucky, in such a case as this.

On the part of the plaintiffs it is contended, that this court possesses a constitutional power to revise and correct the judgments of inferior courts; or, if not so, that such a power is im-313] plied in the act by which the *court of Orleans is created, taken in connection with the judicial act; and that a writ of error would lie to a judgment rendered by the court for the District of Kentucky, in such a case as this.

Every question originating in the constitution of the United States claims, and will receive, the most serious consideration of this court.

The third article of that instrument commences with organizing the judicial department. It consists of one Supreme Court, and of such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish. In these courts is vested the judicial power of the United States.

The first clause of the second section enumerates the cases to which that power shall extend.

The second clause of the same section distributes the powers previously described. In some few cases the Supreme Court possesses original jurisdiction. The constitution then proceeds thus: "In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make."

It is contended that the words of the constitution vest an appellate jurisdiction in this court, which extends to every case not excepted by Congress; and that if the court had been created without any express definition or limitation of its powers, a full and complete appellate jurisdiction would have vested in it, which must have been exercised in all cases whatever.

The force of this argument is perceived and admitted. Had the judicial act created the Supreme Court, without defining or limiting its jurisdiction, it must have been considered as possessing all the jurisdiction which the constitution assigns to it. The legislature would have exercised the power it possessed of creating a supreme court as ordained by the constitution; *and, in omitting to exercise the [314 right of excepting from its constitutional powers, would have necessarily left those powers undiminished. The appellate powers of this court are not given by the judicial act. They are given by the constitution. But they are limited and regulated by the judicial act, and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject.

When the first legislature of the Union proceeded to carry the third article of the constitution into effect, they must be understood as intending to execute the power they possessed of making exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. They have not, indeed, made these exceptions in express terms. They have not declared that the appellate power of the court shall not extend to certain cases; but they have described affirmatively its jurisdiction, and this affirmative description has been understood to imply a negative on the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it.

The spirit as well as the letter of a statute must be respected, and where the whole context of the law demonstrates a particular intent in the legislature to effect a certain object, some degree of implication may be called in to aid that intent.

It is upon this principle that the court implies a legislative exception from its constitutional appellate power in the legislative affirmative description of those powers.

Thus, a writ of error lies to the judgment of a circuit court, where the matter in controversy exceeds the value of 2,000 dollars. There is no express declaration that it will not lie where the matter in controversy shall be of less value. But the court considers this affirmative description as manifesting the intent of the legislature to except from its appellate jurisdiction all cases decided in the circuits where the matter in controversy is of less value, and implies negative words.

This restriction, however, being implied by 315] the court, *and that implication being founded on the manifest intent of the legislature, can be made only where that manifest intent appears. It ought not to be made for the purpose of defeating the intent of the legislature.

Having made these observations on the constitution, the court will proceed to consider the acts on which its jurisdiction, in the present case, depends; and, first, to inquire whether it could take cognizance of this case had the judgment been rendered by the District Court of Kentucky.

The ninth section of the judicial act describes the jurisdiction of the district courts.

The tenth section declares that the District Court of Kentucky, "besides the jurisdiction aforesaid," shall exercise jurisdiction over all other causes, except appeals and writs of error, which are made cognizable in a circuit court, and shall proceed therein in the same manner as a circuit court: "and writs of error and appeals shall lie from decisions therein to the Supreme Court, in the same causes as from a circuit court to the Supreme Court, and under the same regulations."

It is contended that this suit, which is an action on a bond conditioned to be void on the relanding of goods within the United States, is one of which the district courts have exclusive jurisdiction, and that a writ of error would not lie to a judgment given in such a case.

This court does not concur with the Attorney-General in the opinion that a circuit court has no original jurisdiction in a case of this description. But it is unnecessary to say anything on this point, because it is deemed clear that a writ of error is given in the case, however this question might be decided.

It would be difficult to conceive an intention in the legislature to discriminate between judgments rendered by the District Court of Kentucky, while exercising the powers of a district court, and those rendered by the same court while exercising circuit powers, when it is 316] *demonstrated that the legislature makes no distinction in the cases from their nature and character. Causes of which the district courts have exclusive original jurisdiction are carried into the circuit courts, and then become the objects of the appellate jurisdiction of this court. It would be strange if, in a case where the powers of the two courts are united in one court, from whose judgments an appeal lies, causes, of which the district courts have exclusive original jurisdiction, should be excepted from the operation of the appellate power. It would require plain words to establish this construction.

But the court is of opinion that the words import no such meaning. The construction given by the Attorney-General to the word "therein," as used in the last instance, in the clause of the tenth section, which has been cited, is too restricted. If, by force of this word, appeals were given only in those causes in which the District Court acted as a circuit court exercising its original jurisdiction, the legislature would not have added the words, "in the same causes as from a circuit court." This addition, if not an absolute repetition, could only serve to create doubt where no doubt would otherwise exist.

The plain meaning of these words is, that wherever the District Court decides a cause which, if decided in a circuit court, either in an original suit, or on an appeal, would be subject to a writ of error from the Supreme Court, the judgment of the District Court shall, in like manner, be subject to a writ of error.

This construction is, if possible, rendered still more obvious by the subsequent part of the same section, which describes the jurisdiction of the District Court of Maine in the same terms. Apply the restricted interpretation to the word, "therein," in that instance, and the Circuit Court of Massachusetts would possess jurisdiction over causes in which the District Court of Maine acted as a circuit court; and not over those in which it acted as a district court: a construction which is certainly not to be tolerated.

*Had this judgment been rendered [317 by the District Court of Kentucky, the jurisdiction of this court would have been perfectly clear.

The remaining question admits of more doubt.

It is said that the words used in the law creating the court of Orleans describe the jurisdiction and powers of that court, not of this, and that they give no express jurisdiction to this court. Hence it is inferred, with considerable strength of reasoning, that no jurisdiction exists.

If the question depended singly upon the reference made in the law creating the court for the territory of Orleans to the court of Kentucky, the correctness of this reasoning would perhaps be conceded. It would be found difficult to maintain the proposition, that investing the judge of the territory of Orleans with the same jurisdiction and powers which were exercised by the judge of Kentucky, imposed upon that jurisdiction the same restrictions arising from the power of a superior court, as were imposed on the court of Kentucky.

But the question does not depend singly on this reference; it is influenced by other very essential considerations.

Previous to the extension of the circuit system to the western states, district courts were erected in the states of Tennessee and Ohio, and their powers were described in the same terms with those which describe the powers of the court of Orleans. The same reference is made to the District Court of Kentucky. Under these laws this court has taken jurisdiction of a cause brought by writ of error from Tennessee. It is true the question was not moved, and, consequently, still remains open. But can it be conceived to have been the intention of the legislature to except, from the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, all the causes decided in the western country, except those decided in Kentucky? Can such an intention *be thought possible. Ought it to be [318 inferred from ambiguous phrases?

The constitution here becomes all important. The constitution and the laws are to be construed together. It is to be recollected that the appellate powers of the Supreme Court are defined in the constitution, subject to such exceptions as Congress may make. Congress has not expressly made any exceptions; but they are implied from the intent manifested by the affirmative description of its powers. It would be repugnant to every principle of sound construction, to imply an exception against the intent.

This question does not rest on the same principles as if there had been an express exception to the jurisdiction of this court, and its power, in this case, was to be implied from the intent of the legislature. The exception is to be implied from the intent, and there is, consequently, a much more liberal operation to be given to the words by which the courts of the western country have been created.

It is believed to be the true intent of the legislature to place those courts precisely on the footing of the court of Kentucky, in every respect, and to subject their judgments, in the same manner, to the revision of the Supreme Court. Otherwise the court of Orleans would, in fact, be a Supreme Court. It would possess greater and less restricted powers than the court of Kentucky, which is, in terms, an inferior court.

The question of jurisdiction being decided, it was stated by the counsel that the seven following cases on the docket, viz., the cases of Bera and others, Connelly and others, Castries and others, Gibbs and others, Childs and others, Clay and others, and Keene and others, against the United States, all from New Orleans, stood upon the same pleas of unavoidable accident; excepting that in the cases of Bera and others, and Connelly and others, the accident was capture by the British, and prevention by superior force from relanding 319] the goods *in the United States. The bond in Bera's case was dated the 21st of March, 1808. The condition was the same as in the case of Durousseau.

P. B. Key, E. Livingston, C. Lee and R. G. Harper, for the plaintiffs in error.

These cases are all within the benefit of the act of Congress passed the 12th of March, 1808, (section 3, vol. 9, p. 71), which enacts, "that in every case where a bond hath been or shall be given to the United States, under this act, or under the act entitled 'an act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' or under the act supplementary to the last mentioned act, with condition that certain goods, wares and merchandise, or the cargo of a vessel, shall be relanded in some port of the United States; the party or parties to such bond shall, within four months after the date of the same, produce to the collector of the port from which the vessel had been cleared with such goods, wares, merchandise, or cargo, a certificate of the relanding of the same from the collector of the proper port, on failure whereof the bond shall be put in suit, and in every such suit judgment shall be given against the defendant or defendants, unless proof shall be produced of such relanding, or of loss by sea, or other unavoidable accident."

It is contended that this act means loss by sea, or loss by other unavoidable accident; but this construction is contradicted by the punctuation of the statute. If it had been intended to have the construction contended for, it would have been pointed thus: unless proof shall be produced of such relanding or of loss, by sea or other unavoidable accident." The court can no more alter the punctuation of a statute than the words. To give it the construction contended for, is to make the legislature speak nonsense; it would make them say the sea is an accident.

We consider this point as settled by the case of The United States v. Hall and Worth, at this term (ante, p. 171).

Jones*, contra. [320*

The statute enlarges the obligation of the bond. The officer is bound to take the bond exactly in the form prescribed by the statute. There is only one act which prescribes the form of the bond; but there are several acts which modify its effect.

The third embargo act has annexed a new meaning to the condition of the bond. A bond taken under a known law, has the meaning and effect declared by that law. The act contemplates two excuses, viz., loss by perils of the sea, and loss by superior force; but at all events there must be a loss.

But in this case there is not a sufficient averment of a necessity even of going into Havanna, and there is no averment of a loss. The detention at Havanna, and not the injury by the winds and waves, is averred to be the reason why they could not comply with the condition of the bond.

If a vessel be driven by a storm upon the coast of an enemy, and there captured, it is not a loss by perils of the sea. (Peake's Cases, 130, Green v. Elmsly.) The remote cause is never stated as the cause of the loss. And the averment of loss by capture cannot be supported by evidence of a loss by perils of the sea. (1 Term Rep., 304, Kulem Kemp v. Vigne; 3 Bos. & Pull., 23, Matthia v. Potts; 1 Term Rep., 130.)

The third section of the third embargo act (vol. 9, p., 71) requires more strict proof than had been before required. The legislature was competent to say what degree of proof should be required of a bona fide excuse. They have supposed that nothing but the loss of the thing itself could be satisfactory evidence of the impossibility of complying with the condition of the bond.

This is also the true grammatical construction of the sentence. After saying proof of relanding, or of loss by sea, the word of is omitted, If proof of other unavoidable accident was intended to be admitted as [321 an excuse in the same manner as proof of loss by sea, the language would have been, proof of relanding, or of loss by sea, or of other unavoidable accident. If proof of unavoidable accident was intended as an excuse, they would have said, or other unavoidable accident which should actually render it impossible to reland the goods in the United States.

But as the clause now stands, if our opponents are right in their construction, proof of unavoidable accident will be in excuse, although it be not such an accident as would necessarily render, or should actually have rendered, it impossible to comply with the condition of the bond, whether it produce loss or not, and whether it prevented the relanding or not.

It does not appear by the plea that the defendants did not make a great profit by the voyage.

E. Livingston, in reply.

We are entitled to the benefit of the exception of dangers of the seas in the condition of the bond, and also to the benefit of the exception of unavoidable accident in the statute.

The plea states as strong a case of necessity as that of the case of The United States v. Hall and Worth, decided by this court at this term.

We have made out a clear case both under the exception of dangers of the seas, and under the provision of the statute, in case of unavoidable accident. No man can be bound to do an impossibility.

Insurance cases do not apply to the present; there the contract enumerates a great number of risks, and courts and litigants employ themselves in classing losses under one or another of those risks. In every other kind of contract, the expression, "dangers of the seas," means every accident that can happen at sea. In a bill of lading the master contracts to deliver the 322] *goods at a certain place, the dangers of the seas excepted. Nobody ever supposed he would be liable if the goods should be captured or seized by the superior force of public enemies.

The case cited from Bunbury was upon a statute which required proof that the goods perished in the sea; but our statute has no such clause.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered an opinion to the following effect:

The court considered many of the points in these cases while they had the case of The United States v. Hall and Worth under consideration, and upon the present argument I understand it to be the unanimous opinion of the court, that the law is for the plaintiffs in error in all these cases. I cannot precisely say what are the grounds of that opinion; I can only state the reasons which have prevailed in my own mind.

It is true, as contended on the part of the United States, that the legislature is competent to declare what evidence shall be received of the facts offered in excuse for a violation of the letter of a statute.

I also agree with the counsel for the United States, that the words of the statute, "loss by sea or other unavoidable accident," mean loss by sea, or loss by other unavoidable accident.

But the question is, what sort of loss is meant? It must be such a loss as necessarily prevents the party from complying with the condition of the bond. It is not necessary that it should be an actual destruction of the property, but such a loss only as necessarily prevents the relanding of the goods.

This statute is not like that upon which the prosecution was founded in the case cited from Bunbury. Our statute does not require evidence that the goods have "perished in the sea." It only requires proof of such a loss, by an un-323] avoidable accident, as prevents the *relanding of the cargo, according to the condition of the bond. When the property is captured, and taken away by the superior force of a foreign power so as to prevent the relanding, it is lost within the meaning of the statute by an unavoidable accident, although the owner may have received a compensation for it.

JOHNSON, J. I agree with the court in the result of the opinion, but not altogether upon the grounds stated by the Chief Justice. If the act in question will admit of two constructions, that should be adopted which is most consonant with the general principles of reason and justice. I cannot suppose that the legislature meant to do an unjust or an unreasonable act. No man can be bound to do impossibilities. The legislature must be understood to mean that the party should be excused by showing the occurrence of such circumstances as rendered it impossible to perform the condition of the bond. To make his liability depend upon the mere point of ultimate loss or gain would be unreasonable in the extreme.

LIVINGSTON, J. I concur in the reversal of these judgments, but not in the construction which the Chief Justice puts upon the third section of the act of March, 1808.

If the relanding of the cargo in the United States had been prevented by any unavoidable accident whatever, although the goods themselves were not lost, it would, in my opinion, have furnished a good defense to this suit.

If the Spanish government had forced a sale of the property; and the proceeds had actually come to the hands of the owners, it would have made no difference. Loss by sea is one excuse; unavoidable accident, whether followed by loss or not, is another.

*WASHINGTON and TODD, Justices, [324 agreed in opinion with Judge Livingston.

TYLER AND OTHERS v. TUEL.

An assignee of part of a patent right cannot maintain an action on the case for a violation of the patent.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court of the District of Vermont.

Tyler and others, as assignees of Benjamin Tyler, the original patentee of an improvement in grist-mills, which he called the wry-fly, or side-wheel.

After a verdict for the plaintiffs, the judges of the court below, upon a motion in arrest of judgment, were divided in opinion upon the question "whether the plaintiffs, by their own showing, are legal assignees to maintain this action."

There were two counts in the declaration.

The first set forth the substance of the statutes upon the subject of patents for useful discoveries, the facts necessary to entitle the patentee to a patent for his invention, and the patent itself, together with the specification, dated February 20, 1800.

The averment of the assignment of the patent right to the plaintiffs was in these words: "And the plaintiffs further say, that the said Benjamin Tyler afterwards, to wit, on the 15th day of May in the year last aforesaid, at said Claremont, by his certain deed of that date by him signed, sealed, and to the plaintiffs then and there by the said Benjamin delivered, and ready to be shown to the court, did, in consideration of the sum of six thousand dollars, to him before that time by the plaintiffs paid, grant, bargain, sell, 325] assign *and set over to the plaintiffs, their executors, administrators and assigns, all the right, title and privilege in, unto, and over the said improvement in the said patent described, and thereby vested in the said Benjamin in any part of the United States, excepting in the counties of Chittenden, Addison, Rutland and Windham, in the state of Vermont."

The second count, omitting the recital of the statutes and of the patent, stated concisely the same facts. The averment of the assignment of the patent right was as follows: "And the said Benjamin Tyler, afterwards and before the expiration of the said fourteen years, to wit, at said Claremont, on the 15th day of May, in the year last aforesaid, by his certain deed of that date by him then and there signed, sealed, and to the plaintiffs delivered, assigned to the plaintiffs the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using, and vending to others to be used, the said improvement, in and throughout the United States, excepting in the counties of Chittenden, Addison, Rutland and Windham, in the state of Vermont, as fully and amply as by said letters patent the said Benjamin Tyler was thereto entitled, and all his title and interest in and unto said improvement excepting as aforesaid."

Hubbard, for the defendant, contended that the assignment, being of part of the patent right only, was not such as would authorize the assignees to maintain an action on the statute. (Laws U. S., vol. 2, p. 202, § 4, 5.)

The fourth section of the act declares, "that it shall be lawful for any inventor, his executor or administrator, to assign the title and interest in the said invention at any time, and the assignee, having recorded the said assignment in the office of the Secretary of State, shall thereafter stand in the place of the original inventor both as to right and responsibility, and so the assignees of assigns to any degree."

The fifth section provides, "that if any person shall make, devise and use, or sell the thing 326] so invented, the *exclusive right of which shall, as aforesaid, have been secured to any person by patent, without the consent of the patentee, his executors, administrators or assigns first obtained in writing, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay to the patentee a sum that shall be at least equal to three times the price for which the patentee has usually sold or licensed to other persons the use of the said invention; which may be recovered in an action on the case founded on this act, in the Circuit Court of the United States, or any other court having competent jurisdiction."

It is evident from the whole purview of the statute, especially from the 4th, 5th, 6th and 10th sections, that no person can be considered as an assignee under the statute who is not the assignee of the whole right of the original patentee.

Rodney, Attorney-General, contra.

Upon a motion in arrest of judgment, if the judges are divided, the motion fails, and the judgment must be entered of course. It must follow the verdict, unless sufficient cause be shown to the contrary. (1 Salk., 17; Ld. Raym., 271; 3 Mod., 156.)

If there can be no assignment but of the whole right, then the exception of particular counties is void; it being repugnant to the prior words and intention of the grant.

So, if the jury find a fact inconsistent with a fact previously found, the latter fact shall be rejected. (Cro. Car., 130; 3 East.; 6 Bac. Abr., 381; Plowd., 564; 1 Bl. Com., 89; 2 Co., 83; 8 Co., 56; Dyer, 351; 1 Co., 3; 1 Vent., 521; Cro. Eliz., 244.)

The whole passed at law by the deed of assignment. The exceptions are in the nature of equitable assignments.

On a subsequent day the court directed the following opinion to be certified to the Circuit Court for the District of Vermont, viz.:

*It is the opinion of the court that [327 the plaintiffs, by their own showing, are not legal assignees to maintain this action, in their own names, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court be arrested.

THE SCHOONER JULIANA
v.
THE UNITED STATES;
AND
THE SHIP ALLIGATOR
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

It was no offense against the embargo law to take goods out of one vessel and put them into another in the port of Baltimore, unless it be with an intent to export them.

THESE were appeals from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, affirming the sentence of the District Court, which condemned the schooner Juliana, and the ship Alligator and cargo, for a supposed violation of the 3d section of the act of Congress of the 9th of January, 1808, entitled, "An act supplementary to the act, entitled an act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," by putting goods from the Juliana on board the Alligator.

The libel, in the case of the Juliana, stated, that on the first of January, 1808, she, being a Swedish vessel, cleared from Baltimore for Port-au-Prince, having on board 100 barrels of herrings, which were on board when her master was notified of the embargo; that she proceeded on her voyage to her port of destination, but before she left Patapsco River, there were laden on board of her a complete cargo of merchandise, foreign and domestic, with which she proceeded, in prosecution of her said voyage, until the 1st of January, 1808, when she was arrested by the officer of the custom-house of the port of Baltimore, and brought back; after which, and while she was in that port, viz., the 11th of January, 1808, sundry goods, described in the libel, were taken and removed from the Juliana and put on board the Alligator, then lying in the port of *Balti- [328 more, "contrary to the provisions of the statutes of the said United States, in such case made and provided, and with intent to violate the provisions of the said statutes, for which cause she was seized by the collector of that port as forfeited. The libel in the case of the Alligator was a copy of that against the Juliana.

The words of that part of the 3d section of the act of January 9, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 11), upon which these libels were founded, are as follows:

"And be it further enacted, that if any ship or vessel shall, during the continuance of the act to which this act is a supplement, depart from any port of the United States without a clearance or permit; or if any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this act is a supplement, proceed to a foreign port or place, or trade with or put on board of any other ship or vessel, any goods, wares or merchandise, of foreign or domestic growth or manufacture, such ships or vessels, goods, wares and merchandise, shall be wholly forfeited."

Harper and Martin, for the appellants, contended

That the sentence ought to be reversed,

1. Because it appears from the libel that if any goods were put on board the Alligator, it was after the Juliana had been seized and brought back, and while the Alligator was at the wharf a perfect hulk, totally unfit to proceed on a voyage, and entirely passive as to any improper use made of her.

2. The libel does not charge that the goods put on board the Alligator were the same which were on board the Juliana when she was seized and brought back.

3. It does not charge that the owner of the Alligator had any knowledge of, or concern in, the business.

4. The evidence is insufficient to prove any cause of condemnation.

329*] *5. It is not averred that the goods were put on board the Alligator with intent to export them; which is the offense contemplated by the act.

6. The libel does not allege that the seizure was made within the district of the seizing officer; nor upon the water. It does not appear to be a case of admiralty jurisdiction.

The Attorney-General, on the next day, abandoned the causes as untenable.

Sentence reversed, and restitution ordered.

THE SCHOONER RACHEL
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

No sentence of condemnation can be affirmed if the law under which the forfeiture accrued has expired, although a condemnation and sale had taken place, and the money had been paid over to the United States before the expiration of the law. This court, in reversing the sentence, will not order the money to be repaid, but will award restitution of the property, as if no sale had been made.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the District Court of the United States for the District of Orleans, which condemned the schooner Rachel for having traded with certain prohibited ports of St. Domingo, contrary to the act of Congress.

The sentence of condemnation was passed, and the vessel sold, and the proceeds paid over to the United States, while the act was in force. The act had since expired. It was a case within the principle decided at last term, in the case of Yeaton and Young v. The United States, but it having been made a question whether the sale and payment over of the money did not prevent the operation of that principle, and there being also a question of jurisdiction, the cause stood over to this term for consideration.

The general question of jurisdiction of that court having been settled at this term in the case of Serré and Laralde v. Pitot and others, and the fact of the sale and payment over of the money being admitted,

Martin* and P. B. Key, for the [330 claimants, prayed the court to direct that the proceeds should be paid over to the claimants.

But the court said that it was a matter to be left to the consideration of the court below. This court will only make a general order for restitution of the property condemned.

THE BRIGANTINE AMIABLE LUCY
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

The act of Congress of the 28th of February, 1803, to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain states, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited, is not in force in the territory of Orleans.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States, for the District of Orleans, to reverse the sentence of that court which condemned the brigantine Lucy, for importing a slave from the West Indies, contrary to the act of Congress of the 28th of February, 1803, (vol. 6, p. 212), entitled, "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain states, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited;" by the first section of which it is enacted, that no master of a vessel, "or any other person, shall import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought, any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, into any port or place of the United States, which port or place shall be situated in any state which by law has prohibited, or shall prohibit, the admission or importation of such negro," &c.

And by the second section it is enacted, "that if any such negro or mulatto, or other person of color, shall be landed from on board any ship or vessel, in any of the ports or places aforesaid, or on the coast of any state prohibiting the admission or importation as aforesaid, the said ship or vessel," &c., "shall be forfeited to the United States."

By the seventh section of the act of March 26, 1804. *"erecting Louisiana into [331 two territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof," (Laws U. S., vol. 7, p. 116,) it is enacted, that the above act of 28th of February, 1803, "shall extend to, and have full force and effect in, the above-mentioned territories."

And the tenth section of the same act (vol. 7, p. 119) prohibits the importation of slaves into the territory of Orleans, from any place without the United States, under the penalty of 300 dollars; and also prohibits, under the like penalty, the importation from the United States of any slave imported into the United States since the first of May, 1798, and of all other slaves except by a citizen of the United States removing into the territory for actual settlement, and being the bona fide owner of such slaves, at the time of such removal.

By the fourth section of the act of March 2, 1805, (vol. 7, p. 281), entitled, "An act further providing for the government of the territory of Orleans," it is enacted, "that the laws in force in the said territory at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the legislature," by that act established. And the eighth section enacts, "that so much of an act, entitled, an act erecting Louisiana into two territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof, as is repugnant with this act, shall, from and after the first Monday of November next, be repealed; and the residue of the said act shall continue in full force, until repealed, anything in the 16th section of the act to the contrary notwithstanding."

This act (March 2, 1805) establishes a government for the territory of Orleans, similar to that before exercised in the Mississippi territory (vol. 5, p. 164), with a few exceptions. The fifth section declares that the article of the ordinance of the old Congress for the government of the territory north-west of the Ohio, which prohibits slavery, is excluded from all operation within the territory of Orleans.

It was admitted that the territorial legislature 332] had *never passed any law prohibiting the importation of slaves.

It was contended by Rodney, Attorney-General, that as Congress by the act of the 26th of March, 1804, prohibited the importation of slaves from foreign countries into the territory of Orleans, and as the same act expressly extends to the territory the act of the 28th of February, 1803, which forfeits the ship which imports a slave into a state where such importation is prohibited, the evident meaning and intention of Congress was, to declare that the vessel should be forfeited which should import a slave into the territory of Orleans.

E. Livingston, contra, contended, that inasmuch as the territorial legislature of Orleans had never prohibited such importation, the act of the 28th of February, 1803, did not apply. If the territory is to be assimilated to a state, so as to bring the case within the spirit of the law, yet, there must have been a prohibition by the territorial legislature, to make it a parallel case.

And of that opinion was this court, the case having been submitted without argument.

Sentence reversed.

SERE AND LARALDE

v.

PITOT AND OTHERS.

A general assignee of the effects of an insolvent cannot sue in the federal courts, if his assignor could not have sued in those courts.

The citizens of the territory of Orleans may sue and be sued in the District Court of that territory in the same cases in which a citizen of Kentucky may sue and be sued in the court of Kentucky.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Orleans, in a suit in equity, in which Sere and Laralde were complainants, against Pitot and others, defendants.

The complainants stated that they were aliens, and syndics of the creditors of the joint concern of Dumas & Janeau, Pierre Lavergne and Joseph Faurie; that Faurie died insolvent; that Dumas & Janeau were *also insol- [333 vent, and made a surrender of all their effects to their creditors, and that Lavergne acknowledged himself to be unable to pay the debts of the joint concern; that the joint concern, as well as the individual members, being insolvent, "application was made by their creditors to the Superior Court of the territory of Orleans, and such proceedings were thereupon had that, according to the laws of the said territory, the complainants were, at a meeting of the creditors of the said partnership, duly nominated syndics for the said creditors, and, by the laws of the said territory, all the estate, rights and credits of the said partnership were vested in the complainants." They also stated that the defendants were citizens of the United States.

The defendants pleaded to the jurisdiction, and the court below allowed the plea.

E. Livingston, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 did not apply to those assignees to whom the choses in action of an insolvent were transferred by operation of law, as in the case of executors and administrators. (4 Cranch, 306, Chappedelaine v. Decheneau;) and,

2. That under the third article of the constitution of the United States, and the judiciary act of 1789, it was sufficient to aver one of the parties to be a citizen of the United States, generally, if the other party were an alien. It is to be presumed that he was a citizen of some one of the states.

Harper, contra.

The judiciary act is express in prohibiting a suit in the federal court by an assignee, if the suit could not have been maintained between the original parties. The expression is general, "or other chose in action," which comprehends the present case.

By the constitution, if one party be an alien the *other must be a citizen of one [334 of the states; it is not sufficient that he be a citizen of one of the territories of the United States.

The case of Chappedelaine was that of an administrator; this is of a mere assignee.

Livingston, in reply.

The act of Congress speaks of recovering the contents of a chose in action, evidently referring only to cases of individual assignments of particular choses in action, not to a general assignment of all his effects by an insolvent.

March 17. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows, viz.:

This suit was brought in the court of the United States for the Orleans territory, by the plaintiffs, who are aliens, and syndics or assignees of a trading company composed of citizens of that territory, who have become insolvent. The defeudauts are citizens of the territory, and have pleadcd to the jurisdiction of the court. Their plea was sustained, aud the cause now comes on to be heard on a writ of error to that judgment.

Two objections are made to the jurisdiction of the District Court.

1. That the suit is brought by the assignees of a chose in action, in a case where it could not have been prosecuted if no assignment had been made.

2. That the District Court cauuot entertain jurisdiction, because the defeudants are not citizens of any state.

The first objection rests ou the 11th section of the judicial act, which declares "that no district or circuit court shall have cognizauce 335] of auy suit to recover *the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action, in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court, to recover the said contents, if no assignment had beeu made."

The plaintiffs are admitted to be the assignees of a chose in action; but it is contended that they are not within the meaning of the provision which has been cited, because this is a suit for cash, bills and notes, generally, by persons to whom the law transfers them, and not by such an assignee, as is contemplated in the judicial act. The words of the act are said to apply obviously to assignments made by the party himself, ou an actual note, or other chose in action, assiguable by the proprietor thereof, and that the word "contents" cannot, by any fair constructiou, be applied to accounts or uuliquidated claims. Apprehensions, it is said, were entertained that fictitious assignments might be madc to give jurisdiction to a federal court, and, to guard against this mischief, every case of an assignment by a party holding transferable paper, was excepted from the jurisdiction of the federal courts, unless the original holder might have sued in them.

Without doubt, assignable paper, being the chose in action most usually transferred, was in the mind of the legislature when the law was framed; and the words of the provision are therefore best adapted to that class of assignments. But there is no reason to believe that the legislature were not equally disposed to except from the jurisdiction of the federal courts those who could sue in virtue of equitable assignments, and those who could sue in virtue of legal assignments. The assignee of all the open accounts of a merchant might, under certain circumstances, be permitted to sue in equity, in his own name, and there would be as much reason to exclude him from the federal courts as to exclude the same person, when the assignee of a particular note. The term "other chose in action" is broad cnough to comprehend either case; and the word "contents" is too ambiguous in its import to restrain that general term. The "contents" of a note are the sum it shows to be due; and the 336] *same may, without much violence to language, be said of an account.

The circumstance, that the assignment was made by operation of law, and not by the act of the party, might probably take the case out of the policy of the act, but not out of its letter and meaning. The legislature has made no exception in favor of assignments so made. It is still a suit to recover a chose in action in favor of an assignee, which suit could not have been prosecuted if no assignment had been made; and is therefore within the very terms of the law. The case decided in 4 Cranch was ou a suit brought by au administrator, and a residuary legatee, who were both aliens. The representatives of a deceased person are not usually designated by the term "assignees," and are, therefore, not within the words of the act. That case, therefore, is not deemed a full precedent for this.

It is the opiniou of the court that the plaintiffs had no right to maintain this suit in the District Court agaiust a citizen of the Orleans territory, they beiug the assignees of persous who were also citizens of that territory.

It is of so much importance to the people of Orleans to decide on the secoud objection, that the court will proceed to consider that likewise.

Whether the citizens of the territory of Orleaus are to be considered as the citizens of a state, within the meaning of the constitution, is a question of some difficulty, which would be decided should one of them sue in any of the circuit courts of the United States. The preseut inquiry is limited to a suit brought by or against a citizen of the territory, iu the District Court of Orleaus.

The power of governing and of legislating for a territory is the inevitable consequeuee of the right to acquire and to hold territory. Could this position be contested, the constitution of the United States declares *that "Con- [337 gress shall have power to dispose of and make all ueedful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Accordingly, we find Congress possessiug and exercising the absolute aud undisputed power of goverening and legislating for the territory of Orleans. Congress has given them a legislative, an executive, and a judiciary, with sueh powers as it has been their will to assign to those departments respectively.

The court possesses the same jurisdictiou which was possessed by the court of Keutucky. In the court of Kentucky, a citizen of Kentucky may sue or be sued. But it is said that this privilege is not imparted to a citizen of Orleans, because he is not a citizen of a state. But this objection is founded on the idea that the constitution restrains Congress from giving the court of the territory jurisdiction over a case brought by or against a citizen of the territory. This idea is most clearly not to be sustained, aud, of consequence, that court must be considered as having such jurisdiction as Congress intended to give it.

Let us inquire what would be the jurisdiction of the court on this restricted construction.

It would have no jurisdictiou over a suit brought by or against a citizen of the territory, although an alien, or a citizen of another state, might be a party.

It would have no jurisdiction over a suit brought by a citizeu of one state against a citizen of another state, because neither party would be a citizen of the "state" in which the court sat. Of what civil causes, then, between private individuals, would it have jurisdiction? Only of suits between an alien and a citizen of another state who should be found in Orleans. Can this be presumed to have been the intention of the legislature in giving the territory a court possessing the same jurisdiction and power with that of Kentucky?

The principal motive for giving federal courts jurisdiction, is to secure aliens and citi-
338*] zens of other *states from local prejudices. Yet all who could be affected by them are, by this construction, excluded from those courts. There could scarcely ever be a civil action between individuals of which the court could take cognizance, and if such a case should arise, it would be one in which no prejudice is to be apprehended.

It is the unanimous opinion of the court that, by a fair construction of the act, the citizens of the territory of Orleans may sue and be sued in that court in the same cases in which a citizen of Kentucky may sue and be sued in the court of Kentucky.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

THE MARYLAND INSURANCE CO.

v.

RUDEN'S ADMINISTRATOR.

What is reasonable time for abandonment is a question for the jury to decide under the direction of a court.

The operation of a concealment, on the policy, depends on its materiality to the risk; and this materiality is a subject for the consideration of a jury.

A bill of lading, stating the property to belong to A and B, is not conclusive evidence, and does not estop A from showing the property to belong to another.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland in an action of covenant upon a policy of insurance upon the cargo of the brig Sally at and from Surinam to New York.

There was no warranty as to the character of the property.

Upon the trial below the plaintiffs in error took three bills of exception; and the verdict and judgment being against them, they brought their writ of error.

The cause was argued by Winder and Martin, for the plaintiffs in error, and by Harper, for the defendant.

The case being fully stated by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court, it is deemed unnecessary to report the arguments of counsel.

March 17. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

339*] *This case depends on the correctness of the Circuit Court in giving some opinions, and refusing others, to which exceptions have been taken.

It appears that, on the 22d of October, the assured received notice of the capture of the vessel insured, and that, on the 25th, he wrote a letter abandoning to the underwriters, which letter was received in course of the mail, and immediately acted upon. Some reasons were assigned, by the plaintiff below, for not having abandoned more immediately after receiving notice of the capture, and the defendant below moved the court to instruct the jury that the assured did not elect to abandon in reasonable time. To the refusal of the court to give this instruction the first exception is taken.

It has been repeatedly declared by this court that what is reasonable time for abandonment is a question compounded of fact and law, of which the jury must judge under the direction of a court. It does not appear that the court below erred in refusing, in this case, to give the instruction required.

The insured was a subject of a belligerent power, but had resided four years in the United States. His letter, representing the risk, was laid before the jury, and a good deal of testimony was taken to prove that a belligerent not named in the representation was interested in the cargo. Some counter testimony was also introduced by the assured. Whereupon the counsel for the underwriters moved the court to instruct the jury that, if they believe the facts stated by him, there was such a concealment as, in contemplation of law, vitiated the policy. This direction the court refused to give, but did direct the jury that, if they should be of opinion that any circumstances were stated by Ruden, or his agent, or that any circumstances were suppressed by either of them, which, in the opinion of the jury, would increase the risk, then the plaintiff cannot recover.

To this opinion an exception was taken.

It is well settled that the operation of any concealment on the policy depends on its materiality to the *risk, and this court has [340 decided that this materiality is a subject for the consideration of a jury. Consequently, the court below did right in leaving it to them.

The counsel for the underwriters then gave some very strong evidence to prove that the property insured was not the sole property of the assured, but was property in which another person held a joint interest. Some counter testimony was adduced; on which the defendant below moved the court to direct the jury to find that the property was not the sole property of Ruden, but the joint property of Ruden and another.

This direction also the court refused to give, and did direct the jury that it was their peculiar province to determine the fact whether Ruden was the sole owner of the property or not; and to this opinion an exception was taken.

It is contended by the plaintiffs in error that the testimony offered by them, among which was the bill of lading stating the property to belong to Ruden and another, was such as absolutely to conclude him, and estop him from denying that another was concerned in the cargo.

The court is not of this opinion. The covering of property does not conclude the person interested, so as to estop him from proving the truth of the case. There is the less reason for that effect being given to these papers in this case, because the letter to the underwriters indicated that the cargo might be shipped in the name of other persons.

If the insured was not absolutely estopped, the court did not err in permitting the jury to weigh his testimony. They had a right to weigh it, and to decide to whom the property belonged. If their verdict was against evidence, the only remedy was a new trial to be granted by the court in which the verdict was found.

There is no error, and the judgment is to be affirmed with costs.

Equity.— Auditor's report does not conclude court, which may, on exceptions filed, look into the evidence, direct an issue, which it may revoke, either expressly or by implication, p. 22.

The following citing cases discuss and apply this principle: City of Memphis v. Brown, 20 Wall. 322, 22 L. 272, upholding right of court upon notice to parties to refer matter to master for decision before cause is ready for decree; Garsed v. Beall, 92 U. S. 694, 23 L. 690, as supporting propriety of reference in case of greatly involved questions of fact; Fitton v. Phoenix Assurance Co., 23 Blatchf. 111, 23 Fed. 4, as supporting right of Circuit Court to send issues to jury in equity case under section 648, Revised Statutes; Pulliam v. Pulliam, 10 Fed. 27, F. C. 11,463a, as to duty of court of equity before making reference to ascertain facts and principles for guidance of master; Simonds Rolling-Machinery Co. v. Hathorn Mfg. Co., 83 Fed. 492, as to right of Circuit Court to permit inquiries by master incidental to principal labor which rests upon court; May v. May, 19 Fla. 394, holding that where facts and law are not in doubt, and it is plain what decree should be made, chancellor need not state an account either before rendering decree or in body of it; dissenting opinion, Jenkins v. International Bank, 97 Ill. 581, as to right of court before reference to determine rights of parties by interlocutory decree, and settle rules to govern master; Head v. Head's Admr., 3 A. K. Marsh, 120, upholding right of court of equity to complete decision of controversy without reference, where questions are legal; McKim v. Thompson, 1 Bland Ch. 160, maintaining right of court to render interlocutory decree from facts as presented without master's report; Holmes v. Hunt, 122 Mass.

513, 23 Am. Rep. 383, as to right of Chancery Court to refer matters of account to auditors, there being no master in chancery; dissenting opinion, Hill v. Jones, 2 Dev. Eq. 109, upholding right of court, if judgment on issue ordered is not satisfactory, to set it aside or decree against it without setting it aside.

Practice.— An interlocutory decree is an implied discharge of a previous order directing an issue, p. 22.

Cited to this point, in Lane v. Kingsberry, 11 Mo. 408, holding granting a new trial impliedly sets aside a former judgment.

Evidence.— In suit by purchasers from judgment debtor to set aside title to land obtained by levy of execution, answer of judgment creditor, responsive to bill, is evidence against plaintiffs, though answer of judgment debtor is not evidence in their favor against judgment creditor, p. 25.

This holding has been extensively relied upon by the citing cases, as follows: Lenox v. Natrebe, Hemp. 257, F. C. 8,246c, holding that answer of one codefendant, though not evidence against another, may be evidence against complainant; West v. Randall, 2 Mason, 205, F. C. 17,424, holding answer of one codefendant not evidence against another; Chambliss v. Smith, 30 Ala. 368, to same general rule; Barraque v. Siter, Price & Co., 9 Ark. 547, holding answer of one defendant not evidence against codefendant, because no cross-examination is allowed; Whiting v. Beebe, 12 Ark. 563, holding answer of one defendant evidence against codefendants claiming under or through him as purchasers pendente lite; Pleasanton v. Raughley, 3 Del. giving same effect to answer where distinction between matters responsive to bill and those of defense set up by way of avoidance was not raised; Miles v. Miles, 32 N. H. 166, 64 Am. Dec. 367, holding answer, so far as responsive to bill, conclusive in his favor until overcome, but requiring matters set up in defense and avoidance to be independently proved; Brown v. Bulkley, 14 N. J. Eq. 300, holding that plaintiff cannot impeach answer of defendant upon bill of discovery on account of latter's want of integrity; Woodcock v. Bennet, 1 Cow. 743, 13 Am. Dec. 579; Dade v. Madison, 5 Leigh, 405, holding, in action upon note, that answer of drawer that it was founded upon gaming consideration is not evidence against drawee, no other evidence being given and notice being denied by latter.

Denied in Blakeney v. Ferguson, 14 Ark. 655, 656, 659, 660, 664, except in cases where codefendant, by admissions or otherwise, binds himself by declaration or answer of other codefendant. Criticised in Dunn v. Graham, 17 Ark. 69, and Glenn v. Baker, 1 Md. Ch. 77, 78, as opposed to Maryland doctrine so far as it holds answer of defendant evidence against codefendants claiming under him. Limited in Schwarz v. Wendell, Walk. Ch. 296. Criticised in Christie v. Bishop, 1 Barb. Ch. 116, 117, 121, as opposed to authority in so far as it allows answer of one defendant to be evidence against codefendant; Wright v. Bates, 13 Vt. 351, holding that such answer should not be evidence against codefendants, except such as acquire title subsequent to answer, as where grantee of mortgagee is held bound by his grantor's answer; Pettit v. Jennings, 2 Rob. (Va.) 681, holding assignee of bond not affected by answer of assignor or obligee, his codefendant, though bond was based upon gaming consideration. Denied in Ward v. Davidson, 2 J. J. Marsh. 445, as opposed to Kentucky authority; Jones v. Hardesty, 10 Gill & J. 415, 32 Am. Dec. 185, as opposed to an otherwise unbroken series of authorities, both English and American; Winn v. Albert, 2 Md. Ch. 176, as to point criticised in above citations, namely, that answer of defendant is evidence against codefendant claiming under him.

Application of payments.— Upon debtor's failing to direct application, power to make such application devolves upon creditor, p. 27.

Barker, 3 Wheat. 155, 4 L. 359, note, upholding creditor's right to apply, in default of debtor; Wendt v. Ross, 33 Cal. 657, holding that there was sufficient evidence of application by the direction of one or agreement of both parties; Pickering v. Day, 3 Houst. 538, 95 Am. Dec. 310, holding that creditor may exercise his option any time before account settled or action brought; National Mahaiwe Bank v. Peck, 127 Mass. 301, 34 Am. Rep. 370, upholding right of bank holding personal and official notes of depositor, latter being secured by surety's indorsement, to apply depositor's account to either note, though secured note matured first; Shortridge v. Pardee, 2 Mo. App. 366, holding that creditor may exercise his option any time before suit and need not consult debtor's benefit; Christnot v. Montana Gold, etc., M. Co., 1 Mont. 48, as to creditor's right to apply, upon default of debtor, where creditor entitled to mechanic's lien had two accounts against debtor; National Bank of Newburgh v. Bigler, 83 N. Y. 64, holding that creditor may apply proceeds of collateral security to any notes due when money is received; Jones v. Benedict, 83 N. Y. 86, to direct point; Bank of California v. Webb, 94 N. Y. 472, allowing creditor to apply more than a year after payments made; Gaston v. Barney, 11 Ohio St. 514, allowing creditor to apply to unsecured notes regardless of interests of sureties on remaining notes; Jones v. Williams, 39 Wis. 308, holding that debtor must have had opportunity to apply and failed to do so before creditor's right arises, hence, that where debtor dies without opportunity to apply creditor's right does not arise.

Application of payments.— If both parties fail to exercise their power, it becomes duty of court to apply payments equitably, and it will so apply them as to extinguish first those debts for which security is most precarious, pp. 27, 28.

This is a recognized leading case on this subject. Citing cases have affirmed and applied the rule as follows: Page v. Patton, 5 Pet. 310, 8 L. 137, holding that debt of administrator against estate having been paid, amount should be credited to fund out of which paid, which, under facts of case, was not administration fund; Boody v. United States, 1 Wood. & M. 168, F. C. 1,636, holding that court should apply to oldest debt; Whetmore v. Murdock, 3 Wood. & M. 395, F. C. 17,510, holding that if one demand is secured and another not, court will apply to latter; Schuelenburg v. Martin, 1 McC. 350, 351, 2 Fed. 749, 750, where earlier items of account were secured and later items unsecured; Nichols, Shepherd & Co. v. Knowles, 3 McC. 479, 17 Fed. 495, holding that presumption favors application to least secured debt; Coons v. Tome, 9 Fed. 536, favoring such application as most favorable to creditor; Kortlander v. Elston, 52 Fed. 184, 6 U. S. App. 283; National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 439, 24 L. 178, holding that neither party can make application after trial begun; The Katie O'Neil, 65 Fed. 117, 118, to point that court should make application to least secured debt, as also in the following: Robinson's Admrs. v. Miscellaneous.— Cited in United States v. Bearnes, 24 Fed. Cas. 1052, as to power of admiralty courts, holding that court has full power to fine party who takes vessel from its custody without permission.

Blockade.— Under British orders of April, 1804, vessel might sail to blockaded port, unless warned off, p. 48.

Marine insurance.— If vessel sail to port within policy, although it intended to go to a port not within the policy, in case former should be blockaded, this is not a deviation, p. 47.

6 Cr. 51, 52, 3 L. 149, YOUNG v. GRUNDY.

Pleading.— If answer neither admits nor denies allegations in bill, they must be proved on final hearing. Upon question of dissolution of injunction they are to be taken as true, p. 51.

Cited and principle applied in United States v. Low, 16 Pet. 168, 10 L. 925, applying rule to allegations of location of claim neither admitted or denied; Brown v. Pierce, 7 Wall. 211, 212, 19 L. 136, holding that after lapse of time, however, answer taken as sufficient tends to prove bill; Board of Public Works v. Columbia College, 17 Wall. 528, 21 L. 691, where allegations in bill being denied case was brought up on pleadings without further evidence; Robinson v. Cathcart, 2 Cr. C. C. 600, F. C. 11,946, holding answer evidence for defendant so far as responsive to bill, pp. 601, 603, to direct point; Rogers v. Marshall, 3 McC. 93, 13 Fed. 64; Wooster v. Muser. 20 Fed. 163, where answer was insufficient, but orator traversed and joined issue and was required to overcome denials and maintain his bill; Jones v. Lamar, 34 Fed. 470, holding that silence as to point upon which bill in terms does not seek discovery, does not warrant decree for specific amount; Whittemore v. Patten, 81 Fed. 528, upholding right of complainant to except to evasive answer in order to have judgment of court as to its effect as denial or admission; Mason v. Jones, 16 Fed. Cas. 1042, applying rule where motion was to dissolve injunction against negotiating notes alleged to be vitiated by fraud; Blakeney v. Ferguson, 14 Ark. 652, holding that complete failure to answer exception taken to answer for incompleteness constitutes admission; Warfield v. Gambell, 1 Gill & J. 510, holding that to give to defective answer effect of admission, complainant must except to it; Dugan v. Gittings. 3 Gill, 165, 43 Am. Dec. 319, holding that answer of executrix admitting possession of assets does not admit allegation of sufficiency of such assets; Briesch v. McCauley, 7 Gill, 196, holding that where one defendant answers in full, but others do not, his admissions do not conclude them; Gartman v. Jones, 24 Miss. 536, holding that allegations not responded to in answer are in issue, and decree must accord with proof; Brockway v. Copp, 3 Paige, 545; McArthur v. Phoebus, 2 Ohio, 424.

Criticised in Neale v. Hagthrop, 3 Bland Ch. 576, 579, holding that unanswered allegations in bill are deemed true and taken pro confesso.

Appeal does not lie from interlocutory decree, dissolving injunction, p. 52.

Cited and rule applied in The Palmyra, 10 Wheat. 504, 6 L. 376, refusing to allow division of cause so as to bring up part on appeal; Clark v. Shelton, Hemp. 208, F. C. 2,833b; Norton v. Hood, 12 Fed. 765; Blakely v. Fish, Hemp. 12, F. C. 18,240, refusing to allow appeal, no final decree being shown; Thomas v. Woolbridge, 23 Wall. 288, 23 L. 136, refusing to allow appeal from such decree where bill was not dismissed before appeal; Kirwan v. Murphy, 170 U. S. 209, 42 L. 1010, 18 S. Ct. 593, refusing appeal from interlocutory order of Circuit Court for issue of temporary injunction; Johnson's Admrs. v. Henry's Exrs., Minor, 13, to direct point refusing writ of error; Garrow v. Carpenter, 4 Stew. & P. 345, holding that appeal from such decree does not revive injunction; Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 111, nor does it create one where decree appealed from refused injunction; Russell v. Pierce, 7 Port. 277, refusing to allow writ of error to such decree where enabling statute authorized appeal; Andrews v. Loveland, 1 Colo. 10; Nacoochoe H. M. Co. v. Davis, 40 Ga. 317, requiring final judgment before allowing writ of error; Pentecost v. Magahee, 4 Scam. 327, intimating that where bill merely asks for injunction, order dismissing injunction might be final and appealable; Cain v. Foote, 8 Blackf. 454, refusing writ of error in like case, though there was statutory appeal lost through failure to perfect; Ringgold's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 17, holding final decree not always necessary to appeal in Maryland; Cohn v. Lehman, 93 Mo. 584, 6 S. W. 270, refusing to allow action on injunction bond until final decree in cause where given; Browne v. Edwards, etc., Lumber Co., 44 Neb. 365, 62 N. W. 1072; Wood v. Dwight, 7 Johns. Ch. 296, holding that appeal from order dissolving injunction does not suspend plaintiff's right to proceed with his execution.

6 Cr. 52, 53, 3 L. 149, EX PARTE WILSON.

Habeas corpus is not the proper remedy in case of arrest under civil process, p. 53.

Cited and principle applied in In re Barry, 136 U. S. 613, 34 L. 509, 42 Fed. 124, refusing habeas corpus to determine, between parents living apart, right to custody of child; Wilson v. Marshall of D. C., 1 Cr. C. C. 609, F. C. 17,822, releasing prisoner on habeas corpus where illegally held for debt greater than due; Bell v. State, 4 Gill, 305, 306, 45 Am. Dec. 132, refusing habeas corpus where execution issued on erroneous judgment; Peltier v. Pennington, 14 N. J. L. 318, refusing habeas corpus where sole question was as to regularity of process and validity of arrest; Cabe v. Cooper, 15 Johns. 156, where it appeared to court that habeas corpus did not apply to cases of imprisonment, on cure process.

Criticised in King v. McLean Asylum, 64 Fed. 343, 21 U. S. App. 481, discussing habeas corpus to determine custody of insane person; Ex parte Rollins, 80 Va. 318, 2 Brock. 475, F. C. 11,558, holding that doubt expressed in principal case no longer exists.

Pleading.— If a plea to any count of the declaration is bad, judgment for defendant cannot be sustained, p. 125.

Cited to this point in Tucker v. Lee, 3 Cr. C. C. 686, F. C. 14,221, holding that general verdict for plaintiff, where some of breaches of contract averred in the contract are insufficient, is bad and judgment must be arrested.

Pleading.—A plea that a State governor had authority to convey State lands, in answer to declaration averring that the legislature had not authority, is argumentative and bad, p. 126.

Cited to this point in Roosevelt v. Fulton, 7 Cow. 76, holding, however, that such plea, though bad on demurrer, is cured by verdict.

Pleading.— Declaration need not assign breach in the words of the covenant. It is enough that it shows a substantial breach, p. 127.

Approved and followed in Murphy v. Lawrence, 2 Ga. 262; Pumeroy v. Bruce, 13 S. & R. 189, and Smith v. Lloyd, 16 Gratt. 312.

Amendment of pleadings may be made in Supreme Court by consent of parties, p. 127.

Cited and practice followed in Hudgins v. Kemp, 18 How. 534, 15 L. 512; Warren v. Moody, 9 Fed. 674, where amendments were made in the Circuit Court upon appeal from the District Court, United States v. Hopewell, 51 Fed. 800, 5 U. S. App. 137, where the doctrine was applied upon appeal to the Circuit Court of appeal; and in Fitchburg v. Nichol, 85 Fed. 870, which holds that a defective allegation of citizenship of the parties may, by consent of the parties, be corrected on appeal to sustain the judgmeut.

Constitutional law.— Grant of State lands may be made by the legislature, p. 128.

In the citing case of Doe v. Mobile, 9 How. 469, 13 L. 220, it was held that a grant of lands of congress to the city of Mobile did not need the aid of a patent. In the citing cases of Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. 454, 9 L. 1154; Angle v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 151 U. S. 40; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 39 Fed. 151; McNee v. Donahue, 76 Cal. 502, 18 Pac. 440, and in North P. R. R. Co. v. Majors, 5 Mont. 126, 2 Pac. 325, it is said that "a grant may be made by law, as well as by a patent pursuant to law." In the citing cases of Daggett v. Bonewitz, 107 Ind. 278, 7 N. E. 901; Dolph v. Barney, 5 Or. 202, and Blakesly v. Caywood, 4 Or. 288, it is held that a grant of lands made by law in words of present grant, vests an immediate legal estate in the grantee. In the citing cases of Canal Co. v. Railroad Co., 4 Gill & J. 128, and Matheny v. Golden, 5 Ohio St. 366, it is said that "a State may contract by act of its legislature," and that "a legislature has the capacity to contract." In Piscataqua Bridge v. N. H. Bridge, 7 N. H. 61, 6 Cr. 128, is cited as sustaining the power of the legislature to make grants, though the Constitution does not expressly confer it. The citation in Houston, etc., R. R. Co. v. Kuechler, 36 Tex. 410, respecting the power of the political department to dispose of the public domain, probably has reference to this holding.

Constitutional law.— Unconstitutionality of a statute is not to be affirmed in cases of doubt, p. 128.

This language has been quoted from in whole or in part, and applied in the following cases: Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 294, 6 L. 634; Passenger Cases, Mr. Justice Daniels' opinion, 7 How. 496, 12 L. 791; Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 531, 20 L. 306; Livingston Co. v. Darlington, 101 U. S. 410, 25 L. 1017; Civil Right Cases, 109 U. S. 27, 27 L. 845; Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 596, 40 L. 821, 16 S. Ct. 646; Scott v. McDonald, 165 U. S. 106, 41 L. 647, 17 S. Ct. 274; Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. State, 20 Fed. 471; Smith v. Fond du Lac, 8 Fed. 295, 10 Biss. 427; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 33 Fed. 128; United States v. Goldman, 3 Woods, 194, F. C. 15,225; Brown v. Walker, 70 Fed. 48; Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Van Ness, 4 Cr. C. C. 600, F. C. 830; United States v. Rhods, 1 Abb. 52, F. C. 16,151; Owen v. Branch Bank, 3 Ala. 262; State v. Sorrells, 15 Ark. 679; Carpender v. Atherton, 25 Cal. 569, 572; Cohen v. Wright, 22 Cal. 308; Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 228; Lick v. Faulkner, 25 Cal. 420; Olmstead v. Camp, 33 Conn. 551, 89 Am. People, 3 Den. 394; Newell v. People, 7 N. Y. 122; Metropolitan Bank v. Van Dyck, 27 N. Y. 460; Stanmire v. Tyler, 3 Jones L. 211; Jacobs v. Smallwood, 63 N. C. 126; Cincinnati, etc., R. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Clinton Co., 1 Ohio St. 83; Opinion of Hitchcock, C. J., 20 Ohio App. 5; Kneedler v. Lane, 45 Pa. St. 310; Shollenberger v. Brinton, 52 Pa. St. 58, 89; State v. Narragansett, 16 R. I. 440, 16 Atl. 906; M'Cullough v. Brown, 41

S. C. 234, 19 S. E. 467; Railroad Co. v. Commissioners, etc., 36 Tex. 407, 410; Henderson v. Beaton, opinion of Associate Justice Bonner, 52 Tex. 38; Brimm v. Jones, 11 Utah, 205, 39 Pac. 825; Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 426, 73 Am. Dec. 369; Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt, 219; Ah. Lim v. Territory, 1 Wash. 159, 24 Pac. 588; Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 568; Newcomb v. Smith, 2 Pinn. 139.

In Sweet v. Rechel, 159 U. S. 393, 40 L. 194, 16 S. Ct. 46, the court, citing Fletcher v. Peck, said: "It is a well-settled rule of constitutional exposition, that if a statute may or may not be, according to circumstances, within the limit of legislative authority, the existence of circumstances necessary to support it must be presumed." In United States v. Boyer, 85 Fed. 430, it is said: "The judiciary should presume, until the contrary is clearly shown, that there has been no transgression of power by congress." In In re Smith, 2 Woods, 463, F. C. 12,996, the court, in making the citation, said: "The court ought not to pronounce a law unconstitutional, unless its incompatibility be then decided and inevitable." In the citing case of United States v. Fairchild, 1 Abb. 76, F. C. 15,067, the court said: "To warrant the courts in setting aside this law as unconstitutional, the case must be so clear that no reasonable doubt can be said to exist." But see Sadler v. Langham, 34 Ala. 321. In the citing cases of Alabama & Florida R. R. Co. v. Burkett, 42 Ala. 87, and People v. Wilson, 15 Ill. 392, it is held that "limitation of power of the State legislature should be strictly construed." In the citing case of Osborne v. Mayor, etc., 44 Ala. 499, it is held that "a State law, and for like reason the law of a State municipal corporation, will not be declared unconstitutional unless it is clearly not in conformity to that instrument." In the citing case of Thorne v. San Francisco, 4 Cal. 158, Heydenfeldt, J., said: "It is indisputable now that a law will not be declared invalid, unless there is a clear and strong conviction of its repugnancy to the Constitution." In the citing case of People v. Scott, 9 Colo. 432, 12 Pac. 613, it is said that the principles announced in the cited case are "only suggestions to be considered by the judiciary." In the citing case of Eames v. Savage, 77 Me. 216, 52 Am. Rep. 752, it is declared that the presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, "and it is a presumption of great strength — all the judges and writers agree on that." In the citing case of Commissioners on Inland Fisheries v. Holyoke Water Power Co., 104 Mass. 449, 6 Am. Rep. 250, it is said: "No act of the legislature is to be declared invalid unless its repugnancy to the Constitution is manifest and unavoidable." In the citing case of Bank v. Darlington, 50 S. C. 363, 27 S. E. 858, it is held that a statute must be construed as qualified by the Constitution upon the well-settled principle that a statute will never be construed as unconstitutional when it can be in way possible reconciled with the Constitution.

In the citing case of Sears v. Cottrell, 5 Mich. 259, the court said: "The power of declaring laws unconstitutional should be exercised with extreme caution, and never where serious doubt exists as to the conflict. And see Mitchell v. Blodgett, 13 Mich. 151. In the citing case of Whaley v. Whaley, 51 Mo. 86, the court said: "When the Constitution restrains the exercise of legislative power, the restraint itself, and the terms upon which it is imposed, should be so construed as to sustain the power as exercised unless such construction is clearly unconscionable." In the citing case of George v. Concord, 45 N. H. 437, it is said: "Courts will never decree a statute void, unless the nullity and invalidity of the act are placed in their judgment beyond a reasonable doubt." In the citing case of Williams v. Bank of Michigan, 7 Wend. 556, it is held that one State will not inquire into the constitutionality of a law of another State or territory. In the citing case of Wooley v. Watkins, 2 Idaho, 564, 22 Pac. 105, it is said: "More than three-quarters of a century ago, that great lawyer and eminent jurist, Chief Justice Marshall, announced a rule of interpretation in cases involving alleged conflicts between statutes and constitutions, which has ever since commanded the respect of courts of justice."

The principles of the cited case have been held to apply to the construction of the Constitution as to the governor's power of appointment, Nicholson v. Thompson, 5 Rob. (La.) 391, 404; and to the sustaining of the validity of a constitutional amendment, Koehler v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 588, 14 N. W. 761. They have been cited and applied in support of the constitutionality of a State insolvency law, Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 294, 6 L. 634; of a State law taxing alien passengers upon their arrival in port, Passenger Cases, 7 How. 496, 12 L. 791; of the legal tender acts of congress, Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 531, 20 L. 306; Lick v. Falkner, 25 Cal. 420; Metropolitan Bank v. Van Dyke, 27 N. Y. 460; Shollenberger v. Brinton, 52 Pa. St. 58, 89; of an act establishing a State reform school, and authorizing municipal corporation to devote money to secure its locatino. Livingston Co. v. Darlington, 101 U. S. 410, 25 L. 1017; of the civil rights act of congress, Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 27, 27 L. 845, dissenting opinion; United States v. Rhodes, 1 Abb. 52, F. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 568; Newcomb v. Smith, 2 Pinn. 139.

The following cases while citing and approving the principles of Fletcher v. Peck as applied to cases where the unconstitutionality of an act is a matter of doubt, also affirm and apply the doctrine of that case in regard of the duty of the court to hold an act unconstitutional in a clear case, and have held various statutes unconstitutional, Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Stone, 20 Fed. 471; Sadler v. Langham, 34 Ala. 321; Eason v. State, 11 Ark. 486; Patterson v. Temple, 27 Ark. 206; People v. Scott, 9 Colo. 432, 12 Pac. 613; Mun v. Randolph, 31 Vt. 242.

Constitutional law.— Corruption or improper motives of legislature in passing a bill cannot be inquired into in suit between private individuals upon question growing out of such bill, p. 131.

This portion of Chief Justice Marshall's opinion has been cited with approval in the following cases: Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 371, 15 L. 418; United States v. Des Moines, etc., Co., 142 U. S. 545, 35 L. 1109, 12 S. Ct. 318; United States v. Old Settlers, 148 U. S. 466, 37 L. 523, 13 S. Ct. 666; Angle v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 151 U. S. 17, 38 L. 64, 14 S. Ct. 246; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 39 Fed. 154, 155, 151 U. S. 43, 45; Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 515; First Society v. Platt, 12 Conn. 192; Bartlett v. Kennedy, 15 Conn. 334; State v. Blake, 69 Conn. 75, 36 Atl. 1022; Macon, etc., R. Co. v. Little, 45 Ga. 389; Wright v. Defrees, 8 Ind. 303; Miners' Bank v. United States, 1 G. Greene, 565; Corbin v. Marsh, 2 Duv. 198; Elmondorff v. Carmichael, 3 Litt. 482, 14 Am. Dec. 95; Jones v. Chiles, 4 J. J. Marsh. 613; Villavaso v. Barthet, 39 La. Ann. 258, 1 So. 607; State v. Fagan, 22 La. Ann. 548; Frederick v. Gill, 38 Mo. 527; Tennant's Case, 3 Neb. 429; Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 299; Jersey City, etc., R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, etc., R. R. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 76; People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 279, 88 Am. Dec. 383; State v. Cincinnati G. L. Co., 18 Ohio St. 300; Jones v. Jones, 12 Pa. St. 357, 51 Am. Dec. 615; Sharpless v. Mayor, 21 Pa. St. 163, 59 Am. Dec. 767; Helsey v. Gaines, 2 Lea. 356; Crutchfield v. Car Works, 8 Baxt. 245; Lynn v. Polk, 8 Lea, 218, 233, 298; State v. Cunningham, 81 Wis. 509, 51 N. W. 738; 49 Am. Dec. 621, note, 51 Am. Dec. 623, note.

In Dodge v. Wolsey, 18 How. 371, 15 L. 418, Mr. Justice Campbell said: "The courts cannot look to the corruption, the blindness, nor the mischievous effects of State legislations to determine its binding operation." In United States v. Des Moines, etc., R. R. Co., 142 U. S. 545, 35 L. 1109, 12 S. Ct. 318, the court said: "Although it has sometimes been argued at the bar that the courts ought to inquire into the motives of the legislature when fraud and corruption are alleged, and annul their action if the allegations were established, the argument has in no case been acceded to by the judiciary, and they have never allowed the inquiry to be entered into." In Angle v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 151 U. S. 17, 18, 38 L. 64, 14 S. Ct. 246, the court citing the rule in Fletcher v. Peck, at length, said: "The rule upon which this decision rests has been followed in many cases and has become a settled rule of jurisprudence." In United States v. Old Settlers, 148 U. S. 466, 37 L. 523, 13 S. Ct. 666, the Supreme Court approved of the action of the Court of Claims in declining to go behind the treaty of 1846, upon the ground that it was not within the province of a court, either of law or equity, to determine that a treaty or an act of congress had been procured by duress or fraud and declare it inoperative for that reason. In First Society v. Platt, 12 Conn. 192, it was held that a resolution of the general assembly could not be disregarded as constructively fraudulent for want of notice to an ecclesiastical society affected by it. In State v. Blake, 69 Conn. 75, 36 Atl. 1022, it is held that it cannot be shown that the legislature was misled or acted under a mistake in its action. In Elmondorff v. Carmichael, 3 Litt. 482, 14 Am. Dec. 95, the court said: "No instance, it is believed, can be found of either estoppel being allowed to operate or fraud to be charged against the crown of England, or the commonwealth of America." In Jones v. Chiles, 4 J. J. Marsh. 613, the court, in its opinion, said: "Fraud cannot be imputed to the government, nor is there in her grants any warranty, express or implied." In Corbin v. Marsh, 2 Duv. 198, the court said: "This court must look only to the power, and never presume an unconstitutional motive for its exercise." In Jones v. Jones, 12 Pa. St. 357, 51 Am. Dec. 615, it was held that evidence was inadmissible to show that a divorce granted by the legislature was obtained by fraud or falsehood, or that one of the members of the legislature misrepresented the facts." In Lynn v. Polk, 8 Lea, 218, 233, 298, it was held that bribery of the legislature could not be shown to invalidate an act." In Tennant's Case, 3 Neb. 429, Mason, C. J., held that this doctrine was also applicable to the motive of the executive in issuing a proclamation to convene the legislature. In the citing cases of Bartlett v. Kingsley, 15 Conn. 334; Villavaso v. Barthet, 39 La. Ann. 258, 1 So. 607; Crutchfield v. Car Works, 8 Baxt. 245; and Jersey City, etc., R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, etc., R. R. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 76, it was held that the same principles which forbid an investigation into the motives of the State legislature forbid such investigation into the motives of a municipal legislature in the passage of a municipal ordinance; and that such ordinance could not be avoided for illegal intention, or for fraud in its procurement. But see contra, State v. Cincinnati G. L. Co., 18 Ohio St. 300.

Bona fide purchasers for value, without notice of fraud, as between a prior grantor and grantee, are protected from rescission on account of it, pp. 132, 133, 134, 135.

This doctrine in regard to the protection of bona fide purchasers for value, without notice of a secret fraud or concealed defect has been expressly approved and applied in the following cases: Cochran v. Cobb, 43 Ark. 184, applying it to a purchase of State swamp lands in levee bounds, and holding that where the contract was executed by conveyance and the lands had passed into the hands of innocent third parties for value, the State was estopped by its own grant to resort to the land; Bleecker v. Bond, 3 Wash. C. C. 542, F. C. 1,534, bona fide purchasers from the State of Georgia were held protected; Johnston v. Smith, 21 Tex. 729, holding that in case of a grant by the government, parol evidence of fraud in obtaining the grant should not be permitted to impeach the grant in the hands of bona fide purchasers after a great lapse of time.

In Smith v. Ewing, 11 Sawy. 64, 23 Fed. 747; Quick v. Milligan, 108 Ind. 423, 58 Am. Rep. 52, 9 N. E. 395; Broussard v. Broussard, 45 La. Ann. 1089, 13 So. 701; Blanchard v. Castillo, 19 La. 364; Hubbard v. Greeley, 84 Me. 347, and Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 201, 13 Am. Dec. 417, the doctrine was applied to the protection of a bona fide purchaser from a defrauded grantor. In Myers v. Sanders, 7 Dana, 519, it was applied to the protection of a bona fide purchaser under a sheriff's deed, made with fraudulent collusion; in Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns. 197, 6 Am. Dec. 331, to the protection of a bona fide purchaser under a sale of mortgaged property against usury in the mortgage debt. In Paddock v. Fish, 10 Fed. 128; Wood v. Mann, 1 Sumn. 510, F. C. 17,951; Thames v. Rembert, 63 Ala. 571; Paige v. O'Neal, 12 Cal. 497; George v. Kimball, 24 Pick. 239; Thomas v. Mead, 8 Mart. (N. S.) 343, 19 Am. Dec. 187; Water v. Riggin, 19 Md. 554; Wineland v. Coonce, 5 Mo. 300, 32 Am. Dec. 323; Gordon v. Haywood, 2 N. H. 403; Savings Bank v. Mead, 63 N. H. 436; 82 Am. Dec. 248; Anderson v. Roberts, 18 Johns. 531, 9 Am. Dec. 242; Mateer v. Hissim, 3 Pen. & W. 165; Sawtelle v. Weymouth, 14 Wash. 27, 43 Pac. 1103, and Simms v. Morse, 2 Fed. 329, 4 Hughes, 583, the doctrine was applied to the protection of bona fide purchasers of property conveyed in fraud of the creditors of the grantor. In Danbury v. Robinson, 14 N. J. Eq. 219, it is held that the rights of such a bona fide purchaser are not affected or impaired by the fact that judgments were reversed against the fraudulent grantor prior to the conveyance. But in the citing case of Agricultural Bank v. Dorsey, Freem. Ch. 343, it was held that the protection of bona fide purchasers against the creditors of the grantor does not extend to a purchase or a mortgage for a pre-existing debt. In Miles v. Oden, 8 Mart. (N. S.) 227, 19 Am. Dec. 183, it was held that the protection of a bona fide purchaser from the fraud of the vendor, applies to the protection of a bona fide purchaser of a note given to the vendor upon fraudulent transfer of his property. In Henninger v. Heald, 52 N. J. Eq. 439, 29 Atl. 194, it is held that the doctrine of the protection of a bona fide purchaser without notice of a prior equity, arising out of fraud, extends to the protection of the grantee of such grants, though he had notice of the fraud if he was not a participant therein. In Gilman v. Hamilton, 16 Ill. 232, it is held that the doctrine applies to the protection of a bona fide purchaser at a judicial sale under a voidable decree of sale. In Barrow v. Bispham, 11 N. J. L. 116, it was held that the doctrine does not extend to the assignment of a chose in action, the purchaser of which, however bona fide, must abide by the case of the one from whom he bought. Cited also arguendo, on question of Spanish title in Chew v. Calvit, Walk. (Miss.) 61.

Constitutional law.— A party should not be judge in his own cause, and if the legislature claim this right it must be governed by equitable and legal rules, pp. 132, 133.

Cited in Clyma v. Kennedy, 64 Conn. 318, 42 Am. St. Rep. 196, 29 Atl. 539, holding a justice of the peace not qualified to decide a criminal action for a newspaper libel against himself upon complaint of a grand juror.

Constitutional law.— In general it is competent for one legislature to repeal any act which it was competent for a former legislature to pass, and one legislature cannot abridge the powers of its successors, pp. 135–143.

This proposition is approved in Gilleland v. Schuyler, 9 Kan. 580; State v. Dews, Charlt. (Ga.) 412, 419; Bank v. Bond, 1 Ohio St. 640; Sandusky Bank v. Wilbur, 7 Ohio St. 497, and Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 1 N. H. 132, 135. In the citing case of Smith v. Westcott, 17 R. I. 367, 22 Atl. 281, it is held that the legislature may transfer the custody of funds held upon a public trust from one set of commissioners to another. But in the citing case of Blair v. Marye, 80 Va. 491, it is held that the power of the legislature over public officers generally does not extend to constitutional officers. In the quoting case of Gilleland v. Schuyler, supra, it is held that the right to contest the election of a public officer given by one legislature may be taken away by another legislature, and that the appeal of the law authorizing such contest could abate an action already commenced. In the quoting cases of Bank v. Bond, and Sandusky City Bank v. Wilbur, supra, it is held that an act incorporating a State bank and other banking companies was a public and general law, which might be changed upon the subject of taxation. In the citing cases of Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 563, 7 L. 956; Seymour v. Hartford, 21 Conn. 486; Grand Lodge of Masons v. City, 44 La. Ann. 665, 11 So. 151; Washington University v. Rouse, 42 Mo. 317; Plankroad Co. v. Husted, 3 Ohio St. 583; and Iron City Bank v. Pittsburg, 37 Pa. St. 343, it is held that the State has a general power of taxation over corporations, when exemption from taxation does not form a valid and binding part of the charter. In the citing case of Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 378, 15 L. 421, Campbell, J., dissenting, insists upon the sovereign power of the legislature over the subject of taxation. In the citing case of Appeal Tax Court v. Patterson, 50 Md. 372, it is held that the general power of taxation by a State is not affected by the exemption from taxation under the laws of another State of corporate stocks held by citizens of taxing State. In the quoting case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, supra, it is held that the charter of Dartmouth College was a subject of general legislation which might be changed; but the doctrine of that case was overruled in 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. 629. In the citing case of State v. Southern Pac. Co., 24 Tex. 125, it is held that the charter of a railroad corporation does not prevent the exercise of the general power of the legislature, and that it may authorize a suit in the name of the people to forfeit the charter for violation of law. In the citing case of Railroad Co. v.

Transportation Co., 25 W. Va. 353, it is held that irrevocable grants and franchises conferred upon a railroad company are, nevertheless, subject to the general power of the legislature to fix charges for transportation. And in the citing cases of Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. 213, 20 L. 553; Miller v. New York, 15 Wall. 489, 21 L. 101; Leep v. Railway Co., 58 Ark. 429, 41 Am. St. Rep. 124, 25 S. W. 81; State v. Northern Cent. Ry. Co., 44 Md. 165; Comrs. on Inland Fisheries v. Holyoke Water Co., 104 Mass. 448, 6 Am. Rep. 249; Proprs. of Side Booms v. Haskell, 7 Me. 477; In re Matter of Bank, 21 N. Y. 14; M'Laren v. Pennington and Others, 1 Paige, 108; Iron City Bank v. Pittsburg, 37 Pa. St. 343, and State v. Brown, etc., Mfg. Co., 18 R. I. 24, 25 Atl. 249, it is held that the general power of the legislature over corporations continues to exist, when a power of amendment or repeal has been reserved from its charter. In the citing case of Ex parte Mayer, 27 Tex. 720, it is held that the legislature may repeal acts which relate to public policy; and that a conscription law allowing substitutes for drafted men could be repealed, and one who had sent a substitute be made liable to military duty.

Constitutional law.— Acts done under one law cannot be undone by a succeeding legislature, p. 135.

Cited with approbation in the following cases: State v. County Court, 19 Ark. 373, 374; State v. Southern Bank, 23 La. Ann. 272; United States v. Minnesota, etc., R. R. Co., 1 Minn. 133; People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 395; People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 48, 7 Am. St. Rep. 702, 18 N. E. 702; Eakin v. Raub, 12 Serg. & R. 366, 372; Bank v. M'Veigh, 20 Gratt. 467.

Constitutional law.— Rights vested under a law, which is in its nature a contract, cannot be divested by the legislature, p. 135.

Cited and principle applied in State Branch Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 284, 14 L. 983, and State v. County Court, 19 Ark. 373, 374, which hold that a law exempting lands from taxation under contract with the legislature cannot be repealed; Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 297, 29 L. 195, 5 S. Ct. 918, which holds that an act making coupons receivable for taxes conferred a contract right upon the holders of coupons, which could not be impaired by the legislature; Filer v. Fuller, 44 Ark. 282, holding that an act repealing an overdue tax law cannot deprive attorneys of their vested right to compensation in pending suits; in Boston, etc., R. R. Co. v. Salem, etc., R. R. Co., 2 Gray, 31, 34, which holds that a railroad charter made exclusive by the act granting it is a contract of the commonwealth protected as a grant of a vested right; and in People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 48, 7 Am. St. Rep. 702, 721, n., 18 N. E 702, which holds that the vested rights of a corporation in its property cannot be divested, under a reserved power to repeal its charter.

In the citing cases of Comrs.' Court v. Rather, 48 Ala. 447; Howard v. Jones, 50 Ala. 69; Watson v. Rose, 51 Ala. 300; Micou v. Tallassee B. Co., 47 Ala. 656; English v. Oliver, 28 Ark. 334; Co. Comrs. v. King, 13 Fla. 474; State v. Walsh, 31 Neb. 476, 48 N. W. 265; Munday v. Rahway, 43 N. J. L. 340; Moore v. State, 43 N. J. L. 217, 39 Am. Rep. 570; Homestead Cases, 22 Gratt. 287, 288, 12 Am. Rep. 514, 515; United States v. Quincy, 4 Wall. 549, 18 L. 408; United States v. Johnson, 5 Dill. 212, F. C. 15,489, it is held that the law in force at the time of the making of a contract and in any manner affecting it enter into and become a part of the contract, and cannot be repealed or altered so as to affect the obligation of the contract or to impair rights vested under those laws. In Robinson v. Reid, and Homestead Cases, supra, it was held that a law exempting certain property from execution when a debt was incurred, could not be changed so as to increase the exemption against the creditor. In Comrs'. Court v. Rather; English v. Oliver; County Comrs. v. King; State v. Walsh; Munday v. Rahway; United States v. Quincy, and United States v. Johnson Co., supra, it was held that holders of bonds issued under a statute have a vested right in the statutory remedy of levying a tax to pay the bonds, of which they cannot be deprived by repeal or change of the statute. In the citing case of Graham v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 53 Wis. 484, 10 N. W. 613, it is held that the lawfulness of an act done depends upon the laws in force at the time, and that vested right of action for unlawful acts cannot be taken away by repeal of the statute making such acts unlawful. In the citing case of Enfield Toll Bridge v. Hartford, etc., R. R. Co., 17 Conn. 61, 42 Am. Dec. 723, it is held not a violation of the Constitution or of vested rights to take lands held either under an executed or an executory contract under the power of eminent domain upon making compensation therefor.

In a number of citing cases it is held that vested rights are protected against any power of the legislature to divest them. Thus it is held that the property of an alien cannot be divested by law without his consent, otherwise than by the power of eminent domain, Bonaparte v. Camden, etc., R. R. Co., 1 Bald. 220, F. C. 1,617; that the legislature cannot divest any citizen of a lawfully acquired right or title to property, Dockery v. McDowell, 40 Ala. 482; that the property of a ward cannot be converted into illegal Confederate money by authority of the legislature; Newman v. Reed, 50 Ala. 303; that county bonds issued under a law in aid of harbor improvement could not be curtailed in amount by the legislature to the injury of bondholders, Slaughter v. Mobile County, 73 Ala. 138; that the State cannot by a change of the Constitution cut off or destroy rights and remedies vested under valid contracts lawfully made under the former Constitution, Jacoway v. Denton, 25 Ark. 643; Berry v. Bellows, 30 Ark. 204. So also that rights vested in a fund provided for the payment of bonds under an internal improvement act cannot be divested by a subsequent act devoting the fund to other purposes, Trustees, etc. v. Bailey, 10 Fla. 130, 81 Am. Dec. 199; that an act for the issuance of county bonds providing for levy of a tax to pay them cannot be repealed or changed to the detriment of the bondholders, County Comrs. v. King, 13 Fla. 474; that a remedial act cannot be allowed to operate retrospectively so as to divest a right of action in a pending cause, Wilder v. Lumpkin, 4 Ga. 215, 220; Satterlee v. Matthewson, 16 S. & R. 185. But see 2 Pet. 380, 7 L. 458, contra. Again that a retrospective act cannot take away any existing personal liability of an executor or administrator, Martindale v. Moore, 3 Blackf. 277, 278; that rights of property vested under a contract for State printing, authorized by law, cannot be divested by repeal of the law, State v. Barker, 4 Kan. 387, 96 Am. Dec. 179; that rights vested under a State grant cannot be divested by eminent domain for the purpose of establishing a town, Jackson v. Winn, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 329; that rights vested under a legislative grant of a lottery privilege cannot be divested by repeal of the law, Gregory v. Trustees, 2 Met. (Ky.) 598, quoted from, but overruled in Douglas v. Commonwealth, 168 U. S. 500, 42 L. 557, 18 S. Ct. 203; that the vested property rights of a city are protected against divestiture by the legislative power, New Orleans, etc., R. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 26 La. Ann. 521; Milwaukee v. Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 102; In re Malone, 21 S. C. 449. It has been further held that rights vested under a valid common-law rule of property cannot be divested by a retrospective statute, Kennebec Purchase v. Laboree, 2 Me. 289, 11 Am. Dec. 90; that while the legislature may control the general plan of a city laid out under authority of a law of congress, rights vested in purchasers, whose lots are bounded on a street or square, cannot be divested, Cooper v. Alden, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 85; that a vested right of defense under the statute of limitations cannot be divested by a change or repeal of the statute, Davis v. Minor, 1 How. (Miss.) 192, 28 Am. Dec. 330; Newland v. Marsh, 19 Ill. 385; Eakin v. Raub, 12 S. & R. 366, 371; that a right vested by lapse of the time within which an appeal might be taken, cannot be divested by a retrospective act allowing an appeal, Burch v. Newburg, 10 N. Y. 391; that congress cannot confiscate debts due from one citizen to another, Clark v. Mitchell, 64 Mo. 575; that the legislature cannot lawfully deprive a person of a legally vested right, but that the decision of a law court that such vested right might be taken under the power of eminent domain, in establishing a ferry, was binding upon a court of equity, Stark v. McGowan, 1 Nott & McCord, 400; that an act allowing parol evidence to identify lands which were previously inadmissible under the statute of frauds, could not have retrospective effect upon a previous contract which was void under that statute, Lowe v. Harris, 112 N. C. 480, 481, 17 S. E. 540; that the legislature cannot validate void deeds of married women, Robinson v. Barfield, 2 Murphy, 422; that a State cannot make scrip a legal tender for the payment of a note, Knighton v. Burns, 10 Or. 550; nor suspend execution upon judgments unless plaintiff should accept bank notes in payment. Townsend v. Townsend, Peck. 12, 14 Am. Dec. 732; that the vested rights of an owner of land held under the State cannot be affected by an act allowing a trespasser for his improvements in an action of ejectment, Briscoe v. Evans, 2 Overt. 346; that an act allowing appeal after the prescribed time, impaired the contract arising from the judgment, Bates v. Kimball, 2 D. Chip. 89; Nelson v. Allen, 1 Yerg. 379; that an act authorizing payment in Confederate currency cannot be made to apply to debts contracted before its passage, Bank v. McVeigh, 20 Gratt. 466, 467; that a remedy cannot be taken away or incumbered with burdensome restrictions without impairing the obligation of the contract, American B. & L. Assn. v. Rainbolt, 48 Neb. 450, 67 N. W. 499; and that a legislative divorce impairs the marriage contract and is void, State v. Fry, 4 Mo. 132.

On the other hand, the following cited cases hold that rights may be affected or changed by retrospective legislation where the obligation of contracts is not impaired thereby; in Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet. 413, 7 L. 469, the reference of which to Fletcher v. Peck is repeated in the cases of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 581, 9 L. 837, and Cochran v. Van Surlay, 20 Wend. 371, 373, 32 Am. Dec. 572, 574, it is said that the case of Fletcher v. Peck nowhere intimates that a statute which divests vested rights retrospectively is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, provided it does not impair the obligation of contracts, and it is held that an act making a change in the relation of landlord and tenant between Connecticut settlers and Pennsylvania claimants might operate retrospectively on pending suits. In Charles River Bridge v. Warren River Bridge, 11 Pet. 581, 9 L. 837, it is held that an act legalizing competition of the Warren Bridge with the Charles River Bridge was a valid exercise of legislative power, and violated no right guaranteed to the latter by the State of Massachusetts. Contra, per Story, J., dissenting, pp. 617, 634, 645, 9 L. 851, 858, 863. In United States ex rel. v. Stockslager, 129 U. S. 477, 32 L. 787, 9 S. Ct. 384, it is held that an act of congress for the relief of heirs did not give vested rights in certificates to be issued thereunder, and that such act may be suspended by congress before any certificates had been taken out. In the citing cases of Buckner v. Street, 1 Dill. 251, F. C. 2,098, and McElvain v. Mudd, 44 Ala. 76, 4 Am. Rep. 106, it is held that slave contracts were abolished and made illegal by the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery.

In other citing cases it is held that the law-making power may pass retrospective enactments, as follows: To confirm deeds of married women which were defectively acknowledged, Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. 110, 8 L. 884; to direct the court to set aside the inquisition of a jury as to damages for the condemnation of land, and to order a new inquisition, Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Nesbit, 10 How. 402, 13 L. 472; to impose a collateral inheritance tax applying in the case of persons who died before the passage of the law, Carpenter v. Commonwealth, 17 How. 463, 15 L. 129; to require a retrospective test oath, Ex parte Garland, dissenting opinion of Miller, J., 4 Wall. 390, 18 L. 374; Green v. Shumway, dissenting opinion of Mann, J., 39 N. Y. 432; the majority of opinions of the court in each case being to the contrary; Ex parte Hunter, 2 W. Va. 159; Ex parte Quarrier, 4 W. Va. 223; to divest rights accrued under a mere gratuitous grant of a lottery franchise, by repeal of the law granting the license, such rights being deemed to have accrued subject to the police power of the State to revoke the license, Douglas v. Commonwealth, 168 U. S. 500, 42 L. 557, 18 S. Ct. 203, overruling Gregory v. Trustees, 2 Met. (Ky.) 598; to repeal an act conferring a military title, and settling an annuity, Dale v. Governor, 3 Stew. 395, Collier, J., dissenting, id. 422; to affect the rights of heirs after descent cast, Holmes v. Bank of Norfolk, 12 Ala. 417; to make Confederate money illegal by ordinance of a convention, Lawson v. Miller, 44 Ala. 626, 4 Am. Rep. 150; to tax insurance companies by percentage on premiums for a year commencing before the passage of the act, Citizens' M. I. Co. v. Lott, 45 Ala. 196; to confirm municipal bonds, Bridgeport v. Housatonic R. R. Co., 15 Conn. 497; to repeal an act containing an executory promise without consideration, before rights are acquired under it, Trustees of Bishop's Fund v. Rider, 13 Conn. 96; Allen v. Forrest, 8 Wash. 703, 36 Pac. 972; to repeal a bridge franchise granted without consideration, before it is put into execution, Young v. Harrison, 6 Ga. 155; to repeal a penal statute giving a qui tam action to an informer, so as to abate an action pending prior to judgment, Bank of St. Marys v. State, 12 Ga. 498; to validate the previous action of a municipal corporation, Bass v. Mayor, etc., 30 Ga. 851; to change a water front line previously established by law, in front of a line of water lots, Floyd v. Blanding, 54 Cal. 46; to change the rules of evidence in action upon antecedent contracts, and dispense with proof of execution of a note unless denied under oath, Temple v. Hayes, Morris (Iowa), 12; to prohibit, by police power of the State, the use of land granted for burial purposes, Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co., dissenting opinion of Sheldon, J., 70 Ill. 203; to take away a right to complete the contest of an election already begun, Gilleland v. Schuyler, 9 Kan. 580; to establish a drainage company to drain marsh lands, if not infringing the rights and obligations of vendors and vendees, Petition of New Orleans Drainage Co., 11 La. Ann. 348.

Other citing cases have found this principle no obstacle to affirming the following laws: To limit the rate of parish taxation so as to affect the salary of a parish attorney appointed by the District Judge, State v. Police Jury, 34 La. Ann. 45; to take away an exemption from taxation forming no part of a charter grant, Grand Lodge of Masons v. City, 44 La. Ann. 665, 11 So. 151; Washington University v. Rouse, 42 Mo. 317; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 563,

7 L. 956; Seymour v. Hartford, 21 Conn. 486; Plank Road v. Husted, 3 Ohio St. 583; Iron City Bank v. Pittsburg, 37 Pa. St. 343; to regulate the remedies between borrower and lender upon a usurious contract, and to require the usury to be pleaded, and the sum due to be paid with interest, Baugher v. Nelson, 9 Gill, 307, 52 Am. Dec. 699; to provide the mode of proceeding against banks for violating their charter, and to authorize an injunction to restrain the collection of demands due them, Commercial Bank v. State, 4 Sm. & M. 507; to remove the disqualification of interested witnesses, as applied to causes of action existing prior to passage of the act, Rich v. Flanders, 39 N. H. 313, 376; to authorize sale of the estate of infants for their maintenance and education, Cochran v. Van Surlay, 20 Wend. 371, 32 Am. Dec. 572; to confirm validity of taxes and take away a right to recover them when paid without authority of law, and to take away the right to recover costs in pending action prior to judgment, Grim v. School District, 57 Pa. St. 435, 98 Am. Dec. 238; to cure defects in judicial proceedings, and validate a sale of land therein, Lane v. Nelson, 79 Pa. St. 410; to change a provision in a municipal charter that when a street has been once improved it should not be again improved, Ladd v. Portland, 32 Or. 273, 51 Pac. 654; to change the remedy upon appeal bonds, and transfer appeal causes from one court to another, Mexican N. R. R. Co. v. Mussette, 86 Tex. 715, 26 S. Ct. 1077; and retrospectively to extend the time for the redemption of lands under execution, Scobey v. Gibson, 17 Ind. 577.

Constitutional law.— It seems that the nature of society and of government establish certain limitations upon legislative power apart from constitutional provisions, pp. 135, 136, 139, 143.

The language of Chief Justice Marshall in reference to this proposition has been quoted from in the following cases: Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet. 413, 7 L. 469; Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 297, 29 L. 195, 5 S. Ct. 918; Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 581, 20 L. 322; Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 237, 41 L. 985, 17 S. Ct. 585; Avery v. Fox, 1 Abb. 253, F. C. 674; Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Van Ness, 4 Cr. C. C. 600, F. C. 830; Albee v. May, 2 Paine, 80, F. C. 134; Bleecker v. Bond, 3 Wash. C. C. 541, F. C. 1,534; Ex parte Martin, 13 Ark. 207, 58 Am. Dec. 327; Jacoway v. Denton, 25 Ark. 643; Hooker v. Van Haven & N. Co., 14 Conn. 153, 36 Am. Dec. 479; Campbell v. State, 11 Ga. 370; Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 525; Petition of New Orleans Drainage Co., 11 La. Ann. 349; Kennebec Purchase v. Laborec, 2 Me. 289, 11 Am. Dec. 90; People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 395; People v. Gallagher, 4 Mich. 251; Clark v. Mitchell, 64 Mo. 575; Griffin v. Mixon, 38 Miss. 434; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 391; Kelly v. Pittsburg, 85 Pa. St. 182, 186; Bristoe v. Evans, 2 Overt. 346; Peerce v. Carskadon, 4 W. Va. 247, 6 Am. Rep. 292; Baugher v. Nelson, 9 Gill, 307, 52 Am. Dec. 699; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 27 Am. Rep. 639, 642, note. Mr. Justice Johnson's observations upon the same matter are quoted in Durkee v. Janesville, 28 Wis. 468, 9 Am. Rep. 503, and in Milwaukee v. Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 100. In the citing case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 617, 9 L. 851, Mr. Justice Story says: "It would be against the first principles of justice to presume that the legislature reserved a right to destroy its own grant. That was the doctrine of Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cr. 87, in this court, and in other cases turning upon the same grand principle of political and constitutional duty and right." In The Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 581, 20 L. 322, Chase, C. J., after quoting the words of Chief Justice Marshall, said: "These remarks of Chief Justice Marshall were made in a case in which it became necessary to determine whether a certain act of the legislature of Georgia was within the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligations of contracts. And they assert fundamental principles of society and government in which that prohibition had its origin. They apply with great force to the construction of the Constitution of the United States. In like manner and spirit, Mr. Justice Chase had previously declared (Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 388, 1 L. 649), that an act of the legislature contrary to the great first principles of the social compact cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority." In Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 297, 29 L. 195, 5 S. Ct. 918, the words of Chief Justice Marshall are quoted and referred to as expressing the doctrine on which the constitutional provision rests. In Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 237, 41 L. 985, 17 S. Ct. 585, Mr. Justice Harlan said: "In Citizens' S. & L. Assn. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 663, 22 L. 461, Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the judgment of this court, after observing that there were private rights in every free government beyond the control of the State, and that a government, by whatever name it was called, under which the property of citizens was at the absolute disposition and unlimited control of any depository of power was after all a despotism, said: The theory of our governments, State and National, is opposed to the deposit of unlimited power anywhere. The executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches of these governments are all of limited and defined power. There are limitations on such power which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments." In accordance with these principles it was held in that case, that the property of the citizen could not be taken under the power of taxation to promote private objects.

In the case of Boswell v. Dickerson, 4 McLean, 267, F. C. 1,683, Fletcher v. Peck is cited to sustain the proposition that "an act assuming the power to dispose of the property of nonresidents without notice would be opposed to the immutable principles of justice, and under the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the Union, the law would be held void." In the citing case of Wilder v. Lumpkin, 4 Ga. 215, it is said that "the fundamental principles of the social compact and free government require that private rights be held sacred." In the quotiug case of Campbell v. State, 11 Ga. 370, it is held that "any law subversive of the principle of personal liberty and natural justice is invalid, indcpendently of written constitutions." In the quoting cases of Bleecker v. Bond, 3 Wash. C. C. 541, F. C. 1,534, and Griffin v. Mixon, 38 Miss. 434, the language of Chief Justice Marshall is expressly approved. In the citing case of Schroder v. Ehles, 31 N. J. L. 50, the court after citing English opinions said: "If in England at this day an act should be passed totally subversive of the great natural rights of man, a question by no means settled would be presented for adjudication. In this country likewise, that important subject has received considerable attention at the hands both of judges and speculative writers, and the preponderance of authority seems to be adverse to the omnipotence of the legislative power. This side of the controversy is certainly sustained by the great names of Marshall and of Story." In the citing case of State v. Flanders, 24 La. Ann. 71, a quotation is made from Story on the Constitution, 1399, on this point. In the quoting case of Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 391, the language of Chief Justice Marshall is approved, and it is said that "aside from the special limitations of the Constitution, the legislature cannot exercise powers which are in their nature essentially judicial or executive, but where the Constitution is silent, and there is no clear usurpation of power, there would be great difficulty and danger in attempting to define the limits of the power." In Kelly v. Pittsburg, 85 Pa. St. 182, 186, 27 Am. Rep. 639, note, Chief Justice Agnew quotes the words of Chief Justice Marshall with approval, and in support of the invalidity of an act taxing farming lands within the boundaries of a city, which could derive no benefit from municipal taxation, which, it was urged, infringed the fundamental rights of the citizen. In the quoting case of Peerce v. Carskadou, 4 W. Va. 247, 6 Am. Rep. 292, the court expressly approves the lauguage of Chief Justice Marshall. In Durkee v. Janesville, 28 Wis. 468, 9 Am. Rep. 503, the language of Mr. Justice Johnson is quoted with approval, and a number of cases are referred to similar effect.

But in the citing case of Bridgeport v. Housatonic R. R. Co., 15 Conn. 497, it is said that "a conflict of opinion is noted as to whether the legislature may take away vested rights by retroactive legislation, without just compensation, as being opposed to the spirit of the Coustitution and the fancied social compact, though not withiu the letter of any constitutional prohibition." To similar effect is Bass v. Mayor, etc., of Columbus, 30 Ga. 851; Stewart v. Supervisors of Polk Co., 30 Iowa, 17, 1 Am. Rep. 244, it is said that "there is no paramount and supreme law which defines the law of nature independent of the Constitution, and courts caunot assume the rights of the people to correct unwise legislation." In Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 525, in the quoting opinion of Stewart, J., the language of Chief Justice Marshall is distinguished as inapplicable to the exercise of the police power, in prohibiting the liquor traffic. In Petition of New Orleans Drainage Co., 11 La. Ann. 349, it is said: "This is very delicate ground. It is asking us to hush the declared will of a co-ordinate branch of the government, not because it contravenes any provision of the organic law which we are to expound, but because it contradicts our notion of justice. Perhaps we have such power; like the right of revolution, it is continuously hinted at in judicial opinions." In the quoting case of People v. Gallagher, 4 Mich. 251, a conflict of opinion is declared upon the point stated. But in the dissenting opinion of Pratt, J., in the same case, p. 275, the language of Chief Justice Marshall is quoted with approval. In the citing case of Orr v. Quimby, 54 N. H. 647, the doctrine is criticised. In the case of Milwaukee v. Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 100, which cites the opinion of Mr. Justice Johnson, it is said: "There are those who, independently of constitutional restriction, and upon general principles, and on the reason and nature of things, hold that legislative bodies have no such authority (as to divest vested rights), and that such a proceeding would be an act of lawless violence. The Constitutions, State and Federal, furnish ample grounds against such abuses, without resort to such general principles." In the citing case of State v. Allmond, 2 Houst. 640, it is stated that Chief Justice Marshall "recoiled from the doctrine" announced by him, supra, and that "there is no judicial precedent for it," and the court declines to make the first judicial precedent, as being unnecessary, for the reason that the guaranties of the Constitution afforded sufficient grounds for protection.

Constitutional law.— It is the legislative function to prescribe general rules for the government of society. But the application of those rules to individuals seems to pertain to some other department, p. 136.

In the citing case of St. Paul, etc., R. R. Co. v. St. Paul, etc., R. R. Co., 68 Fed. 18, 32 U. S. App. 372, the question is suggested, but left undecided, whether the exercise of power to forfeit lands under a voidable grant pertains solely to the judiciary, or may be done by legislative enactment. In the citing cases of Dale v. Governor, 3 Stew. 418; Flint River S. Co. v. Foster, 5 Ga. 205, 48 Am. Dec. 257; Beall v. Beall, 8 Ga. 218, and Louisville, etc., R. R. Co. v. County Court, 1 Sneed, 671, 62 Am. Dec. 438, it is held that it is the province of the judiciary to pronounce upon the invalidity of a law. In Beall v. Beall, supra, it is said that this power belongs to every branch of the judiciary from the highest to the lowest. But in the citing case of Turner v. Althaus, 6 Neb. 72, it is held that the power of the judiciary department does not extend to the declaring of a law invalid merely because it is wrong or unjust. In the citing case of Coleman v. Newby, 7 Kan. 87, it is said that "it is the province of the legislature to make laws, of the judiciary to construe and to expound them, and of the executive to execute and enforce them." And it is held that rules adopted by the court are not in the nature of law. In the quoting case of State Bank v. Cooper, 2 Yerg. 605, 24 Am. Dec. 522, it is held that the legislature could not create a special court for the determination of suits commenced by a State bank. In the citing case of Fisher v. Dabbs, 6 Yerg. 150, it is held that the legislative department cannot control the judiciary, within their peculiar sphere, nor direct the chancellor to dismiss certain cases, and to send the record to another court for trial. In the citing case of Powell v. State, 17 Tex. App. 361, it was held to be "beyond the power of the legislative department to interpret and declare the meaning of a constitutional provision." In the citing case of Seat of Government Case, 1 Wash. Ter. 127, it is held that the legislative department of the Federal government acts under a grant of power from the Federal Constitution, while a State Constitution is a mere limitation of power of the legislative department of the State.

Constitutional law.— How far the power of giving the law may involve every other power, in cases where the Constitution is silent, has never been and perhaps never can be definitely stated, p. 136.

Cited and relied upon in the following: Territory v. Cox, 6 Dak. 508, 524, saying that "the powers of the co-ordinate departments of government overlap so that the line of separation is often indiscernible by the judicial eye;" Hovey v. State, 119 Ind. 402, 21 N. E. 24, observing that: "The line between the legislative and executive departments is not clearly defined. The legislature may name agencies or leave their selection to the executive;" Commissioners v. Carter, 2 Kan. 132, holding that while the line separating the legislative from the judicial departments is not clearly marked, yet the legislature has no power to declare void county bonds valid; Ex parte Williams, 31 Tex. Cr. 273, 20 S. W. 581, holding "the possibility of abuse is not a valid argument against legislative power;" and that an occupation tax upon lawyers cannot be held to be an indirect crippling of the judicial department; Commissioners of Sinking Fund v. George, 47 S. W. 780, affirming act making penitentiary commissioners elective by legislature; Purnell v. Mann, 48 S. W. 410, upholding similar act respecting election commissioners. See also 13 Am. St. Rep. 139, note.

Constitutional law.— The States are not sovereign powers, but members of the Union, whose Constitution is supreme, p. 136.

Cited to this point in The Parkhill, 18 Fed. Cas. 1188, denying restitution of corporate merchantman captured during civil war.

Constitutional law.— The prohibition against impairing contract obligations includes and protects executed contracts or grants as well as executory contracts. Contracts defined, and these two kinds distinguished, pp. 136, 137.

The language of Chief Justice Marshall upon this point is quoted from, in whole or in part, in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, opinion of Story, J., 4 Wheat. 682, 4 L. 670; Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 92, 5 L. 570; Coast Line R. R. Co. v. Mayor, etc., 30 Fed. 649; State v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 33 Fed. 774, 775; St. Louis v. Western Union T. Co., 63 Fed. 70; Cincinnati, etc., R. R. Co. v. McKeen, 64 Fed. 46, 24 U. S. App. 218; Stein v. Mobile, 49 Ala. 368, 20 Am. Rep. 285; Mobile v. Railroad Co., 84 Ala. 120, 5 Am. St. Rep. 346, 4 So. 108; State v. County Court, 19 Ark. 364, 367; Myers v. English, 9 Cal. 349; Adams v. Barrett, 5 Ga. 414, 415; Chanely v. Bailey, 37 Ga. 536; State v. Mayor, 32 La. Ann. 716; State v. Mayor, etc., of Jersey City, 31 N. J. L. 581, 86 Am. Dec. 244; Sandusky City Bank v. Wilbur, 7 Ohio St. 494, 497; Adams v. Reed, 11 Utah, 502, 40 Pac. 724; and 7 Am. St. Rep. 720, note. In the citing case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 573, 9 L. 834, McLean, J., said: "If it had not been otherwise laid down in Fletcher v. Peck, I should have doubted whether this inhibition did not apply exclusively to executory contracts. This doubt would have arisen as well from the consideration of the mischief against which the provision is intended to guard, as from the language of the provision itself." In the quoting case of Myers v. English, supra, Fletcher v. Peck is criticised as applied to executed contracts, upon the ground that an executed contract has no obligation to be impaired, and is to be protected merely on the ground of a vested right. But the contrary is held and the doctrine of Fletcher v. Peck on this point affirmed, not only in quoting cases supra, but also in many other citing cases hereinafter set forth.

In State v. Mayor, etc., supra, as also in Peerce v. Kitzmiller, 19 W. Va. 573, it is held that judgments for damages in tort are not contracts within the protection of the constitutional provision against impairment of the obligation of contracts. In Illinois v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., supra, it is said: "This general language is to be interpreted with reference to the facts and issue in that particular case." In the citing case of Adams v. Reed, 11 Utah, 502, 40 Pac. 724, it is held that a defective deed is an executory contract, and stands upon the same footing as a contract to convey. In the following citing cases it is held that a promise without consideration is not a binding contract within the constitutional provision where no rights have become vested under it; Young v. Harrison, 6 Ga. 155; Trustees of Bishops' Fund v. Rider, 13 Conn. 96; Allen v. Forrest, 8 Wash. 703, 36 Pac. 972. In the citing case of Mexican N. R. Co. v. Mussette, 86 Tex. 715, 26 S. W. 1077, it is said: "Obligations which are protected are such as exist by reason of contract, which never exists without consent or agreement of parties, express or implied; and it cannot be implied when the party in whose favor the obligation exists has no power to prevent it," and it is held that appeal bonds are not based upon the consent of adverse litigants, and that the legislature may retroactively affect the remedy upon such bond. In the citing case of Ex parte Mayer, 27 Tex. 720, it is held that contracts whose obligations are protected do not include rights growing out of regulations of the government relating to public policy. In the citing case of Bates v. Kimball, 2 D. Chip. 88, it is held that a report of commissioners allowing claims against an estate has the effect of a judgment, and of a perfected contract of record, the obligation of which cannot be impaired by the legislature.

The language of the chief justice as to the invalidity of a law divesting an executed grant is quoted in Grogan v. San Francisco, 18 Cal. 612. In Roach v. Gunter, 44 Ala. 212, 4 Am. Rep. 134, it is held that the State cannot provide that the grantor of a conveyance may rescind it, without the excuse of fraud, accident or mistake. In the citing case of Newlan v. Marsh, 19 Ill. 385, it is held that a statute cannot be operative to take the title of one citizen and confer it upon another, and it must not be so construed. In the citing case of Lowe v. Harris, 112 N. C. 480, 481, 17 S. E. 540, it is said: "No law which divests property out of one person, and vests it in another for his own private purposes, without the consent of the owner, has ever been held a valid exercise of legislative power, in any State of the Union." In the following citing cases it is held that a municipal corporation is estopped by its grant of a franchise, and that it cannot resume, modify or impair the obligation of the grant; Coast Line, etc., R. R. Co. v. Mayor, etc., 30 Fed. 649; St. Louis v. Western Union T. Co., 63 Fed. 70; Stein v. Mobile, 49 Ala. 368, 369, 20 Am. Rep. 285; Los Angeles v. L. A. C. W. Co., 61 Cal. 69; Jewett v. Alton, 7 N. H. 256; Mayor, etc. v. Houston S. R. Co., 83 Tex. 555, 29 Am. St. Rep. 685, 19 S. W. 129. See also cases cited supra, under a preceding syllabus. In Lonsdale v. Moies, 15 Fed. Cas. 863, the proposition that a grant is a contract is relied on to justify calling a deed an agreement.

Constitutional law.— Contracts to which a State is a party are within the obligation clause, and consequently legislative grant, being a contract, may not be subsequently impaired, p. 137.

This doctrine is reaffirmed in State v. Wilson, 7 Cr. 166, 3 L. 303, and Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 750, 27 L. 462. In citing cases of Greenwood v. Union F. Co., 105 U. S. 20, 26 L. 964, and Leep v. Railway Co., 58 Ark. 429, 41 Am. St. Rep. 124, 25 S. W. 81, it is observed that the doctrine of Fletcher v. Peck was extended and advanced in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. 629, for the protection of franchises granted by the State to private corporations. In the citing case of Canal Co.'s Case, 83 Md. 626, 35 Atl. 365, it is stated that "the State can no more impair through her judiciary her own contract than she can impair the obligation of the same contract through her legislature."

In the citing case of Commissioners v. Holyoke W. Co., 104 Mass. 448, 6 Am. Rep. 249, the court said: "In the United States it has been settled for more than half a century by the decision of the Supreme Court that a grant or charter from a State legislature is a contract within the meaning of the article of the Constitution which declares that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligations of contracts." In the citing case of State v. Young, 29 Minn. 525, 9 N. W. 739, it is said: "There seems to have been doubt suggested at an early day that the clause applied to contracts made by a State. The question was first raised in Fletcher v. Peck." In the citing case of Jackson, etc., R. R. Co. v. Davison, 65 Mich. 452, 37 N. W. 544, Moore, J., said: "Since the case of Fletcher v. Peck, no one has supposed that a State can revoke its own grant, without legal proceedings."

In the following citing cases the principle that the Constitution forbids a State to impair the obligations of its own grants and contracts has been recognized and applied to the protection against impairment by subsequent enactment, of acts exempting property from taxation under a contract made by the State: State v. Wilson, 7 Cr. 166, 3 L. 303, State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 384, 14 L. 983; State v. County Court, 19 Ark. 364, 367, 373, 374; Seymour v. Hartford, 21 Conn. 486; State v. Southern Bank, 23 La. Ann. 272; State v. Comrs., 37 N. J. L. 251; State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 500; Worth v. Railroad Co., 89 N. C. 300, 45 Am. Rep. 686; Matheny v. Golden, 5 Ohio St. 366; though a grant of such exemption is not to be construed as a contract unless made clearly binding as such, London v. Litchfield, 11 Conn. 268; Seymour v. Hartford, 21 Conn. 486; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 563, 7 L. 956; Grand Lodge v. City, 44 La. Ann. 665; Washington University v. Rouse, 42 Mo. 317; Plank Road Co. v. Husted, 3 Ohio St. 583; Iron City Bank v. Pittsburg, 37 Pa. St. 343, and Herrick v. Randolph, 13 Vt. 530; nor is an exemption in another State effective to preclude taxation, Appeal Tax Court v. Patterson, 50 Md. 372. Again the doctrine has been applied to the protection of acts conferring charters and franchises upon private corporations: Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 656, 682, 4 L. 664, 670; Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 331. 12 L. 460; Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. 232, 21 L. 457; Greenwood v. Union Freight Co., 105 U. S. 20, 26 L. 964; Pearsall v. Great N. R. R. Co., 161 U. S. 662, 40 L. 843, 16 S. Ct. 708; Gray v. Davis, 1 Woods, 423, 424, F. C. 5,715; Camblos v. Philadelphia, etc., R. R. Co., 4 Fed. Cas. 1106; Bronson v. Taylor, 33 Conn. 117; W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Bowers, 4 Houst. 533; Young v. Harrison, 6 Ga. 154; Hamilton v. Keith, 5 Bush, 462; Montpelier A. Trustees v. George, 14 La. 408, 33 Am. Dec. 590; State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 206; Canal Co. v. Railroad Co., 4 Gill & J. 128, 146; Boston, etc., Corp. v. Salem, etc., R. R. Co., 2 Gray, 31, 34; Michigan State Bank v. Hastings, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 234, 41 Am. Dec. 551; Dow v. Northern R. R. Co., 36 Atl. 534; State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 500; Matheny v. Golden, 5 Ohio St. 366; State v Matthews, 3 Jones L. 464; State v. Heyward, 3 Rich. L. 409; Attorney General v. Railroad Co., 35 Wis. 563; but where there is a reserved power to repeal or amend the charter of a corporation, no contract is violated or impaired by such repeal or amendment, Penn. College Cases, 13 Wall. 213, 20 L. 553; Miller v. New York, 15 Wall. 489, 21 L. 101; Leep v. Railway Co., 58 Ark. 429, 41 Am. St. Rep. 124, 25 S. W. 81; Bronson v. Taylor, 33 Conn. 117; State v. Northern C. R. R. Co., 44 Md. 165; Comrs. v. Holyoke W. Co., 104 Mass. 448, 6 Am. Rep. 249; Props. v. Haskell, 7 Me. 477; In the Matter of Oliver Lee, etc., Bank, 21 N. Y. 14; M'Laren v. Pennington and Others, 1 Paige, 108; Iron City Bank v. Pittsburg, 37 Pa. St. 343; State v. Brown Mfg. Co., 18 R. I. 24, 25 Atl. 249; though, even in such cases, the property rights of a corporation remain inviolable, Attorney General v. Railroad Co., 35 Wis. 563; People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 48, 7 Am. St. Rep. 702, 721, note, 18 N. E. 702.

Acts and Constitutions of Kentucky and Virginia constituting a compact between those States for the protection of claimants of lands under laws of Virginia are protected by this principle, Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 92, 5 L. 570; as also a patent to lands granted by a State, Williams v. Norris, 12 Wheat. 125, 6 L. 574; Doe v. Buford, 1 Dana, 488; a grant of lands by the King of Spain, United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 738, 8 L. 565; acts granting lands in aid of railroads, Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. 232, 21 L. 457; Gray v. Davis, 1 Woods, 423, F. C. 5,715; United States v. Minnesota, etc., R. R. Co., 1 Minn. 133; Koenig v. Omaha, etc., R. R. Co., 3 Neb. 383; Railroad Co. v. Commissioners, 36 Tex. 427, 434; but congress may repeal a territorial grant to a railroad company made upon condition which was not fulfilled, Rice v. Minn, etc., R. R. Co., 1 Black, 374, 17 L. 151; and a State may repeal a grant of submerged lands in a harbor made without consideration to a railroad company, so far as not executed by improvements actually made, State v. Illinois C. R. R. Co., 33 Fed. 774, 775; acts granting lands for public squares may not be impaired, United States v. Illinois Cent. R. R. Co., 154 U. S. 244, 38 L. 976, 14 S. Ct. 1019; Warren v. Mayor, 22 Iowa, 358; Cooper v. Alden, Harr. (Mich.) 85; Le Clercq v. Trustees, 7 Ohio, 221, 28 Am. Dec. 643; nor an act granting a franchise to build a track in a street, Port of Mobile v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 84 Ala. 120, 5 Am. St. Rep. 346, 4 So. 108; or a right to construct locks, Enfield Toll B. Co. v. Conn. R. R. Co., 7 Conn. 48; a State contract leasing a State's prison is inviolable, McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 30; a State grant of swamp lands, Montgomery v. Kasson, 16 Cal. 194; legislative grant of lands to a city or town, Grogan v. San Francisco, 18 Cal. 612, 613; Richardson v. Brown, 6 Me. 358; In re Malone's Estate, 21 S. C. 449; Brownsville v. Basse, 36 Tex. 501; or to a county, Galveston v. Tankersley, 39 Tex. 657; lands granted in aid of schools, State v. Springfield Tp., 6 Ind. 97; Roberts v. M. & Ky., etc., R. R. Co., 43 Kan. 108, 22 Pac. 1008; Simmons v. Holmes, 49 Miss. 140; Grammar School v. Burt, 11 Vt. 641; Grammar School v. Bailey, 62 Vt. 476, 477, 20 Atl. 823; but congress with the consent of the State at any time prior to survey could change the terms of the grant of the sixteenth and eighty-sixth section in aid of schools so as to except mineral lands, and grant others in lieu thereof, Haydenfeld v. Daney, etc., Co., 10 Nev. 310; other grants of land from the State are protected, Hilliard v. Connolly, 7 Ga. 179; Winter v. Jones, 10 Ga. 196, 54 Am. Dec. 382.

The following have also been held inviolable contracts under the doctrine of the leading case: An act granting a lottery franchise for a license paid therefor, Boyd v. State, 46 Ala. 334; the executed compact of the States with the Federal government, Hawkins v. Filkins, 24 Ark. 319; Chanceley v. Bailey, 37 Ga. 536; an act granting to a purchaser at tax sale the right to repayment with interest of all money paid, Corbin v. Comrs., 3 Fed. 362, 1 McCrary, 527; and the right to a deed within a specified time, Hull v. State, 29 Fla. 89, 30 Am. St. Rep. 99, 11 So. 99; Bruce v. Schuyler, 9 Ill. 276, 278, 46 Am. Dec. 458, 460; a legislative grant of a right to take tolls upon a turnpike; Derby Tp. v. Parks, 10 Conn. 541, 27 Am. Dec. 704; a municipality's lighting contract, Blood v. Manchester Elec. L. Co., 39 Atl. 336; an exclusive right to erect a toll bridge, Enfield T. B. Co. v. Hartford, etc., R. R. Co., 17 Conn. 61, 42 Am. Dec. 723; Piscataqua Bridge v. N. H. Bridge, 7 N. H. 68. See Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 7 Pick. 507, 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. 773; Chenango B. Co. v. Binghamton B. Co., 27 N. Y. 92, 119; a State indorsement of bonds of railroad companies, except as adjusted with the consent of bondholders, State v. Cobb, 64 Ala. 152; a State appropriation for payment of its obligations, Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 207, 22 Am. St. Rep. 627, 26 N. E. 779; State railroad bonds, which cannot be impaired by constitutional amendment, State v. Young, 29 Minn. 525, 529, 531, 9 N. W. 739, 741, 743; a legislative grant of a charity, Prince William S. Board v. Stuart, 80 Va. 80, per Lewis, J., majority holding contra that the charity was within the scope of general legislative power; a grant from the State authorizing the obstruction of a stream by a dam, Glover v. Powell, 10 N. J. Eq. 229; People v. Platt, 17 Johns. 215, 8 Am. Dec. 388; State v. Glenn, 7 Jones L. 327; a State contract for the construction of a public work, Danolds v. State, 89 N. Y. 45, 46, 42 Am. Rep. 280; an act granting a right to cut a canal through the State, State v. Burgess, 23 La. Ann. 227; a State grant of a right of wharfage, Langdon v. Mayor, 93 N. Y. 156; a sale of land by commissioner appointed by the legislature, Stanmire v. Taylor, 3 Jones L. 213; and an act funding the public debt and making coupons receivable for demands due the State, Antoine v. Wright, 22 Gratt. 872. See also 35 Am. St. Rep. 533, note, and cases cited under a preceding syllabus.

In the citing case of Boston Water P. Co. v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 23 Pick. 394, it is held that a State grant of land does not preclude the taking of the land by the State by the power of eminent domain, upon payment of compensation. In the citing case of Allen v. Forrest, 8 Wash. 703, 36 Pac. 972, it is held that a law granting to the improver of tide lands a right to purchase them from the State conferred no vested right prior to purchase, and that as to cases when the privilege of purchase had not been exercised, the legislature might repeal the law, and provide for use and occupation of the lands for other purposes. In the citing case of Russell v. Barney, 6 McLean, 582, F. C. 12,152, it is held that the principle, that a grant made pursuant to an act of the legislature may not be impaired by the State, is inapplicable to a statute of limitations operating conditionally to defeat the title granted. In the citing case of The Palo Alto, 2 Ware (Dav.), 356, F. C. 10,700, it is held that the principle of the cited case is inapplicable where a donation from the government is not delivered or is coupled with a condition precedent to be performed by the grantee. In the citing case of State v. Young, 29 Minn. 529, 531, 9 N. W. 741, the question is discussed as to how far there may be an obligation resting upon a State for which there may be no judicial remedy. In the citing case of Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 207, 22 Am. St. Rep. 627, 26 N. E. 779, it is said that the State may defeat enforcement of its obligation by failure to make an appropriation, and that it cannot be sued. In the citing case of Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 286, 29 L. 191, 5 S. Ct. 912, it is said: "It is true that no remedy for breach of its contract by a State by way of damages for its compensation, or by means of process to compel its performance, is open in the courts of the United States, by a direct suit against the State itself on the part of the injured party, being a citizen of another State or subject of foreign State. But it is equally true that whenever in a controversy between parties to a suit of which these courts have jurisdiction, the question arises upon the validity of a law of a State impairing the obligation of its contract, the jurisdiction is not thereby ousted, but must be exercised, with whatever legal consequence to the rights of the litigants, may be the result of the determination."

Constitutional law.— The Federal limitations upon State power are founded upon the desire to protect life and property from the sudden and strong passions to which men are exposed, and the Constitution contains what may be deemed a bill of rights for the people of each State, p. 138.

Fletcher v. Peck is quoted to this point in Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 322, 18 L. 362; United States v. Johnson Co., 5 Dillon, 212, F. C. 15,485; Bonaparte v. Camden Co., 1 Bald. 220, F. C. 1,617; Jacoway v. Denton, 25 Ark. 643; Weidenger v. Spruance, 101 Ill. 298; State v. Johnson, 12 Minn. 485, 93 Am. Dec. 248; Garland v. Brown, 23 Gratt. 176. In the last cases cited the same principle was held applicable to a State Constitution.

Bills of attainder may affect the life of an individual or confiscate his property, or may do both, p. 138.

The language of Chief Justice Marshall on this point is quoted in Norris v. Doniphan, 4 Met. (Ky.) 434, where an act of 1862 confiscating the property of rebels as a punishment for treason was held unconstitutional. It is said in that case that a "bill of attainder includes a bill of pains and penalties," and the same is said in the citing case of In re Yang Sing, 13 Sawy. 485, 36 Fed. 439, where it is held that a legislative act which undertakes to inflict upon Chinese the punishment of banishment or exile from the United States is void as being a bill of attainder. It is cited also in Ex parte Law, 35 Ga. 302, 15 Fed. Cas. 10, and In re Shorter, 22 Fed. Cas. 19, which affirm the invalidity of the test oath act of congress of 1865; in Myers v. Sanders, 7 Dana, 519, where it is held that an act making a patent from the State a subject of forfeiture was a bill of pains and penalties.

Ex post facto law is one which renders an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when committed, p. 138.

This definition has been referred to and relied upon by the citing cases as follows: Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 326, 18 L. 364, which holds a test oath imposed by the Missouri Constitution to be ex post facto; Gut v. Minnesota, 9 Wall. 38, 19 L. 574, which holds that a law changing the place of trial of a criminal case, though passed subject to the commission of the offense or the finding of the indictment, is not invalid; Lapeyre v. United States, 17 Wall. 206, 21 L. 611, where Hunt, J., expressed the opinion that an act previously lawful cannot be made unlawful and punishable whether the matter was considered as criminal or civil in its nature; Burgess v. Salmon, 97 U. S. 384, 24 L. 1106, where the same doctrine is stated and it is held that an act increasing a duty on tobacco and imposing a penalty for nonpayment is ex post facto as applied to a lesser duty paid before the act took effect; Ex parte Medley, 134 U. S. 171, 33 L. 840, 10 S. Ct. 387, where it was held that an act providing solitary confinement before the execution of a murderer was ex post facto as to a crime committed before its passage; Whitney v. Emmet, 1 Bald. 316, F. C. 17,585, where it is held that a law construed as imposing a forfeiture of the rights of a plaintiff in a patent case, when he was entitled to treble damages for the injury, would be ex post facto; Hart v. State, 40 Ala. 38, 88 Am. Dec. 756, which holds that a law authorizing a conviction upon less evidence than was required when the offense was committed is ex post facto; Ex parte Law, 35 Ga. 310, 15 Fed. Cas. 12, where it is said that the definition of Chief Justice Marshall is approved by Chancellor Kent (Com. 409), and held that the retrospective part of the test oath act of congress of 1865 was a bill of attainder and ex post facto; Blake's Case, 1 Blackf. 483, which cites Fletcher v. Peck as to the nature of an ex post facto law, but holds that a retrospective act requiring an attorney to take oath that he has not engaged in a duel is not ex post facto; Wooley v. Watkins, 2 Idaho, 566, and Shepherd v. Grimmett, 2 Idaho, 1128, 31 Pac. 795, and Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 566, 582, 605, where it is held that a law requiring electors to verify their qualifications by oath was not ex post facto; Strong v. State, 1 Blackf. 198, n, 2, where the definition is held not to preclude an act changing the punishment of an offense after its commission, from stripes to confinement in the State prison; Wilson v. O. & M. R. W. Co., 64 Ill. 546, 16 Am. Rep. 568, where it is held that an act substituting a new punishment for violation of a prior prohibited act is ex post facto; Weidenger v. Spruance, 101 Ill. 298, where Mr. Justice Dickey is of opinion that a law imposing a new liability upon holders of fully paid up stock in a corporation was in the nature of a bill of attainder and an ex post facto law; In re Petty, 22 Kan. 482, where it is said that the definition given by Chief Justice Marshall "is subject to the qualification that when the new law mitigates the character or punishment of a crime already committed, it does not fall within the prohibition of the Constitution," but it is held that a law imposing one year's imprisonment in addition to the penalty of death, as to crimes previously committed, is ex post facto and void; Lynn v. State, 84 Md. 78, 35 Atl. 22, where it is held that a retrospective act for the benefit of the accused, lessening the penalty, is not ex post facto; In re Miller, 110 Mich. 677, 64 Am. St. Rep. 377, 68 N. W. 990, upholding a statute denying to convicts serving a second term any reduction in sentence for good behavior, though the first offense was prior to its enactment (see 64 Am. St. Rep. 379, note, on this point); Murphy and Glover Test Oath Cases, 41 Mo. 371, where Holmes, J., is of opinion that a retrospective test oath act is a bill of pains and penalties merging ex post facto elements.

Other citing cases have affirmed and relied upon the definition as follows: State v. Johnson, 12 Minn. 484, 93 Am. Dec. 247, where it is held that an act allowing evidence of an indirect character to prove marriage under an indictment for polygamy was ex post facto as applied to past offenses; State v. Thompson, 141 Mo. 417, 42 S. W. 951, which holds that a law regulating the evidence and mode of procedure in a criminal case and providing for a comparison of handwriting is not ex post facto as applied to crimes previously committed; State v. Ryan, 13 Minn. 375, where it is held that an act allowing seven peremptory challenges to the State upon the trial of offenses committed before its passage was not ex post facto; State v. McDonald, 20 Minn. 139, where it is held that an act adding an alternative punishment of fine and imprisonment for an offense previously punishable only by imprisonment, as to offenses previously committed, is ex post facto; Lindzey v. State, 65 Miss. 546, 7 Am. St. Rep. 677, 5 So. 100, holding ex post facto an act precluding a defense to a misdemeanor, and changing, without mitigating, the punishment; Moore v. State, 43 N. J. L. 217, where the definition of Chief Justice Marshall was criticised as not providing for the validity of a mitigation of punishment, and it was held that an act authorizing a trial and punishment of one against whose punishment limitation had previously run, was ex post facto, and the quoting case, State v. Moore, 42 N. J. L. 232, was overruled on that point, Van Syckel, J., dissenting, pp. 231, 235; Hartung v. People, 22 N. Y. 104, 109, where Chancellor Kent's approval of Chief Justice Marshall's definition is referred to and it is held that an act adding imprisonment at hard labor to the death penalty, as to persons previously convicted, was ex post facto; Shepherd v. People, 25 N. Y. 415, where Sutherland, J., says, in reference to the definition quoted: "Add to this 'or which increases the punishment with which the act was punishable when committed,' and I think the definition will be as complete and certain and safe as can well be made," but it was held that an act changing the punishment for arson in the first degree from death to imprisonment for life could not be said with certainty not to increase the punishment, and was ex post facto as applied to previous offenses; Green v. Shumway, 39 N. Y. 424, where a retrospective test oath law was held ex post facto; Holt v. State, 2 Tex. 364, where an act requiring the jury to assess the punishment to be inflicted was held not ex post facto as applied to prosecution pending; Murray v. State, 1 Tex. App. 428, where it was held that a change of Constitution taking away an alternative power of the jury to substitute imprisonment for life for the death penalty, secured by a previous Constitution, as applied to previous offenses, is ex post facto; and In re Wright, 3 Wyo. 483, 27 Pac. 567, where it is held that an act substituting trial by information instead of by indictment is not ex post facto as to previous offenses. See also valuable note in 37 Am. St. Rep. 584, 587.

In the following citing cases it is held that the doctrine of ex post facto laws applies to criminal cases only, and not retrospective laws affecting civil cases or vested rights: Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. 110, 8 L. 884; Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Nesbit, 10 How. 402, 13 L. 472; Carpenter v. Commonwealth, 17 How. 463, 15 L. 129; Society v. Wheeler, 2 Gall. 138, F. C. 13,156; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 390, 18 L. 374; Holmes v. Bank of Norfolk, 12 Ala. 417; Wilder v. Lumpkin, 4 Ga. 215; Martindale v. Moore, 3 Blackf. 277, 278; Baugher v. Constitutional law.— A provision of the Constitution, afterwards changed by amendment, considered in arguing as to a question of construction, p. 139.

In the citing case of Hoffman v. Harrington, 28 Mich. 109, it is said: "A constitutional provision may have a modified application in consequence of a construction based on its original connection with clauses erased by amendment." The citing case of Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 506, 25 S. E. 804, applies the cited case to a change in the language in a section of a new Constitution as compared with the same section in the other Constitution.

Indian lands.— The reservation of Indian lands did not alter the boundaries of the colony, and the State was seized in fee of such lands, notwithstanding the Indian title which was to be respected until extinguishment, pp. 142, 143.

In the citing cases of Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. 592, 5 L. 693; Cherokee Nation v. State, 5 Pet. 48, 8 L. 42; Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. 201, 10 L. 126; Leavenworth, etc., R. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 754, 23 L. 643, it is held that the Indian title was in its nature a mere right of occupancy, which was incapable of alienation. In the citing case of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. 57, 70, 8 L. 45, 50, Mr. Justice Thompson approves of the opinion of Mr. Justice Johnson in Fletcher v. Peck, pp. 146, 147, that the Indian nations have a right of soil, and says: "Whether they have a right of soil or a right of occupancy, they are entitled to protection according to Fletcher v. Peck." In the citing case of Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 108, 28 L. 648, 5 S. Ct. 48, the remarks of Mr. Justice Johnson in Fletcher v. Peck, 146, are quoted that certain tribes have totally extinguished their national fire and submitted themselves to the laws of the States, and it is held that an Indian who is a member of a tribe recognized by the government, though residing in a State, is not a citizen of the United States under the fourteenth amendment.

In the citing cases of Blecker v. Bond, 3 Wash. C. C. 542, F. C. 1,534, and Gilman v. Brown, 1 Mason, 212, F. C. 5,441, the doctrine of Fletcher v. Peck as to the nature of the Indian title and the power of the State to grant lands in fee was approved. In the citing case of Goodfellow v. Muckey, 1 McCrary, 244, F. C. 5,537, it is said: "It has been uniformly held by the Supreme Court that the Indian title was but a mere right of occupancy, the fee remaining in the United States," and it is held that the treaty with the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians did not amount to a grant in presenti to that tribe. In the citing case of Thompson v. Doaksum, 68 Cal. 595, 10 Pac. 200, it is held that congress has control over all Indian lands, and that lands in California in the occupancy of Indian tribes at the date of the treaty of Hidalgo because part of the public domains are subject to pre-emption. In the citing case of East Haven v. Hemingway, 7 Conn. 198, it is held that the Indians had no legal capacity to sell lands occupied by them, and the legislature could grant them or ratify the sale of them to a town. In the citing case of Doe v. Avaline, 8 Ind. 13, it is held that a legislative designation of Indians, as having one-eighth of Indian blood, applies to an act for the relief of the Miami Indians. In the citing case of Roberts v. M., K. & T. R. R. Co., 43 Kan. 108, 22 Pac. 1008, it is held that a grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections to the State included those occupied by Indians. In the citing case of Caldwell v. State, 1 Stew. & P. 347, it is held that the State had the right to extend its civil and criminal jurisdiction over any tract of Indian country within its limits, though the Indian title then is not extinguished. In the citing case of Gaines v. Hale, 26 Ark. 184, it was held that though the United States could convey in fee simple lands occupied by Indian tribes before the Indian title was extinguished, yet it was the policy of the government to protect such land, and that the right of pre-emption did not extend to such lands. In the citing case of Veale v. Maynes, 23 Kan. 28, it is held that the treaty of 1846 with the Pottawatomie Indians only recognized their possessory right, but that under the treaties of 1861 and 1867 conveyances were contemplated to adult male heads of families who left the tribe and became citizens and that a patent to a head of a family conveyed title as against an allotment to another member. In Breaux v. Johns, 4 La. Ann. 142, 143, 50 Am. Dec. 557, 558, it is held that Indian tribes in Louisiana to whom lands were allotted by the laws of Spain, were never invested with ownership, but the title was in the United States, who could grant the fee subject to the Indian right of occupancy. In the citing case of Montgomery v. Ives, 13 Sm. & M. 175, it is held that the Indian title not being extinguished in lands reserved under the proclamation of George II., a grant by the royal governor in 1772 had no validity. In the citing case of Utah Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 6 Utah, 196, 21 Pac. 1007, it is held that the government of the United States having succeeded to the title in fee simple of lands occupied by the Indians subject to their right of occupancy, the treaty-making power of the United States by treaty with the Chippewa Indians could confer upon the land department power to dispose of lands to heads of families without the consent or ratification of congress. In the citing case of Veeder v. Guppy, 3 Wis. 526, it is held that the possession of land by Indians did not affect the validity of the government grant, and that the right of Indians to occupancy was not involved in a suit between individuals claiming under the same grant of congress. In re Narragansett Indians, 40 Atl. 368, held a conveyance of lands by Indian sachem, reserving certain lands to himself and heirs forever, did not vest in him a fee in the part reserved.

Eminent domain.— Consists of the power to oblige a citizen to sell and convey, when the public necessities require it, p. 145, opinion of Johnson, J.

This proposition is quoted and applied in Chambers v. C. & G. R. R. Co., 69 Ga. 322; State v. Nemaha Co., 7 Kan. 574; Buller v. Sewer Commission, 39 N. J. L. 669; Russel v. Mayor, 2 Den. 472, and White v. Nashville, etc., R. R. Co., 7 Heisk. 539.

Feigned case should not be decided, p. 147, opinion of Johnson, J.

In the citing case of Smith v. Brown, 3 Tex. 372, 49 Am. Dec. 749, it is held that a fictitious case brought for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on the matters presented by it, is a contempt of court, and the court will not give an opinion on an abstract question of law, where a case is made up for that purpose. In Am. W. P. Co. v. Heft, 131 U. S. 93, Appx., the opinion of Johnson, J., is referred to as favoring the dismissal of an appeal where it appears that the suit was fictitious and collusive. Cited also in Ward v. Alsup, 100 Tenn. 739, 740, 46 S. W. 574, reviewing authorities upon this point at length, but dismissing appeal on other grounds.

Compromise by State and the United States of controversy as to vacant lands will not now be disturbed, p. 142.

Cited with reference to this statement in Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. 729, 9 L. 1262; Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 502, 15 L. 741; Seneca Nation v. Christie, 126 N. Y. 137, 27 N. E. 279, discussing various matters as to territory of United States; In re Narragansett Indians, 40 Atl. 368, as to Rhode Island settlement with Indians.

Miscellaneous citations.— Fletcher v. Peck is cited in Giddings v. San Antonio, 47 Tex. 556, 26 Am. Rep. 326, ascribing the constitutional requirement that the title of an act state its contents, to the frauds under the Yazoo act of Georgia of 1795, out of which Fletcher v. Peck arose; in Van Dolsen v. New York, 17 Fed. 818, 21 Blatchf. 456, as an instance of title traced to royal grant from the crown. Cited also in Montgomery v. Ives, 13 Smedes & M. 173, and In re Turner, 5 Ohio, 543, but not in point.

Equity Jurisdiction.— In questions of contract, trust and fraud, equity has jurisdiction wherever person is found, though its decree may affect lands without its jurisdiction, p. 158.

The number of citations sufficiently demonstrates the great influence and importance of this case. They cite and apply the doctrine as follows: Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 723, 24 L. 569, holding, however, that such exercise of jurisdiction does not interfere with control of property by State of situs; Ager v. Murray, 105 U. S. 131, 26 L. 943, subjecting patent right to payment of judgment against patentee; Hart v. Sansom, 110 U. S. 155, 28 L. 103, 3 S. Ct. 589, holding that decree removing cloud from title to land within State does not bar nonresident defendant, cited by publication, from suing in Circuit Court to recover land; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 117, 118, 33 L. 543, 10 S. Ct. 272, 273, holding that equity may enjoin citizens of one State from prosecuting suits in another; similarly in Cole v. Young, 24 Kan. 438; Hayden v. Yale, 45 La. Ann. 371, 40 Am. St. Rep. 240, 12 So. 637; Dehon v. Foster, 4 Allen, 551, and Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 450; in Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 106, 35 L. 647, 11 S. Ct. 966, holding, however, that such decree does not bind courts of State of land's situs; in dissenting opinion to Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. 79, 8 L. 53, denying injunction against enforcement of certain Georgia laws concerning Cherokee territory; Pierpont v. Fowle, 2 Wood. & M. 39, F. C. 11,152, upholding right of equity in proper case to settle dispute as to title to copyright; Briggs v. French, 1 Sumn. 504, F. C. 1,870, asserting equity jurisdiction over constructive trust though lands to be affected are without its jurisdiction; Northern Indiana R. R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. R. Co., 15 How. 243, 14 L. 679, holding, however, that such jurisdiction does not include local actions as to land; Picquet v. Swan, 5 Mason, 42, F. C. 11,134, distinguishing local actions from matters collateral and binding upon conscience; Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 416, F. C. 764, holding that at any stage of equity cause defendant may object that plaintiff has remedy at law; Leland v. The Ship Medora, 2 Wood. & M. 114, F. C. 8,237, holding that equity having jurisdiction for one purpose may act as to incidental legal matters; Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall. 121, 19 L. 607, holding that decree may be enforced by proper proceedings in situs rei, if valid; Clark v. Hammett, 27 Fed. 341, holding that decree against nonresident quieting title to lands within jurisdiction does not bar his subsequent action of ejectment; Remer v. McKay, 54 Fed. 434, where suit was to remove cloud cast upon title to Iowa land by void decree of Iowa court against Illinois defendant; Lynde v. Columbus, C. & I. Ry. Co., 57 Fed. 996, holding that equity decree foreclosing mortgage on railroad situate in two States, without execution, does not bar suit in another State between same parties to foreclose same mortgage; Municipal Ins. Co. v. Gardiner, 62 Fed. 956, holding that suit to enforce contract to convey land should be brought where one of the parties resides; Woodbury v. Allegheny & K. R. R. Co., 72 Fed. 374, 375, holding that courts of either State may foreclose mortgage of railroad situated in two States; Guild v. Guild, 16 Ala. 125, holding that court having jurisdiction of husband can decree, to nonresident wife, settlement out of her separate estate; Pillow v. King, 55 Ark. 639, 18 S. W. 765, upholding decree of Tennessee court compelling restoration of deed of Arkansas land, where court had jurisdiction of parties; Rourke v. McLaughlin, 38 Cal. 201, enforcing for nonresident plaintiff against resident defendant, contract to convey California lands; Le Breton v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 29, 4 Pac. 779, holding that action for settlement of trust in real and personal property need not be brought in county of situs of real property; Smith v. Davis, 90 Cal. 30, 25 Am. St. Rep. 94, 27 Pac. 27, appointing trustees to carry out trust deed of foreign lands; Winn v. Strickland, 34 Fla. 630, 16 So. 612, holding that such decrees may bind parties in other State as to matters properly determined; Adams v. Lamar, 8 Ga. 94, refusing partition of local lands against nonresident not consenting to court's jurisdiction; Engel v. Scheuerman, 40 Ga. 210; S. C., 2 Am. Rep. 574, restraining resident from collecting, in another State, judgment obtained therein; Kennedy v. Northup, 15 Ill. 153, affirming equity jurisdiction in cases of fraud; Alexander v. Tolleston Club, 110 Ill. 77, enjoining one resident in favor of another from interfering with right of way over lands in another State; Johnson v. Gibson, 116 Ill. 302, 6 N. E. 209, compelling conveyance of lands in foreign jurisdiction in case of fraud; Cloud v. Greasley, 125 Ill. 319, 17 N. E. 828, denying specific performance of contract as to foreign lands because of noncompliance with statute of frauds; Hayes v. O'Brien, 149 Ill. 410, 37 N. E. 74, decreeing specific performance of contract to convey land in another county; McGregor v. MacGregor, 9 Iowa, 78, 80, holding New York decree as to Iowa lands conclusive upon Iowa courts; Gilliland v. Inabnit, 92 Iowa, 50, 51, 60 N. W. 212, 213, holding that Kentucky court may enforce execution of trust in Iowa lands, though title is essential point; Frank v. Peyton, 82 Ky. 153, upholding jurisdiction of Kentucky court to enjoin conveyance of Illinois lands, and to enforce contract to convey; McQuerry v. Gilliland, 89 Ky. 440, 12 S. W. 1038, allowing action in Kentucky to enforce conveyance of lands in Iowa.

Elsewhere citing cases have affirmed and applied the principle as follows: Reed v. Reed, 75 Me. 269, holding that equity may pass upon deed and mortgage of foreign lands; Brown v. Chesapeake, etc., Canal Co., 73 Md. 607, upholding power of Maryland court to sell canal in entirety though partly located outside jurisdiction; Binney's Case, 2 Bland Ch. 145, discussing right of Maryland court to control expenditures of resident corporation in other States where it held property; Brown v. Desmond, 100 Mass. 269, issuing process to enforce Rhode Island decree of specific performance of contract to convey Massachusetts lands; Carver v. Peck, 131 Mass. 292, denying equity's jurisdiction to enforce payment of debt out of property not reachable by execution, where law judgment was not had; Jenkins v. Lester, 131 Mass. 357, refusing, as against resident trustee, enforcement of trust created by decree of foreign court having jurisdiction thereof; Graydon v. Y. 450, ordering cancellation of Ohio mortgage given to secure New York contract void for usury; in dissenting opinion to Picket v. Johns, 1 Dev. Eq. 135, which held South Carolina decree declaring conveyance of North Carolina lands void, a nullity; Burnley v. Stevenson, 24 Ohio St. 478, 15 Am. Rep. 625, holding Kentucky decree ordering conveyance of Ohio lands, though unexecuted, conclusive upon parties and privies; Johnston v. Wadsworth, 24 Or. 498, 34 Pac. 14, enforcing contract to purchase lands in another county; Robertson v. Auld, 6 Yerg. 410, holding suit by locator for locative interest not necessarily local, may be personal; Pickett v. Ferguson, 86 Tenn. 650, 651, 652, 8 S. W. 388, 389, passing without decision, question as to court's jurisdiction to enforce constructive trust in foreign lands; King v. Pillow, 90 Tenn. 288, 16 S. W. 469, compelling restoration of fraudulently destroyed deed of Arkansas lands; Mosby v. Gisborn, 54 Pac. 127, allowing action to set aside judgment in the county where rendered, though lands elsewhere affected; Dickinson v. Hoomes, 8 Gratt. 411, 413, compelling Virginia heirs to pay ancestor's debts out of lands descended to them in Kentucky; Virginia v. Levy, 23 Gratt. 35, holding conclusive upon Virginia courts, decree of New York court holding charitable devise of Virginia lands by New York resident void; Barger v. Buckland, 28 Gratt. 863, sustaining power of Circuit Court to direct sale of land lying partly in Virginia and partly in West Virginia; Davis v. Morris's Exrs., 76 Va. 30, holding Virginia trustee's estate liable for breach of trust in Mississippi lands, beneficiaries being Virginia residents; Poindexter v. Burwell, 82 Va. 513, approving Virginia process, directing resident trustee to satisfy personally binding contract out of individual interest in trust lands in Texas; State v. Superior Court, 7 Wash. 307, 34 Pac. 1103, holding action to enforce trust and have accounting thereunder transitory; Leach v. Buckner, 19 W. Va. 45, correcting decree of settlement between Ohio court and domiciliary administrator, vitiated by fraud, same person being ancillary administrator in West Virginia; Chapman v. Railroad Co., 26 W. Va. 309, where, Pennsylvania court having directed sale of all title held in West Virginia lands under mortgage, West Virginia court upheld its right to determine what such title was. Distinguished in Jones v. Fletcher, 42 Ark. 446, 447, where Arkansas statute gave equity judgment as to foreign lands, effect of judgment in rem; Blackman v. Wright, 96 Iowa, 551, 65 N. W. 846, holding New York decree ordering conveyance of lands in Iowa not binding upon prior grantees of parties; Mussina v. Alling, 11 La. Ann. 572, refusing to direct conveyance of Texas lands in case of fraud; Worthington v. Lee, 61 Md. 542, holding that Maryland courts cannot decree performance of covenants of renewal as to parties outside jurisdiction, though lands are within it; Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Gay, 86 Tex. 589, 26 S. W. 605, holding Circuit Court of Louisiana could not appoint receiver of Texas property, and confer upon him power to take possession and administer.

Boundaries of entry.— If by any reasonable construction of an entry it can be supported, the courts will support it, p. 165.

Cited in Green v. Neal, 6 Pet. 296, 8 L. 404, holding decisions of State courts upon similar local statutes binding upon Federal courts; McArthur v. Nevill, 3 Ohio, 186, holding that entry should be construed, if possible, according to the intentions of the locator.

Boundaries of entry.— In construing entry, the rectangular form should be preserved in absence of controlling calls directing otherwise, p. 167.

Cited and applied in Doe v. Porter, 3 Ark. 57, 36 Am. Dec. 451, construing boundaries in deed, quantity yielding to distance which yields to objects; White v. Gay, 9 N. H. 131, 31 Am. Dec. 226, holding that of inconsistent boundaries retain those best comporting with prevailing design; Buckley v. Gilmore, 12 Ohio, 78, sustaining ambiguous entry by retaining most important boundaries; Ferguson v. Bloom, 144 Pa. St. 565, 23 Atl. 52, construing location as rectangle by presumptions as to boundaries; Hull v. Fuller, 7 Vt. 105, holding that redundancy of description should not overcome intentions of parties; Smith v. Chapman, 10 Gratt. 474, holding that more material and certain calls should control in case of conflict; McNeel v. Herold, 11 Gratt. 315, discussing disputed boundaries of claims whose calls intersect.

Criticised in Corlies v. Little, 14 N. J. L. 378, as to its holding, in interpreting boundaries in deed.

Trusts —Agency.— Where agent acting for principal surveys land and takes patent in his own name, he becomes trustee for principal, p. 170.

Cited and doctrine applied in Skerrett v. Presbyterian Society, 41 Ohio St. 630, holding that such trust attaches to lands in hands of agent's grantee; Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 341, 78 Am. Dec. 202, holding broker's clerk trustee where he purchased under knowledge obtained in his employment; Columbus Co. v. Hurford, 1 Neb. 160, applying rule to agent acting for principal and purchasing in his own name; Rose v. Hayden, 35 Kan. 109, 57 Am. Rep. 147, 10 Pac. 556, applying rule where agent to purchase land bought and took title in his own name; Irvine v. Marshall, 20 How. 565, 15 L. 998, discussing jurisdiction of United States courts to enforce such trusts; Felix v. Patrick, 145 U. S. 327, 36 L. 724, 12 S. Ct. 865, holding as trustee for Indian one who illegally located land taken by fraud from latter; Chaffin v. Hull, 49 Fed. 528, applying rule where agent bought outstanding claim against principal's land which latter wished to contest if he could not acquire by purchase.

Miscellaneous.— Cited also in United States v. Wonson, 1 Gall. 18, F. C. 16,750, as sustaining right of Circuit Court to proceed as appellate court without retrial of cause by jury.

Jurisdiction.— Suit in chancery to try title to land must be tried in district in which land lies, p. 158.

Public lands.— When a given quantity of land is to be laid off on a given base, it shall be included within four lines forming a square, as nearly as may be, unless the form be repugnant to the entry, p. 165.

Public lands.— If a location have certain material calls sufficient to support it, and to describe the land, other calls less material and incompatible with the essential calls of entry may be discarded, p. 165.

Dec. 349, affirming that infant wishing to disaffirm horse-trade must offer to return horse received before he can sue for one traded; Campbell v. Stakes, 2 Wend. 144, 19 Am. Dec. 563; Freeman v. Boland, 14 R. I. 39, 51 Am. Rep. 341, holding infant liable in trover who hires horse to drive to one place and drives elsewhere or beyond; Towne v. Wiley, 23 Vt. 361; 56 Am. Dec. 87; Peigne v. Sutcliffe, 4 McC. 390, 17 Am. Dec. 758, holding infant of age of discretion liable on case for embezzlement of goods intrusted to him; Green v. Sperry, 16 Vt. 393, 42 Am. Dec. 520, holding infant liable in trover where he borrowed one's watch from latter's wife; Cotton v. Sharpstein, 14 Wis. 230, 80 Am. Dec. 777, holding attorney liable for converting property of client placed in his charge and to execution against his body; notes to Humphrey v. Douglass, 33 Am. Dec. 179, 181, 182, 184, and Craig v. Van Bebber, 18 Am. St. Rep. 723.

Distinguished in Wilt v. Walsh, 6 Watts, 12, holding that where substance of action is contract, recovery cannot be had in tort, as where infant hires horse to drive to one place, drives beyond and horse dies in consequence; West v. Moore, 14 Vt. 447, 39 Am. Dec. 236, holding infant not liable for false and deceitful warranty on sale of horse; Eaton v. Hill, 50 N. H. 239, 9 Am. Rep. 192, excusing infant from liability where, from lack of discretion, he unintentionally over-drove hired horse; Campbell v. Stakes, 2 Wend. 144, 19 Am. Dec. 563.

Appeal and error.— Bill of exceptions ought to state that evidence was offered of facts upon which opinion of court was prayed, p. 232.

Cited in United States v. Morgan, 11 How. 158, 13 L. 645, holding that though bill is imperfect, if court can ascertain, by inference, substance of facts it will give opinion on points presented; Insurance Co. v. Baring, 20 Wall. 162, 22 L. 251, holding that court need not grant prayer for instructions not supported by evidence; United States v. Three Hundred and Thirty-seven Cases of Wine, 1 Woods, 50, F. C. 16,506, refusing to reverse judgment for failure to instruct where bill of exceptions did not conform to cited principle; Peden v. Moore, 1 Stew. & P. 81, 21 Am. Dec. 656, holding, however, that upon objection to instructions given, court may review them as to legal correctness; Proctor v. Hart, 5 Fla. 469, holding that unless bill shows evidence upon which instructions were intended, court will not adjudge them erroneous; Law v. Merrills, 6 Wend. 274; Dunlop v. Patterson, 5 Cow. 246, holding error not to lie for failure to instruct upon evidence not brought to court's notice; Stafford v. Walker, 12 S. & R. 197, refusing reversal for immaterial error.

Infancy is bar to action by owner against his supercargo for breach of instructions, p. 230.

6 Cr. 233–237, 3 L. 209, CURTISS v. GEORGETOWN, ETC., TURNPIKE CO.

Federal courts.— The Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review an order of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, quashing an inquisition, p. 235.

Cited in dissenting opinion to Kendall v. United States, 12 Pet. 640, 9 L. 1227, favoring reversal of Circuit Court's judgments for unauthorized issuance of mandamus; Kendall v. United States, 12 Pet. 619, 9 L. 1218, sustaining power of Circuit Court for District of Columbia to mandamus public officer; Railroad Co. v. Church, 19 Wall. 64, 22 L. 97, holding that writ of error lies from Supreme Court to Circuit Court for District of Columbia; Ormsby v. Webb, 134 U. S. 60, 33 L. 811, 10 S. Ct. 483, in case of order of Circuit Court affirming order of Probate Court in admitting writing as will.

Eminent domain.— Record by clerk of an inquisition is merely ministerial act and of itself gives no validity to proceedings, p. 237.

Cited in Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 593, 42 L. 289, 17 S. Ct. 983, holding that estimate of compensation under eminent domain proceedings is not required to be made by jury.

6 Cr. 237, 238, 3 L. 210, LODGE'S LESSEE v. LEE.

Boundaries.— Grant of an island by name in Potomac river, adding courses and distances which do not include whole island, passes whole island, p. 238.

Cited and principle relied upon in United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 739, 8 L. 565, construing Spanish grant of lands in Florida; Sherwood v. Whiting, 54 Conn. 334, 1 Am. St. Rep. 119, 8 Atl. 82, holding that misdescription in deed does not affect it, so long as property conveyed may be identified; Melvin v. Merrimack Locks & Canals, 5 Met. 29, 38 Am. Dec. 388, where conveyance of "estate called C. Farm," same as conveyed by M. to K., was held to pass entire farm, though conveyance mentioned did not; Slater v. Breese, 36 Mich. 82, holding additions of untrue circumstances will not defeat otherwise satisfactory description; Rutherford v. Tracy, 48 Mo. 328, 8 Am. Rep. 106, where conveyance of certain lot described by courses and distances, including less than whole lot, was held to pass entire lot; and similarly in Thomson v. Thomson, 115 Mo. 64, where devise was of "land on which I now reside," with added courses and distances, including less than whole tract; in Ela v. Card, 2 N. H. 178, 9 Am. Dec. 49, under similar facts to same effect; Drew v. Drew, 28 N. H. 503, 512, holding that devise of homestead, all "upon which I now live, same devised to me by my father," passes whole homestead, though part was not so devised; Conover v. Wardell, 22 N. J. Eq. 502, holding that general terms of description, preceded by metes and bounds, are subordinate thereto; Jones v. Smith, 73 N. Y. 210, holding that less certain general description is controlled by more certain particular description following; Trapier v. Wilson, 2 McC. 197, where grant under facts similar to those in principal case was held to pass entire island.

Distinguished in Belden v. Seymour, 8 Conn. 31, where measurements were held to give way to boundaries; in dissenting opinion to Buchanan v. Stewart, 3 Harr. & J. 338, which held that quantity as described should prevail over courses and distances; Woodman v. Lane, 7 N. H. 247, allowing grant of homestead farm to be restricted and restrained by subsequent particular description.

6 Cr. 238–252, 3 L. 211, FINLEY v. LYNN.

Equity — Reformation of bond.— If bond executed in pursuance of agreement depart therefrom, equity will relieve, p. 249.

Cited in Ivinson v. Hutton, 98 U. S. 83, 25 L. 68, ordering correction of papers effecting dissolution of partnership, because founded on mistake; Hearn v. Equitable Safety Ins. Co., 4 Cliff. 198, F. C. 6,300, reforming insurance policy to conform to original agreement of parties.

Partnership.— Agreement of partners may make debt of individual partner firm debt, pp. 251, 252.

Citèd in Davis v. Dodge, 30 Mich. 270, enforcing similar agreement where dealings were between each firm and partners of other firm.

Appeal.— Court will remand cause to have account taken which complainant is entitled to, but did not ask for, p. 252.

Principle applied in May v. Le Claire, 11 Wall. 227, 20 L. 52, allowing review where record is defective, but shows merits of case; Dupont de Nemours v. Vance, 19 How. 173, 15 L. 588, allowing relief which record, though defective, shows to be proper; Alton v. Gilmanton, 2 N. H. 521, refusing client relief against waiver of notice by his attorney where agreement of waiver was part of court record.

6 Cr. 252, 253, 3 L. 215, DE BUTTS v. BACON.

Usury.— Defense of, allowed in suit to foreclose mortgage, p. 253.

Cited in dissenting opinion to Palmer v. Mead, 7 Conn. 159, maintaining that defense that mortgage was in fraud of creditors should be available on foreclosure, and that defense of title should be similarly available; Cowles v. Woodruff, 8 Conn. 36, to point decided in principal case; Phelps v. Pierson, 1 G. Greene, 127, holding that demurrer will lie to bill to enforce contract usurious on its face. Cited in Spaun v. Baltzell, 1 Fla. 355; S. C., 46 Am. Dec. 356; holding that if creditor offers additional security for less sum than is due, consideration is good.

Disapproved, Palmer v. Mead, 7 Conn. 153, holding that on bill to foreclose, mortgagee's title may not be investigated.

6 Cr. 253–267, 3 L. 215, SHEEHY v. MANDEVILLE AND JAMESSON.

Payment.— Note of debtor or third person may, by agreement, be received, and operate as payment of debt, p. 264.

This is a leading case upon the foregoing proposition and the citing cases show the following various applications: Segrist v. Crabtree, 131 U. S. 289, 33 L. 126, 9 S. Ct. 688, holding, however, that evidence that notes were taken absolutely as payment must be given; Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 347, 33 L. 176, 9 S. Ct. 779, holding that in suit upon note plea of wager consideration is good; In re Morrill, 2 Sawy. 358, F. C. 9,821, holding that surety may pay debt for which he is contingently liable by giving his note, if it is so accepted; Palmer v. Priest, 1 Sprague, 514, F. C. 10,694, holding note of one debtor received by creditor who receipts account, prima facie payment thereof; United States v. Williams, 1 Ware, 180, F. C. 16,724, refusing to apply principle to check received by collector of customs in payment of duty, until check is paid; Harris v. Lindsay, 4 Wash. 274, F. C. 6,124, holding that giving of note raises no presumption of payment; Slocumb v. Lurty, Hemp. 433, F. C. 12,949, requiring draft of third person to be received unconditionally as payment, to discharge debt; Wallace v. Agry, 4 Mason, 343, F. C. 12,360, holding that taking bill of exchange is at most only prima facie evidence of payment; The Betsey and Rhoda, 2 Ware, 115, F. C. 1,366, throwing upon debtor burden of proof that note was intended as payment; In re Parker, 6 Sawy. 250, 11 Fed. 399, Estate of Davis v. Desanque, 5 Whart. 537, 34 Am. Dec. 576, Lee's Admrs. v. Fontaine, 10 Ala. 766, 44 Am. Dec. 508, allowing action against original debtor after judgment upon invalid note received as payment; Pope v. Tunstall, 2 Ark. 226, holding that agreement to receive note as payment destroys right of action on original contract; Costar v. Davies, 8 Ark. 217, 46 Am. Dec. 312, holding action on account barred, though note received in payment is unpaid; Brugman v. McGuire, 32 Ark. 740, requiring special agreement to constitute note payment; First National Bank v. Newton, 10 Colo. 171, 172, 14 Pac. 432, 433, holding presumption that note was not received as payment not rebutted by receipt in full; Bill v. Porter, 9 Conn. 30, requiring special agreement to prove receipt as payment; May v. Gamble, 14 Fla. 493; Salomon v. Pioneer Co-op. Co., 21 Fla. 379, as to correctness of pleading as to note received as payment; Wylly v. Collins, 9 Ga. 240, requiring that note be specially accepted as payment; Jewett v. Pleak, 43 Ind. 370, holding note of third person good as payment, if parties so agree; Sneed v. Wiester, 2 A. K. Marsh. 286; Johnson v. Weed, 9 Johns. 311, 6 Am. Dec. 279; Tomlin v. McChord's Admr., 6 J. J. Marsh. 4, holding that one covenant may be annihilated by later covenant variant therefrom and in satisfaction thereof; Steamboat Charlotte v. Hammond, 9 Mo. 63, 43 Am. Dec. 539, requiring special agreement to extinguish original cause of action; Wright v. First Crockeryware Co., 1 N. H. 281, 8 Am. Dec. 69, allowing such agreement that effect, whether note is of principal debtor or third person; Page v. Pendergast, 2 N. H. 235, holding note payment of award, agreement being shown; Elliott v. Sleeper, 2 N. H. 527, where new note given for note secured by mortgage was held not to discharge mortgage.

Other citing cases make the following applications: Morris Canal v. Van Vorst, 21 N. J. L. 119, 126, requiring that to make note effective as payment, agreement must be pleaded and proved; Arnold v. Camp, 12 Johns. 411, 7 Am. Dec. 329, where individual note of partner was taken in exchange for partnership note and held to constitute payment thereof; Day v. Leal, 14 Johns. 405, holding that unsatisfied judgment on collateral security is no bar to suit on original debt; Boyd v. Hitchcock, 20 Johns. 79, 11 Am. Dec.

248, holding that agreement may make note satisfaction of debt greater than note's face value; Muldon v. Whitlock, 1 Cow. 306, 307, 13 Am. Dec. 537, holding original debtor still liable unless he prove agreement to take note of another as payment; Booth v. Smith, 3 Wend. 68, affirming that proof of such agreement bars action on debtor's note for which another's note was substituted; Waydell v. Luer, 5 Hill, 450, refusing to allow creditor, by agreement, to make note of joint debtor satisfy precedent liability of all; S. C., 3 Den. 414, 419, 420, allowing such effect to note given by partner after dissolution of partnership, and accepted as payment of partnership debt; Brown v. Scott, 51 Pa. St. 363, holding that whether note effects payment is one of intention and for the jury; Blair v. Wilson, 28 Gratt. 174; Townsends v. Stevenson, 4 Rich. L. 67, holding that note of individual partner may merge and extinguish claim against partnership; Lepham v. Barnes, 2 Vt. 216, holding that third person giving note, effectual as payment of debt, may sue debtor for money paid to his use; Hutchins v. Olcutt, 4 Vt. 555, 24 Am. Dec. 639, holding that one taking note as payment for labor bestowed upon article loses his lien thereon; Edgell v. Stanford, 6 Vt. 556, holding that usurious and void note taken in exchange for valid note does not, upon being declared void, render suit on original debt impossible; Torrey v. Baxter, 13 Vt. 457, holding, however, that note will not amount to payment even with agreement, if it prove unproductive; Hard v. Burton, 62 Vt. 322, 20 Atl. 272, holding that unperformed agreement of one joint debtor to settle account does not release other debtor, where agreement was to accept performance; Poole v. Rice, 9 W. Va. 77, refusing to allow agreement effect where secured by fraud; Feamster v. Withrow, 9 W. Va. 326, holding that taking new security from one joint debtor will only release others where creditor so agrees; Bowyer v. Knapp, 15 W. Va. 296, and Bantz v. Basnett, 12 W. Va. 792, 836, where, part of debt being paid before due, new note executed for residue, and old note surrendered, latter was held extinguished as basis for action; Hoeflinger v. Wells, 47 Wis. 631, 632, 3 N. W. 591, 592, holding that partner's note will not extinguish partnership debt in absence of agreement, where such note was taken for loan at time of loan. Cited also in dissenting opinion, Winship v. United States Bank, 5 Pet. 568, 8 L. 230.

Distinguished in Whitbeck v. Van Ness, 11 Johns. 413, 414, 6 Am. Dec. 385, holding that note of third person taken by vendor from purchaser is presumed payment and taken at vendor's risk; Tyson v. Pollock, 1 P. & W. 381, holding that two firms jointly liable cannot, by each giving draft upon third person, merge joint liability into several; McIntyre v. Kennedy, 29 Pa. St. 452, upholding presumption that check of third person taken from debtor is received as conditional payment; Ward v. Motter, 2 Rob. (Va.) 564, 566, holding that one taking specialty of partner loses remedy against later discovered dormant partner; United States Bank v. Daniel, 12 Pet. 57, 9 L. 999, under the facts.

Joint liability.—Judgment against one joint debtor sued severally is not bar as to another in action against both founded on original joint promise, p. 265.

Cited and relied upon in dissenting from holding of United States v. Price, 9 How. 98, 13 L. 62, that after recovery against all obligors jointly on joint and several bonds and subsequent decease of surety, his assets may not be reached in hands of his administrator; United States v. Cushman, 2 Sumn. 438, F. C. 14,908, applying the rule in holding that after joint judgment on joint and several bond against obligors and sureties, there may be recovery out of assets of deceased surety, surviving obligors being insolvent; United States v. Cushman's Admr., 2 Sumn. 313, F. C. 14,907, where question was not raised, suit being at law against administrator of joint judgment debtor; Murray v. Lovejoy, 2 Cliff. 199, F. C. 9,963, holding unsatisfied judgment against one of several tortfeasors no bar to action against others; Sheldon v. Kibbe, 3 Conn. 218, 220, 8 Am. Dec. 179, 181, holding similarly as to cotrespassers; Swett v. Black, 1 Sprague, 583, F. C. 13,690, where the doctrine is approved and followed; Sheldon v. Kibbe, 3 Conn. 222, 8 Am. Dec. 183, holding execution against body of judgment debtor not satisfaction of judgment to bar action against his cotrespassers; Morgan v. Chester, 4 Conn. 389, holding unsatisfied judgment against joint debtor not to bar action against others, obligation being joint and several; Griffin v. Orman, 9 Fla. 52, holding judgment against two of firm not judgment against third member not named in pleading; Kirkpatrick v. Stingley, 2 Ind. 273, holding that on joint and several obligation, judgment against all does not bar subsequent action against one, and vice versa; Sherman v. Christy, 17 Iowa, 326, holding that confession of judgment against firm by one member upon note signed by firm name, but upon which other partner is alone liable, does not bar action against latter; Sayre v. Coleman, 9 Dana, 174, holding judgment against several co-obligors not bar to action against one as to whom former action was abated upon return of not found; Dennett v. Chick, 2 Me. 193, 11 Am. Dec. 61, holding unsatisfied judgment in another State against one joint promisor no bar to suit against other; Farmer v. Stewart, 2 N. H. 99, to point that in actions against joint debtors, judgment binds only those notified; Townsend v. Riddle, 2 N. H. 450, where judgment in favor of one joint and several promisor held no bar to action against another unless founded upon satisfaction or discharge of contract; Collins v. Lemasters, 1 Bailey L. 352, 21 Am. Dec. 473, holding that in action on joint bond, unsatisfied judgment against one codefendant is no bar as to other; Treasurers v. Bates, 2 Bailey L. 382, applying rule where unsatisfied judgment against sheriff was set up in bar of action against sheriff and sureties for same default; Watson v.

Owens, 1 Rich. L. 113, to point of principal case; Union Bank v. Hodges, 11 Rich. L. 483, 484, holding judgment against two partners no bar to suit against all; Nichols v. Cheairs, 4 Sneed, 232, holding unsatisfied judgment against one partner on note given for partnership obligation no bar to suit against other and dormant partner; in dissenting opinion to Ward v. Motter, 2 Rob. (Va.) 554, 559, wherein holding of principal case is interpreted; Oleson v. Merrihew, 45 Wis. 401, in support of holding that former judgment is bar only when parties are same.

Distinguished in Van Ness v. Forrest, 8 Cr. 35, 3 L. 479, allowing one member of commercial company to sue another in his own name on note given him by that other for use of company, though money, when recovered, would belong to company, and noticing principal case as to proper pleadings; Woodworth v. Spafford, 2 McLean, 173, F. C. 18,020, holding that judgment against one joint obligation bars suit against other co-obligors; United States v. Price, 9 How. 93, 13 L. 60, holding joint judgment conclusive and bar to several suits on joint and several bond; Scott v. Colmesnil, 7 J. J. Marsh. 419, 420, and cited as supporting holding that judgment against one upon contract apparently sole does not bar subsequent suit thereon in its true character of joint contract; Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 151, 152, holding that judgment against one on joint promise bars subsequent action thereon against both; Trafton v. United States, 3 Story, 649, 650, 651, F. C. 14,135, holding judgment against one of two joint contractors bars suit against both; Lawrence v. Vernon, 3 Sumn. 25, F. C. 8,146, but cited to point that where claim and parties are same, former judgment is bar though forms of action are different; Fairchild v. Holly, 10 Conn. 479, as questioned authority not involved in case at bar; Palmer v. Gallup, 16 Conn. 566, where it is refused adherence and question is raised whether judgment against three co-obligors, valid only as to one, bars action against other two; Bedell's Admrs. and Heirs v. Keethley, 5 T. B. Mon. 601, holding that judgment against administrators upon joint obligation of them and heirs, though unsatisfied, bars suit against latter; in dissenting opinion to Union Bank v. Hodges, 11 Rich. L. 726, 731, 732, 735, 736, 737; and considered unsound in notes to Speed's Exrs. v. Hann, 15 Am. Dec. 82, and Collins v. Lemasters, 21 Am. Dec. 475.

Denied in Mason v. Eldred, 6 Wall. 236, 237, 238, 18 L. 784, 785, holding that judgment against one person on joint contract merges it and bars further action thereon; similarly, in Sedam v. Williams, 4 McLean, 52, F. C. 12,609, where obligation was of partnership; United States v. Ames, 24 Fed. Cas. 783, where action was held barred, though against dormant partner not discovered until after judgment; Ferrall v. Bradford, 2 Fla. 515, 516, 50 Am. Dec. 296, 298, though former judgment was unsatisfied; Wann v. McNulty, 2 Gilm. 359, 43 Am. Dec. 60, where obligation was of partnership;

Taylor v. Claypool, 5 Blackf. 558, obligation being joint note; Crosby v. Jeroloman, 37 Ind. 274, where obligation was mortgage; Robertson v. Smith, 18 Johns. 482, 483, 484, 9 Am. Dec. 232, 233, 234, 235, where former judgment was unsatisfied; Pierce v. Kearney, 5 Hill, 94; Sloo v. Lea, 18 Ohio, 306, where obligation was of partnership; Smith v. Black, 9 S. & R. 143, 144, 11 Am. Dec. 687, 688, where action barred was against dormant partner discovered after former judgment; Anderson v. Levan, 1 W. & S. 339; Stearns v. Aguirre, 6 Cal. 180, holding one's election of remedies conclusive upon him when, holding joint and several obligation, he sues either jointly or severally; Brown's Admr. v. Johnson, 13 Gratt. 650, holding that defeat of remedy against one joint obligor on ground not personal to him bars recovery against all; How v. Kane, 2 Pinn. 551, 54 Am. Dec. 158, holding that while one who gets judgment against ostensible partner cannot thereafter get personal judgment against dormant partner, he may make him discover partnership assets in his possession.

Appellate practice.— Supreme Court will not, upon remanding cause, direct amendments in court below, amendments being discretionary with latter court, p. 267.

Cited and relied on in Chapman v. Barney, 129 U. S. 681, 32 L. 801, 9 S. Ct. 427, refusing to review amendment allowed by lower court substituting new party plaintiff; State v. Raiford, 2 Dev. 215, refusing to direct amendment in lower court; Fowler v. Colton, 1 Pinn. 337, refusing to review discretion of lower court.

Federal courts.— After cause sent back by mandate to Circuit Court, it is too late to question that court's jurisdiction, p. 268.

Rule affirmed and applied by the following citing cases: McCormick v. Sullivant, 10 Wheat. 199, 6 L. 302, holding that decrees of inferior United States courts in proceedings of which jurisdiction is not alleged, are erroneous, not void; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. 206, 7 L. 654, and McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 22, 25, 11 L. 164, 165, holding that such decrees may be reversed by proper authority; in the following: Bank of United States v. Moss, 6 How. 39, 40, 12 L. 335; Kennedy v. Georgia State Bank, 8 How. 611, 12 L. 1219; Des Moines Navigation Co. v. Iowa Homestead Co., 123 U. S. 557, 31 L. 204, 8 S. Ct. 219, to same effect, though want of jurisdiction is apparent on face of proceedings; in Dowell v. Applegate, 152 U. S. 338, 38 L. 467, 14 S. Ct. 615, holding such decrees not liable to collateral attack; Evers v. Watson, 156 U. S. 533, 39 L. 522, 15 S. Ct. 432, and Brown v. Noyes, 2 Wood. & M. 89, F. C. 2,023, holding that such decrees cannot be vacated on motion by same court; In re Eaton, 51 Fed. 804, applying holding to order of injunction in Circuit Court; Ex parte Lennon, 64 Fed. 322, 22 U. S. App. 561, doubting if judgment of Circuit Court under such circumstances may be collaterally attacked; Dexter v. Sayward, 84 Fed. 302, 304, supporting negative of last proposition, as to decree of Circuit Court of Appeals; Pearce v. Winter Iron Works, 32 Ala. 72, where decree was of District Court and lacked jurisdiction owing to residence of parties; Binney v. Chesapeake, etc., Canal Co., 8 Pet. 219, 8 L. 923, affirming it to be duty of Supreme Court to affirm judgments of Circuit Court which in point of law should be affirmed; Ex parte Story, 12 Pet. 343, 9 L. 1110, sustaining refusal of District Court to receive supplemental pleadings after mandate and decree by Supreme Court; Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. 425, 11 L. 664, holding that upon second appeal it cannot be urged that Supreme Court had no jurisdiction of first appeal upon which case was tried on merits and mandate issued to Circuit Court; Bank of United States v. Moss, 6 How. 39, 40, 12 L. 335, holding that judgments of Supreme Court cannot be changed at subsequent term in matters of law; Noonan v. Bradley, 12 Wall. 129, 20 L. 281, and Cook v. Burnley, 11 Wall. 674, 20 L. 85, refusing writ of error to review action of lower court in carrying out mandate of Supreme Court; Tyler v. Maguire, 17 Wall. 283, 21 L. 583, affirming that lower court must carry out mandate of Supreme Court and may not question jurisdiction thereof where decision was on merits; Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 255, 26 L. 137, and Insurance Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 143, 24 L. 403, holding that after expiration of term of rendition of judgment court below cannot supply special findings of fact, execution having issued on judgment; Gaines v. Rugg, 148 U. S. 241, 37 L. 436, 13 S. Ct. 616, issuing mandamus to inferior court to execute mandate of Supreme Court without proceedings to construe its meaning and intent; Aspen Mining, etc., Co. v. Mon. 544, holding that insurers having accepted abandonment, become liable for total loss; Mellon v. Bucks, 5 Mart. (La.) (N. S.) 375, holding that, after abandonment, insured cannot sue owners of vessel for failure to deliver abandoned property; Northwestern Transportation Co. v. Thames & Mersey Ins. Co., 59 Mich. 229, 26 N. W. 341, where sufficiency of written notice under policy is passed upon, and it is held that insured cannot exercise rights antagonistic to those conveyed after acceptance of abandonment; Radcliff v. Coster, 1 Hoff. Ch. 108, where right of indemnity under French treaty is held to vest in insurers upon abandonment and payment; Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Duffield, 6 Ohio St. 205, 67 Am. Dec. 341, holding abandonment to transfer only interest covered by policy.

Distinguished in Clark v. Wilson, 103 Mass. 227, 4 Am. Rep. 538, holding that even when abandonment is followed by payment of total loss, action may be brought in insured's name for conversion of property before abandonment.

Insurance.— Revocation of abandonment may result from subsequent acts of ownership of insured, p. 272.

Cited in Gloucester Ins. Co. v. Younger, 2 Curt. 337, F. C. 5,487, holding that acceptance of abandonment may be implied from acts of insurer; Catlett v. Pacific Ins. Co., 1 Wend. 574, to direct point, though holding that when such acts were performed by insured as agent of insurer, revocation is not effected.

Distinguished in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 4 Pet. 144, 7 L. 810, holding that in some cases such acts may not amount to revocation.

Insurance.— Abandonment must be within reasonable time, which is question for jury under directions of court, p. 273.

Cited in Norton v. Lexington Fire, etc., Ins. Co., 16 Ill. 254, holding that right to abandon when lost by delay is not revived by delay of insurers in paying or repairing; Haskins v. Hamilton Mut. Distinguished, Society for Propagation of Gospel v. New Haven, 8 Wheat. 492, 5 L. 669, holding that property of British corporations in this country was protected by treaty of 1783, and title confirmed by that of 1794, and could not be forfeited by intermediate legislation.

6 Cr. 307–324, 3 L. 232, DUROUSSEAU v. UNITED STATES.

Appellate jurisdiction of Supreme Court is given by Constitution and limited by congress in judiciary act, affirmative description in which implies negation of cases not enumerated, p. 314.

This holding of the principal case is affirmed and applied in the following citing cases: Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 203, 204, 205, 8 L. 97, 98, holding that such act expressly confers superintendence of inferior courts upon Supreme Court, which may mandamus Circuit Court to sign bill of exceptions in case before it; also in dissenting opinion, p. 219, 8 L. 103; In re Kaine, 14 How. 120, 14 L. 352, refusing to grant habeas corpus to inquire into commitment of prisoner by commissioner under treaty of 1842 between Great Britain and United States; Ex parte Vallandingham, 1 Wall. 251, 17 L. 593, refusing to review by certiorari proceedings of military commission of United States army; Daniels v. Railroad Co., 3 Wall. 254, 18 L. 225, refusing to review questions of mixed law and fact certified to it upon disagreement of circuit judges by consent of parties; United States v. Circuit Judge, 3 Wall. 678, 18 L. 114, in dissenting opinion, case holding that appeal lay from decree in Circuit Court in proceeding settling land claims in California and transferred to it from District Court; in dissenting opinion to Ex parte Bradley, 7 Wall. 384, 19 L. 221, holding that mandamus would issue from Circuit Court to Supreme Court of District of Columbia to restore attorney disbarred without jurisdiction; Merrill v. Petty, 16 Wall. 346, 21 L. 501, refusing to entertain appeal on account of defect as to jurisdictional amount; in dissenting opinion to Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 185, 205, 21 L. 882, 888, holding that court may, by habeas corpus, review decision of Circuit Court imprisoning person in criminal trial where question of jurisdiction was fairly raised by petition; Ex parte McCardle, 7 Wall. 513, 19 L. 265, to direct point; Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 406, F. C. 764, dismissing case for want of jurisdiction under judiciary act; Murdock v. City of Memphis, 20 Wall. 620, 22 L. 439, discussing effect of act of February 5, 1867, second section, as amendment of judiciary act of 1789; United States v. Young, 94 U. S. 259, 24 L. 153, denying jurisdiction of court to use writ of certiorari to compel Court of Claims to send to it proceedings in latter court had in case subsequent to appeal thereof to Supreme Court; Railroad Co. v. Grant, 98 U. S. 401, 251 L. 232, holding that party to suit has no vested right to an appeal, and that repeal of law conferring appellate jurisdiction, unless containing saving clause as to pending cases, brings all such within it; in dissenting opinion to Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 290, 25 L. 659, where case held that case could be transferred to Federal courts where charge of murder was placed against Federal officer, crime being committed in discharge of his duties; The Francis Wright, 105 U. S. 385, 26 L. 1101, declaring constitutional chapter 77, act of February 16, 1875, limiting appellate jurisdiction of court in admiralty cases to questions of law arising on record; National Bank of Baltimore v. Peters, 144 U. S. 572, 36 L. 546, 12 S. Ct. 768, dismissing appeal as filed too late under statute repealing former ones as to certain appeals, saving those taken before given date; American Construction Co. v. Jacksonville Ry. Co., 148 U. S. 378, 37 L. 489, 13 S. Ct. 761, denying mandamus to Circuit Court of Appeals and to Circuit Court and refusing to review decree of former by certiorari; United States v. American Bell Tel. Co., 159 U. S. 549, 40 L. 256, 16 S. Ct. 70, holding that court has appellate jurisdiction of judgment of Circuit Court of Appeals in suit brought by United States to cancel patent of invention; United States v. Plumer, 3 Cliff. 26, F. C. 16,055, holding that writ of error does not lie from Supreme to Circuit Court in criminal case; Pueblo Case, 4 Sawy. 579, F. C. 12,316, refusing to allow appeal from decision of Circuit Court upon appeal from decision of commission appointed to settle California land titles; In re Cilley, 58 Fed. 988, denying to Circuit Court appellate jurisdiction in probate matters; in dissenting opinion to Ex parte Banks, 28 Ala. 45, 46, where court held that granting the change of venue was discretionary with trial judge and not revisable by mandamus or otherwise.

Cited and relied upon by analogy in the following citing State cases: Thompson v. Lea, 28 Ala. 459, overruling motion to dismiss appeal for lack of statutory bond and security, because latter were waived by joinder in error; also in dissenting opinion to same, pp. 464, 466; Sanders v. Cabaniss, 43 Ala. 190, refusing to remand cause pending an appeal in Supreme Court; Warner v. Steamer Uncle Sam, 9 Cal. 736, holding, however, that failure by congress to provide for appeal from State courts in civil admiralty cases cannot affect question as to their original concurrent jurisdiction under

United States Constitution; Farrell v. Winchester Ave. R. R. Co., 61 Conn. 130, 23 Atl. 758, holding that corporation can only exercise powers enumerated in charter; Harris Mfg. Co. v. Walsh, 2 Dak. Ter. 43, 3 N. W. 309, applying same rule of construction to statutory authority conferred upon Supreme Court of territory to review judgments of District Courts; Fleming v. Clark, 12 Allen, 195, refusing to discharge, on habeas corpus, prisoner convicted of crime in Superior Court, though writ of error has issued from single justice of Supreme Court of United States to Superior Court; Jim v. State, 3 Mo. 149, holding that court cannot refuse to entertain matter within jurisdiction conferred upon it by Constitution or statute; Yarbrough v. State, 2 Tex. 527, dismissing appeal from judgment of inferior court refusing bail to prisoner before court on habeas corpus; State v. Dougherty, 5 Tex. 3, 4, dismissing, as outside court's jurisdiction, appeal in criminal case in behalf of State; Irrigation Co. v. Canal Co., 14 Utah, 163, 167, 46 Pac. 826, 827, refusing to entertain appeal from order of District Court granting injunction pendente lite, where Constitution gave appeal to Supreme Court from final judgments of District Court; Eastman v. Gurrey, 14 Utah, 171, 46 Pac. 828, refusing for same reason to entertain appeal from decree of latter court setting aside judgment in ejectment and ordering new trial; Barnett v. Meredith, 10 Gratt. 655, holding that under Constitution and statutes, Supreme Court cannot mandamus Circuit Court to try cause before it.

Distinguished, Gresham v. Ewell, 84 Va. 788, 6 S. E. 136, holding that Virginia Constitution does not ex proprio vigore confer jurisdiction upon Supreme Court, but empowers legislature to do so, and in absence of legislative authority, court may not issue writ of prohibition to County Court.

Statutory construction.— Statute should be construed according to its spirit and intention, even if some implication be necessary, p. 314.

Cited, and this principle relied on and applied in Baring v. Erdman, 2 Fed. Cas. 788, applying rule in construing Pennsylvania road and canal statutes, though result is apparently contrary to letter of statute; Montgomery, etc., Ry. Co. v. Sayre, 72 Ala. 450, construing statute giving appeal from assessment of damages by commissioners where land is condemned for railroad right of way; Hedrick v. Kramer, 43 Ind. 365, holding that under act providing for organization of Superior Courts, same rules as to costs prevail therein as obtain in Circuit Court; Roland Park Co. v. State, 80 Md. 451, 31 Atl. 299, construing statute imposing bonus tax on new corporations; Brien v. Williamson, 7 How. (Miss.) 19, construing State Constitution and legislation as avoiding contracts in pursuance of slave traffic, because opposed to public policy; Smiley v. Sampson, 1 Neb. 90, construing statute concerning filing statement of intention to pre-empt land; Tafoza v. Garcia, 1 N. Mex. 483, holding that revised statutes of Territory, adopted 1864-5, repeal by implication all previous statutes omitted therefrom; Vermont Loan & T. Co. v. Whithed, 2 N. Dak. 101, construing statute as excepting transactions between building and loan associations and their stockholders from the operation of general usury law; State v. JUSTICES.

Supreme Court of the United States.

FEBRUARY TERM, 1812

1*] *HUDSON & SMITH
v.
GUESTIER.

[1] Judges Present.—WASHINGTON, LIVINGSTON, TODD, DUVALL AND STORY.

This court will not rehear a cause after the term in which it was decided.

ON the first day of the term, Harper moved for, and obtained a rule to show cause why this case, which was decided at February term 1810, should not be reheard. The motion was grounded upon a statement of facts which was filed.

March 12th. When this rule was mentioned again by Harper he was informed

BY THE COURT, that the case could not be reheard after the term in which it had been decided.

GENERAL RULE.

February 10th. Winder requested information from the court whether the general rule which directs that only two counselors should be heard on each side of any cause in this court, was intended to prevent the division of a cause into distinct points, and the hearing of two counsellors on each point.

WASHINGTON, Justice, (The Chief Justice being absent), informed the bar that the court considered the rule as inflexible, whatever may be the number of points or parties in the cause.

v.
OGDEN AND OTHERS.

Present.—JUDGES WASHINGTON, LIVINGSTON, TODD, DUVALL AND STORY.

He who has equal equity, may acquire the legal estate, if he can, so as to protect his equity.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of New York, sitting in chancery, entered by consent pro forma to bring the case before this court.

The material facts as stated by Washington, Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, were as follows:

For the purpose of securing certain of his creditors, Robert Morris, on the 14th of February, 1798, conveyed to the appellants, as trustees for those creditors, a certain tract of land lying in Ontario county, in the state of New York, containing 500,000 acres, described by certain bounds. Previous to this, he had made conveyances to sundry persons of considerable portions of this tract, and amongst others to the defendants, S. Ogden, J. B. Church and to G. Cottringer, under whom the heirs of Sir William Pulteney claims, of which the appellants had full notice. He had also, by different conveyances, granted to the Holland Company more than three millions of acres of land, purchased (as this tract of 500,000 acres had been) from the state of Massachusetts, all in the same county and adjoining the land in question,

On the 8th of June, 1797, a judgment, at the suit of Talbot and Allum against Robert Morris, was dockcted in the Supreme Court of the state of New York; which, being prior in date to the conveyance made to the appellants, bound all the land which passed by it to the appellants. The bill states that Robert Morris, being confined in the jail at Philadelphia, in order to prevent any improper *use from being made [*3 of the above judgment, and on condition that the title to the land conveyed to the trustees should in no wise be impaired by it, procured Gouverneur Morris to advance the money for such judgment, from motives of friendship; that the said judgment was assigned to Adam Hoops, the mutual friend and agent of the parties, which was done to prevent it from being used injuriously against the trustees and the creditors for whom they acted, and also to preserve to Robert Morris the right of redemption in 1,500,000 acres which he had conveyed to the Holland Company, in nature of a mortgage as he supposed. That A. Hoops afterwards assigned the said judgment to Gouverneur Morris, and on the 15th of September, 1799, Robert Morris confirmed the said trust deed (of which it is worthy of remark, no mention had been made in the previous parts of the bill), and further agreed that any other land he might have in that county, which had not been previously conveyed, should be applied to pay that judgment in the first place, and the said last mentioned lands were to be sold upon an execution and to be purchased by A. Hoops, under Talbot and Allum's judgment, for the trustees, to which G. Morris assented, the trustees agreeing to mortgage the land to be purchased, to repay G. Morris the sum advanced for the purchase of the judgment.

It appears by the evidence, that, previous to the promise thus charged in the bill to have been made by G. Morris to R. Morris, the judgment of Talbot and Allum had been conditionally purchased by R. Morris, Jun., one of the appellants, avowedly for his individual use, from Cotes, Titford and Brooks, who then held it by assignment. That when this purpose was effected, it was agreed that the assignment should be made to A. Hoops, though in reality for the use of R. Morris, Jun., and should remain in the hands of a third person as an escrow to take effect on the payment of a note given by the said R. Morris, Jun., for the purchase of the judgment, and that the same should belong to Thomas Cooper, who indorsed the said note, in case he should be compelled to discharge the same.

1. The Chief Justice did not attend until Thursday, February 13. He received an injury by the over-setting of the stage coach on his journey from Richmond.

R. Morris, about the time when this note would become due, found himself unable to [4*] take it up, and, on this account, G. Morris had been solicited by R. Morris, and consented to pay the money and to retain the judgment to secure the advance. G. Morris, in his answer, expressly denies that any communication was made to him by R. Morris of his motives for asking his assistance in procuring an assignment of the judgment, or that he had ever heard or knew of the claim of the trustees to any part of this 500,000 acre tract, or that the same would, in any manner, be affected by the judgment of Talbot and Allum, until some time after he had paid for the judgment, when it was accidentally communicated to him by A. Hoops, who held the assignment of the same for A. Morris, Jun., as before mentioned. Upon receiving this information, G. Morris, with the assistance of his counsel, Thomas Cooper, projected a plan for protecting the interests of the trustees from being sacrificed by a sale under the execution which might issue on that judgment. Articles of agreement were accordingly drawn and executed by G. Morris and A. Hoops on the 29th of August, 1799, by which it was stipulated that the whole of the lands in the county of Ontario, purchased by R. Morris from the state of Massachusetts, amounting to upwards of four millions of acres, should be sold under the judgment, and should be purchased by A. Hoops, who should convey a certain part thereof to G. Morris, and should also mortgage that part of the said land which then belonged to the trustees to the said G. Morris, for securing the advance made by him on the purchase of the said judgment. Although this large tract of country was, by this arrangement, to be sold under the above judgment, yet that judgment being posterior to the conveyances made to the Holland Company, as well as to the other defendants below, they were consequently not bound by the judgment, nor could the title of the grantees have been affected by a sale under it. The object of this agreement, however, in relation to those lands, was to secure to G. Morris a supposed, but totally unfounded claim which R. Morris had asserted to an equity of redemption in one of the large tracts sold by him to the Holland Company, and also an imaginary quantity of surplus land presumed by R. Morris to be somewhere within the bounds of this great tract of country which was to be sold, which surplus, as it afterwards turned out, [5] had no *real existence. As to the land belonging to the trustees, which it is admitted was bound by this judgment, G. Morris was contented to receive a mortgage of that to secure his advance for the judgment.

A draft of an agreement was also made by Thomas Cooper, by the directions of G. Morris and delivered to A. Hoops to be carried to Philadelphia, and to be proposed to R. Morris and the trustees; but the terms of that agreement do not appear in any part of this record, although it is fairly to be presumed that it did not vary materially from the above agreement between G. Morris and A. Hoops. This draft was not altogether approved by the parties in Philadelphia, and another agreement was accordingly drawn and executed by R. Morris, the trustees and A. Hoops, bearing date the 16th of September, 1799, which did not materially differ from the agreement of the 29th of August preceding, except, that, by the latter, the surplus land, if there should be any, was to be mortgaged to the trustees as a security for reimbursing the whole or such part of the aforesaid judgment as the trustees might be obliged to pay for the discharge of the mortgage to be given by A. Hoops for securing the advance made by G. Morris for the purchase of the judgment.

This agreement was afterwards shown to G. Morris, who expressed some displeasure at its departure from the plan which he had himself arranged; but he admits in his answer that he never communicated his disapprobation either to R. Morris or to the trustees.

It appears in evidence that there was a stay of execution on the judgment of Talbot and Allum for three years from the time it was entered, which, of course, would not have expired before the 8th of June, 1800. This stay was released by R. Morris at some period subsequent to the interview which took place at the jail between R. Morris and G. Morris; but the particular time when it was executed does not appear from the record. It is not, however, improbable that it was not long subsequent to the second of May, 1799, since it appears that, on that day, R. Morris, Jun., in a letter addressed to T. Cooper, directing him to assign the said *judgment to G. Morris, requested him also [*6 to forward to him the form of a release to be executed by his father.

In pursuance of the arrangement which had been agreed upon between these parties as above mentioned, all the lands which R. Morris had purchased from the state of Massachusetts in the county of Ontario were advertised to be sold under the said judgment, on the 6th of February, 1800. Hoops, as it had been agreed, attended on the day of sale and bid for the land; but being overbid and not having the means to pay for the same in case it should be struck off to him, he prevailed upon the sheriff to adjourn the sale to the 13th of May following, upon his engaging to pay the sheriff his poundage, which undertaking G. Morris, soon afterwards, on application, furnished him with the means of discharging.

On the 22d of April, 1800, G. Morris, without having communicated to R. Morris or to the trustees the slightest intimation that he had come to such a determination, assigned over the said judgment to the Holland Company for a full consideration paid therefor, and without notice, as they, the Holland Company, expressly allege in their answer, of the claim of the trustees or of the equity stated in their bill.

The same day articles of agreement were entered into between Thomas L. Ogden—the Holland Company—and G. Morris, by which it was stipulated that the sale of all the lands by the execution on the aforesaid judgment, should take place, and should be purchased by the said Ogden in trust to convey to the Holland Company the several tracts of land which had been granted to them by R. Morris and to the several persons to whom conveyances had been made within the limits of the 500,000 acre tract prior to the deed to the trustees, the tracts to which they were respectively entitled, or such parts thereof as three persons, Hamilton, Cooper and Ogden, should direct; and as to the residue of the said 500,000, in trust to convey the same to such persons, in such parcels and upon such terms as the said Hamilton and others should direct. In execution of this agreement, Ogden attended the sale on the 13th 7] of May, *and purchased the whole of the lands taken in execution under the said judgment, for the sum of $5,200, and received a sheriff's deed for the same. Hamilton, Cooper and Ogden, in virtue of the powers vested in them, directed conveyances to be made by Ogden to the Holland Company according to the bounds expressed in the several conveyances to them by R. Morris, except so far as such bounds would interfere with Watson, Cragie and Greenleaf. In order to compensate the defendants, Samuel Ogden, Sir William Pulteney and John B. Church, for the land taken on the westward of their tracts, by fixing the true meridian line of the Holland Company to the east, the eastern line of those persons is made to run in upon the lands claimed by the trustees, so far as to give the former the full quantity of land mentioned in their respective conveyances. The direction, or award as it is called, then proceeds to allot to the trustees 58,570 acres (not half the quantity they claimed) upon certain conditions, one of which is to pay to the said trustee, for the use of the Holland Company, $5,623 with interest from the 22d of January, 1800. This sum, together with others charged upon such of the grantees as were benefitted by this arrangement, were intended to reimburse the Holland Company, the sums they had advanced, not only for the purchase of Talbot and Allum's judgment, but of another, which, being posterior to the conveyance to the trustees, created, of course, no lien upon any part of the 500,000 acre tract.

The prayer of the bill is for a conveyance by Thomas L. Ogden of all the land to which the trustees are entitled according to its real boundaries, upon the trustees paying such proportion of the money due by Talbot and Allum's judgment as is fairly chargeable on their land, and for general relief.

This cause was argued at great length in February, 1810, by Pendleton and Lewis for the complainants, and by Edwards and for the defendants; and again at this term by Joseph R. Ingersoll, E. Tilghman, P. B. Key and Lewis for the complainants, and by D. B. Ogden and Stockton for the defendants.

For the complainants it was contended,

8*] *That Thomas L. Ogden, who purchased the land at the sheriff's sale under Talbot and Allum's judgment, was, under all the circumstances of the case, to be considered in equity as a trustee for the complainants, to the extent of their legal title before that sale; or, in other words, that the sale was void as to the complainants, and ought to be set aside upon the complainants paying their proportion of the amount due upon the judgment, which was a lien upon two smaller tracts, as well as upon that which was claimed by the complainants.

Thomas L. Ogden was the agent of the Holland Company to whom Gouverneur Morris had assigned the judgment. This assignment having passed, not a legal, but an equitable right to a chose in action, was subject to the same equity in the hands of the Holland Company as it was in the hands of Gouverneur Morris, whether the Holland Company had actual notice of that equity or not; because nothing but the equitable right of Gouverneur Morris passed by the assignment. The Holland Company had no right to use it in any other way than he could have used it. They could make no use of it which he could not have made with a good conscience. They were bound by the same conscientious principles towards Robert Morris the elder and the complainants, which ought to have guided Gouverneur Morris. Their agent, T. L. Ogden, could not give a better estate under the sale than G. Morris himself could, if he had continued to hold the judgment and had become the purchaser. The only equity which he had was to the extent of the security necessary to reimburse the money which he had advanced, at the request and for the use and benefit of Robert Morris. He merely became a creditor of Robert Morris with a lien upon the lands to the extent of the debt; which lien he held under a trust, a confidence, a plighted faith, that it should not be enforced to the injury of Robert Morris, or his assignees; and even that it should be used for the benefit of R. Morris or his assignees, as far as it could be used consistent with G. Morris's security as to the amount paid for the judgment. Indeed, as the only interest or equity which G. Morris had in the judgment was merely as a security sub modo for the amount due upon the judgment, the judgment as to every other use which could be made of it, consistent with the security of G. Morris, belonged *to R. Morris; and G. Morris [*9 was bound in conscience and good faith to use it in such manner as R. Morris should direct. If, therefore, Gouverneur Morris, instead of T. L. Ogden, had purchased the land under the judgment, he would have holden it merely as an indemnity, and as to every other purpose would have been a trustee for R. Morris or his assigns.

The facts, so far as the conscience of G. Morris was concerned in the case, are simply these: Robert Morris, the elder, knowing that the judgment threatened the validity of the deed of trust which he had made to the complainants, who represented a class of creditors to whom he felt himself under peculiar obligations, entered into an engagement, through the agency of his son R. Morris, Jun., to purchase the judgment for the purpose of holding it as a shield for the protection of the conveyance to the complainants. Being unable to comply with the terms of the purchase, he requested Gouverneur Morris to advance the money due on the judgment, saying that he would thereby render him an essential service, and would be safe, as the judgment was a lien upon a very large tract of land. To this G. Morris assented, from motives of friendship, and to render his friend an essential service. How it was to have that effect was not, perhaps, at that time explained; but the natural inference was that the judgment was to be subject to the control of R. Morris, as to every disposition of it consistent with the security and indemnity of G. Morris; who was bound in conscience, in honor, and in friendship, to have submitted it to his control. The disposition which he did make of it was in violation of all these obligations, and therefore ought in equity to be set aside.

The complainants had a right to tender the amount due upon the judgment to G. Morris at any time. They knew that the judgment was a lien upon their lands, but they knew that there was a stay of execution until the 8th of June, 1800. Until that period they were safe, and Mr. R. Morris himself could not in equity release that stay so as to effect those lands without giving notice to the complainants. It would have been a fraud if he had. They knew that the judgment had been assigned to G. Morris. They knew the circumstances under which that assignment was made. They knew 10] the understanding, *the friendship, the confidence which subsisted between Gouverneur Morris and Robert Morris, the elder. They had a right to rely upon it and to consider themselves as safe. They had a right to believe that no use would be made of the judgment without their knowledge. They knew of the release of the stay of execution, and that the release was made for their benefit. They were parties to the agreement under which it was made, they knew that this agreement had been made known to G. Morris and that he had acquiesced, if not assented. But neither his acquiescence nor assent was necessary, except as to the provision made for his indemnity; for so far only was he interested. They knew that a sale for their benefit had been attempted under the judgment, but was postponed to a future day. They knew that the failure of this attempt and the postponement of the sale were known to G. Morris, and that he had even paid the poundage demanded by the sheriff upon the postponement. He knew that all these things were so understood by the complainants, and that they had this confidence in him, and were lulled into security. At this moment, without any notice or intimation to the complainants, he assigned over the judgment to the Holland Company, for purposes which he knew to be repugnant to the interest of the complainants. It is this of which the plaintiffs complain as unconscientious and injurious; and the consequences of which they seek to avoid.

It is true that G. Morris himself cannot properly be charged as a trustee, because an equity cannot, with propriety, be said to be the subject of a trust, or to be holden in trust; for the equity will always be in the cestui que trust, and not in the trustee. But if G. Morris, under all these circumstances, had himself acquired the legal estate to the lands conveyed to the complainants, he would have been a trustee for them, upon their paying or tendering him the money due by the judgment. He had no other equity to protect, and could not have protected his legal title under the equity of others. Nor had the Holland Company any equity to protect. There were no interfering lines, nor any other cause of dispute between them and the complainants. Their agent, Thomas L. Ogden, even after the sheriff's sale, was in no better situation than G. Morris would have been in if he had been the purchaser. He had no right to claim *protection under the [11 equity of any third person. He had full notice from the complainants before he made any conveyance under what is called the award of Hamilton, Ogden and Cooper. He therefore is to be considered merely as the agent of the Holland Company, who took only the equity of G. Morris; and having acquired the legal estate with full knowledge that the complainants were entitled to every possible benefit under that judgment beyond the interest of Gouverneur Morris, whose right extended only to indemnity for the advance he had made, he is to be considered as a trustee for the complainants for all beyond that indemnity; and upon receiving the amount due upon the judgment, ought to be decreed to convey to the complainants all the lands which he purchased at the sheriff's sale which lie within the tract conveyed to them by R. Morris, by the deed of the 14th of February, 1798.

It was also contended by the counsel for the complainants, that inasmuch as Mr. R. Morris had agreed to release the stay of execution for one purpose only, the execution could not legally be issued for another purpose, and therefore the sale was void at law. But whatever intrinsic force this argument might have had, it could not be considered by the court, because it was expressly admitted upon the record that the execution was regularly issued.

It was further said in behalf of the complainants, that although, at the time when G. Morris agreed to purchase the judgment, it was not stated in what manner the judgment should be used so as to be of service to his friend R. Morris, yet as G. Morris varied the conversation, he must be considered as having agreed that R. Morris should direct in what manner it should be used; and that as R. Morris, by his agreement of the 16th of September, 1799, did direct how it should be used (to which agreement G. Morris did not object), he was in equity bound to suffer that agreement to be carried into effect; and therefore his assignment of the judgment to the Holland Company with a view to defeat the purpose of that agreement was against conscience, and affected all the subsequent proceedings under that assignment.

The conveyances made by T. L. Ogden to Church and others, being made after notice given to him by the complainants, *can- [12 not injure their rights. He is liable to them at all events, and must look to those to whom he has conveyed the lands for his indemnity—an indemnity which he has taken care to secure.

On behalf of the appellees, it was said,

13*] *1st. That there was no trust for the benefit of the complainants; and consequently they have no equity.

2d. That if there was originally a trust for their benefit, yet as the defendants have acquired the legal title (without notice of the equity of the complainants), they, the defendants, have equity enough to support the legal estate they have thus acquired, to the extent of the number of acres intended originally to have been conveyed to them by R. Morris, the elder.

1st. There was no trust for the benefit of the complainants.

The complainants set forth the trust in Gouverneur Morris to be to prevent the judgment from being used injuriously to them, and to preserve to Robert Morris his right of redemption in that part of the lands which was supposed to be mortgaged to the Holland Company. No consideration flowed from the complainants whereby to raise an implied trust in their favor. The consideration was merely personal between Gouverneur Morris and Robert Morris; it was a matter of confidence; and if the former violated that trust of confidence, he was liable only to Robert Morris.

At law, no man can support an action upon an agreement unless he is a party, or some consideration flowed from him. (Cro. El., 369, Jordan v. Jordan; 1 Str., 592, Crow v. Rogers; 1 Vent., 6, Bourne v. Mason.) It is true there are some modern cases in which it has been holden that the person to whose use the promise was made may maintain an action in his own name, but it must be in a case where the whole use and benefit are to accrue to the plaintiff. But here, even as stated in the bill, the trust was in part for the benefit of Robert Morris.

If the complainants would not have a right to enforce the agreement at law, neither can they compel its execution in equity.

This bill is in the nature of a bill for the specific performance of the agreement between Robert Morris and Gouverneur Morris, charging the Holland Company with notice.

*A court of chancery decrees a specific [14 execution of a contract because a suit at law would not give a complete remedy; but a court of chancery will not decree a specific performance unless the party would have a right to recover damages in a court of law. Here was no right at law, and therefore this court cannot decree a specific performance of the agreement. (1 Vez., 444, Penn v. Lord Baltimore; Scholles and Lefroy, 552, Harvey v. Yielding.)

It is an universal principle in chancery, that the complainant must show himself entitled by his bill. (Mitford 43 [15], Barton's suit in equity, 36, 37.) He must recover according to his allegations and his proofs. Proofs without allegations are not sufficient, even if his proofs should show a good title to relief. The only allegation like an averment of a trust is that G. Morris agreed that he would not use the judgment to the injury of the complainants, nor to bar R. Morris's right of redemption. As to the latter part of the supposed trust the complainants cannot recover, and R. Morris is no party to the suit. On this account the bill is defective. (2 Atk., 510, Darwent v. Walton.) But even the allegation in the bill, imperfect as it is, is not supported by the evidence. G. Morris, in his answer, denies that R. Morris communicated to him his motives for wishing him to purchase the judgment, and most expressly denies any agreement on his part not to use it to the prejudice of the complainants. This answer, being directly responsive to the allegation of the bill, is conclusive evidence, unless contradicted by more than one witness. But it is confirmed by the deposition of R. Morris, as far as it relates to that interview. G. Morris states that he was induced to become the purchaser by motives of personal friendship towards R. Morris. It was the duty, therefore, of R. Morris to have explained to his friend in what manner the purchase was to be made serviceable to him, and who were the parties really to be benefited thereby. If he did not do it, and intended that others should derive the benefit, it was a fraud upon the feelings of friendship. But it is clear that R. Morris did not request it with a view principally to the security of the complainants. He states in his deposition that his objects were, 1. The equity of redemption, 2. The surplus tract which it was supposed remained unconveyed, *and [15 3. To prevent injury to the complainants. The visit of R. Morris, Jun., to New York, was to prevent the effect of certain attachments, and to secure the surplus lands so as to make a provision for his mother. Hoops, in his deposition, says that the security of the complainants was not an object in the first purchase of the judgment.

There was neither equity of redemption nor surplus land. How, then, was G. Morris to be secured for the amount of the judgment, unless by the lands of the complainants? And yet they say that the judgment was not to effect those lands. It would be absurd to suppose such a trust. The agreement of 16th of September, 1799, shows that there was no such trust. And the answer of G. Morris, not being contradicted, is conclusive evidence that the trust did not exist. (Pre. ch., 19, Kingdome v. Boakes; 2 Atk., 140, Janson v. Rany; 3 Atk., 407, Only v. Walker; 1 Br. C. C., 52, Pember v. Mathers.)

No equity arose from the release of the stay of execution. If there did, it was an equity in R. Morris, and not in the complainants.

The time and place of sale were fixed by the agent of the complainants, and therefore they cannot complain, nor allege the want of notice.

The inadequacy of price is by no means so great as the complainants pretend; but if it was it cannot affect the equity of the defendants' case. If they obtained the legal title they have equity enough to support it, even if it cost them much less than 5,000 dollars. But a sheriff's sale fairly and publicly made has never been set aside for inadequacy of price. If there be no trust, the inadequacy of the price is immaterial.

There must be in every trust, a subject of the trust, a trustee, and a cestui que trust. But here is no subject—the proceeds of the judgment were not for the complainants. They were the absolute property of G. Morris. He never held the land. But what sort of a trust was it? Not a resulting trust, for that can only be raised in favor of the person from whom the 16] consideration moved. *And that it was not an express trust is admitted. If it was neither an implied nor an express trust, G. Morris was the absolute owner of the judgment.

A man cannot be made a trustee unless the extent of his trust be fully explained to him. (10 Vez., Jun., 511, Lench v. Lench.)

The fact of the trust is to be found by the court from the evidence as a jury would find it.

Secret trusts are dangerous. Since the statute of frauds nothing is left of the whole fabric of parol trust but a resulting trust, which is a trust arising by implication, from the fact that the purchase money was paid by, or the consideration moved from, the party who claims the benefit of the trust. (2 Atk., 384, Parteriche v. Powlet; 3 Br. C. C., 577, Fordyce v. Willis.) And it is only lately parol evidence has been admitted to prove the facts from which a trust, as to lands, would result. (Cruise's Digest, 472; 1 Vern., 366, Gascoigne v. Thwing; 10 Vez., Jun., 366, Rider v. Kidder.)

In the case of Lloyd and Johnson v. Spillett and others, in 2 Atk., 150, Lord Hardwicke said, "I am now bound down by the statutes "of frauds and perjuries, to construe nothing "a resulting trust, but what are there called "trusts by operation of law; and what are "those? Why, first, when an estate is pur- "chased in the name of one person, but the "money or consideration is given by another; "or secondly, where a trust is declared only as "to part, and nothing said as to the rest, what "remains, undisposed of, results to the heir at "law, and they cannot be said to be trustees "for the residue. I do not know any other "instance where this court have declared re- "sulting trusts by operation of law, unless in "cases of fraud and where transactions have "been carried on mala fide."

Lord Hardwicke was not perfectly correct as to the extent of the doctrine. Later cases have added the cases of a failure of the consideration, and where the consideration is merely nominal. (1 Cruise Dig., 471, § 29, &c.) A purchaser for full value has never been adjudged to be a trustee for another. (7 Br. Parl. ca., *526, Pilkinton v. Bailey; 1 Cruize, 485, [17 § 60, S. C. abridged, 4 Bur., 2255.)

2d. But if there had been a trust, and although the assignment by G. Morris to the Holland Company was an assignment of an equitable right only, and therefore not protected by want of notice, yet the agent of the Holland Company having obtained the legal title without notice of the trust either by himself or the Holland Company, he has a right to hold against a mere legal claim on the part of the complainants. For the mistake as to the boundary, being a mistake to the prejudice of the defendants, can create no equity in favor of the complainants. It was a mistake by which the complainants would have gained, and the defendants would have lost, more than one thousand acres of land. If Gouverneur Morris had purchased the judgment with a full knowledge of this mistake of the boundaries, and with a view to secure the benefit thereof for the complainants, and to do this injustice to the defendants, no court of equity would have aided him in accomplishing the purpose; and even if he had acquired the legal title to the land under such circumstances, it is more than probable that a court of equity would have granted relief to the defendants.

A court of equity will never interfere against a bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice, but will permit him to save himself by any legal plank which he can lay hold on. (1 Eq. ca. ab., 353, 322.) And in the case of Jerrad v. Sanders (2 Vez., Jun., 457), Lord Loughborough said that in such a case a court of equity has no jurisdiction.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the complainants who seek to gain by the loss of the defendants have no equity arising from the mistake of the boundaries, and as the defendants have the legal title supported by a strong case in equity, the complainants are not entitled to the aid of a court of equity.

Feb. 20.[1] WASHINGTON, J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

*The first point made by the counsel [18 for the appellants is, that G. Morris ought to be considered as a trustee of Talbot and Allum's judgment for the trustees. On this point it is contended that, although in the first instance, G. Morris might have had no other inducement in purchasing that judgment than to perform a friendly service to R. Morris, yet he afterwards charged himself with the interests of the trustees by an express declaration contained in the agreement of the 29th of August, 1799, connected with the subsequent agreement of the 16th of September, 1799, which, notwithstanding his disapprobation of some parts of it, he adopted by his silence and subsequent conduct. The trust being thus established, it is then contended that the Holland

Company—the purchasers of this judgment from G. Morris—took the same clothed with all the equitable rights of the trustees, which were attached to it in the hands of G. Morris upon the ground that a judgment is a chose in action, and the assignment passes no more than an equitable interest to the debt of which it is the evidence. Having arrived at this point, the title of the trustees is placed upon the well-known principle which governs a Court of Chancery, that between merely equitable claimants, each having equal equity with the other, he who hath the precedency in time, has the advantage in right.

If the cause rested upon this state of the case, it would be incumbent on the court to examine these principles and their application to the respective pretensions of the trustees and of the Holland Company. Whether an equity arising to a third person who claims the chose in action, and whose title depends upon a secret trust and confidence between him and the ostensible assignee, has equal equity with the person who afterwards purchases the judgment bona fide and without notice of a fact not disclosed by the previous assignments, is a question which the court deems it unnecessary to decide, because, though the equity of the trustees and the Holland Company should be admitted to be equal, yet the latter have acquired another title to the subject in controversy which a court of equity will never disturb. They, or rather their trustee, have got the fruits of their execution, and have obtained the legal estate in the land on which the judgment gave them only a lien. Having at least equal equity with the trustees, it was perfectly justifiable in them to obtain a superiority by buying in the legal estate.

19*] *Aware of this difficulty, one of the counsel for the appellants found it necessary to contend that the sale on the 13th of May was absolutely void, the execution having been taken out before it could lawfully issue in consequence of the stay on record which prevented its emanation prior to the 8th of June following. This, however, is arguing against the fact; because we find that long prior to the sale and assignment of the judgment to the Holland Company, the testatum fi. fa. had issued by the consent of R. Morris as well as of the trustees, who, on the 6th of Feb., 1800, had endeavored to render it effectual by a sale attempted on that day. The release of the stay is not spread on the record so that the terms of it, or its date, might be examined. But since the execution could not legally issue without a regular release filed in the court where the judgment was of record, and since the form of such a release was applied for by one of the trustees so early as the 2d of May, 1799, it must be presumed, against the trustees and in favor of the regularity of the proceedings, that the release was in due form, and bore date prior at least to the emanation of the execution.

But it is contended that the consideration for this release was the trust declared by G. Morris in August, 1799, or acquiesced in by him under the agreement of the 16th Sept. and that his breach of trust in selling the judgment to the Holland Company, with a view to the intended purchase of the lands in dispute by them, did away the effect of the release previously executed by R. Morris. That this was a legal consequence of the alleged breach of trust can scarcely be maintained. The release being once regularly executed and delivered could never afterwards be avoided at law by a failure of one of the parties to perform an act in consideration of which the release was given. It could extend no further than to charge G. Morris with a breach of contract for which he might be personally liable to the party aggrieved. But as to third persons claiming fairly under him, without notice of the alleged breach of trust, the legal effect of the release would remain unimpaired.

It is very obvious, however, that the whole of this argument is founded on an assumption of facts which are not proved, and which cannot and ought not to be presumed. It does not appear from the evidence in the *cause [20 that the trust assumed by G. Morris was the consideration of that release, and yet if the trustees would avail themselves of that circumstance to invalidate the sale, and to deprive the Holland Company of the shield by which they have protected their equitable interest, such proof should be clearly made out. On the contrary, the court must consider the fact as established (since it is asserted on oath by G. Morris in answer to a charge in the bill, that the object of G. Morris in purchasing the judgment, was to confer a personal benefit on R. Morris only) that, in consequence of this undertaking, made with the knowledge of one of the trustees, and for the purpose of giving effect to this intention, the release was made, and it is fairly to be presumed that it was executed long prior to the arrangement made by G. Morris and the trustees in August and September, 1799, because, as has been before observed, the form of a release was applied for as early as the 2d of May preceding. If the date of the release was contemporaneous with, or subsequent to the agreements of August and September, it was in the power of the trustees fully to have established the fact. Being essential to their argument, their having omitted to furnish the proof affords a strong presumption against them.

It is contended that the Holland Company ought to be considered in the light of purchasers of the judgment with notice of the trust, because, knowing, as they were bound to do, that the execution could not issue before the 8th of June, 1800, they were necessarily led to inquire into the right which they assumed of taking out execution at a prior day, and in making this inquiry they must have come to a knowledge of the trust. But the previous issue of the execution, fortified by the circumstance of the sale under it attempted in February and continued by adjournment to the 13th of May, rendered all inquiries into the cause of the release unnecessary. It was enough for them that the impediment to the issuing of the execution was removed at the time they purchased the judgment.

The cause appears to the court to be so clearly in favor of the Holland Company and those claiming under them, upon the point which has been examined, that it seems almost unnecessary to notice those circumstances which detract from the equitable title of the trustees.

21*] *But it is obvious that the injury of which they complain has arisen in a great measure from the want of energy in themselves, and a kind of helpless dependence upon others, even after they were fully apprized of the steps which were taking and which finally led to the loss from which they now seek to extricate themselves. Mr. Fitzsimmons was informed by A. Hoops, prior to the 22d of April, 1800, that the agent of the Holland Company had gone on to New York, and the intention of this visit was most probably communicated to him, as Mr. Hoops, at the same time, advised him to have an understanding with G. Morris. If he received from this advice nothing further than a hint of possible mischief, it was sufficient to put them upon inquiry and exertion.

An attempt was made, though not much pressed, to charge G. Morris with a breach of trust, and with the legal consequences thereof. That his declining to communicate to the trustees his intended sale of Talbot and Allum's judgment to the Holland Company upon terms which might seriously affect the interest of the former, was unkind, and a departure from the friendly conduct he had manifested towards them, may be admitted. But since it must be taken as a fact in the cause that no promise of any kind had been made by G. Morris in favor of the trustees, or to his knowledge, in reference to their interests, prior to the agreement of the 29th of August, 1799, (and even this agreement, or the draft made by Cooper and forwarded by Hoops to R. Morris and the trustees for their signature, is not alleged in the bill with any degree of certainty as a ground on which the trust is founded) and since the arrangement proposed by G. Morris in that agreement and draught was rejected by those parties and another substituted in their stead to which G. Morris was no party, it would be going too far for a court of equity, in such a case, and in favor of persons who would do nothing for themselves, to make G. Morris a trustee by implication for the purpose of charging him with a breach of trust. It is true that G. Morris might have communicated to the trustees his disapprobation of the change they had made in his arrangement, and his refusal to abide by that which they had proposed as a substitute, so as to have afforded them an opportunity to retrace their steps. But surely he was not, in point of law, as much bound to 22*] make such a *communication as the trustees were to obtain a certain knowledge of his assent to the agreement of the 16th September. He had gratuitously offered to do a favor to the trustees upon certain conditions. They reject the offer as made and propose other conditions. It was incumbent on them to obtain his assent to the new proposal if they meant to consider him in the light of a trustee.

The opinion given upon these points renders it unnecessary to consider the question of boundaries.

Decree affirmed without prejudice.

BRIG JAMES WELLS
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—MARSHALL, Chief Justice.

In cases of admiralty jurisdiction, new evidence will be admitted in this court; and for that purpose a commission may issue.

The evidence of that necessity which will excuse a violation of the embargo laws, must be very clear and positive.

THIS was an appeal from a sentence of the Circuit Court which affirmed that of the District Court of Connecticut, restoring the cargo but condemning the brig James Wells, an American registered vessel, for a violation of the 3d section of the embargo act of January 9th, 1808, in making a voyage to St. Bartholomews, under a clearance for the port of St. Mary's, in the state of Georgia. The excuse suggested by the claimant of the vessel was stress of weather. He stated in his claim and answer, that the vessel, laden with 1272 barrels of flour, sailed from New York on the 26th of February, 1808, cleared and bound for St. Mary's, with a bona fide intention of going there, and without any intent of going to any foreign place. But that by contrary winds and stress of weather and the leaky condition of the vessel, he was compelled against his will (he being owner and supercargo) and against the will of the captain and crew, to go to, and enter the port of Gustavia, in the island of St. Bartholomews, in the West Indies, where he was obliged by the leaky and shattered condition of the vessel, to unlade the cargo, which was greatly damaged, and he could not afterwards obtain permission to carry it away again, but was compelled to sell it there.

*The evidence on the part of the claim- [*23
ant tended to prove that after the vessel got to sea, and the weather was rough, she leaked considerably in her upper works, so that in bad weather they had to keep two pumps going at the rate of three or four hundred strokes every half hour; that after being six days at sea, it was judged "best for the preservation of their "lives as well as for the safety of vessel and "cargo, to bear away for any of the West "India Islands;" that when they arrived at St. Bartholomews, part of the flour was damaged, and they were obliged to unlade the vessel to have her surveyed and repaired. That the Governor of the island had prohibited the exportation of provisions and would not permit them to take away their cargo.

New evidence which had been taken under a commission issued from this court, was offered.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, stated that he could not consent to admit it, but wished the objection might be saved.

He supposed that a distinction ought to be taken between cases of admiralty and cases of maritime jurisdiction, and by the act of Congress, new evidence is admissible in this court in cases of admiralty only.

On the next day, however, he said that he was induced by the particular circumstances of this case to waive his objection; especially as the question would be made in another case at this term.

Harper and Pitkin, for the appellant, cited the cases of the Betsy and Charlotte v. U. S. (Ante vol. 4, p. 443), and Yeaton v. U. S. (Ante vol. 5, p. 281).

The court said that the admission of the evidence in this case, being by consent, would not prejudice the question if it should afterwards arise in another case.

Pitkin and Harper for the appellant.

The plea of necessity by stress of weather has been heretofore admitted as an excuse for violating the positive law of the embargo; and 24] the only question in this *case is whether the necessity was so urgent as to justify the bearing away for a port of safety. We contend that reasonable apprehensions of loss by persisting in the voyage to St. Mary's was a sufficient justification.

Fraud is not to be presumed. The fact is incontestable that the vessel leaked very much, and the weather was very bad. Such an apprehension of loss as would have justified a deviation under a policy of insurance is a sufficient justification in the present case. And in such case it is sufficient to justify a deviation that the captain has acted fairly and bona fide, and according to the best of his judgment for the benefit of all parties concerned, and has no other view but to conduct the ship and cargo by the safest and shortest course to her port of destination. (Marshall on insurance, 408, 409, 410, 411.)

By the original embargo act of December 22d, 1807, the master is to give a bond in double the value of the vessel and cargo, to reland the goods in the United States, "danger of the seas excepted." That act being in pari materia, the exception of the dangers of the seas ought to be considered as extending to the present case.

WASHINGTON, J. There is no doubt as to the law; the only question is whether this case be within the exception.

Pitkin. It is strong evidence that the master thought he was doing right, that he returned directly to the United States and subjected himself at once to the penalty of his bond, and that in fact he obtained only 12 dollars per barrel for his flour at St. Bartholomews.

Dallas, contra.

It was the duty of the owner to have a vessel fit for the voyage and the season of the year. This vessel was badly built; her condition upon the former voyage was given in evidence and was known to the owner when she sailed. He knew she would leak, and probably he intended she should leak. He knew the leak was in her upper works only, and that therefore the lives of those on board were not in danger. He did 25] not have the proper *repairs made at home which he knew were wanting. Nothing was done to her at St. Bartholomews, except caulking, and she brought home her cargo in excellent order. When they found that she leaked she might have returned. The wind which was contrary to St. Mary's would have been fair to bring her back; other vessels arrived about the same time with fair winds.

Nothing but imminent danger to the lives of those on board could justify their going to the West Indies contrary to law. The safety of the vessel and cargo was a matter of no consideration, as a justification. There is therefore no analogy to the case of deviation.

Feb. 20. All the judges being present, WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

That the law under which this prosecution is founded has been, prima facie, violated, is admitted; and it becomes absolutely necessary for the defendant, if he would excuse the breach, to bring himself within the exception made for his benefit, not by doubtful testimony, but by such as shall leave no reasonable doubt of the sincerity of his exertions to proceed to some port in the United States, and the danger or apparent impossibility of doing so.

That the vessel, shortly after leaving New York, leaked considerably is proved; but it is also proved that the leak was in her upper works; that she could be freed, and, by great exertions, was kept free of water.

It is clearly proved that, after a sail of six days, she bore away for the West Indies, and the danger of continuing on the coast is indirectly stated, though nowhere positively affirmed.

But it is not proved by a single witness that an exertion was made to gain a port of the United States, or that the attempt, if it had been made, would, in the opinion of one person on board, have failed or been attended with danger. Nor are the state of the winds, or the latitude *and longitude of the vessel when [26 she bore away, given in evidence so as to enable the court to judge. In short, had the original destination been to the West Indies, and this known to the crew, it would be difficult to fix perjury upon any one of those who have given evidence in this cause.

In such a case, where no presumption can, or ought to be made in favor of the owner of the vessel, and with so strong a temptation as he had to violate the law, her condemnation is inevitable.

Sentence affirmed with costs.

MARYLAND INSURANCE COMPANY,

v.

LE ROY, BAYARD & M'EVERS.

The discharge of underwriters from their liability, in case of taking on board an additional cargo, not authorized by the policy, depends, not upon any supposed increase of risk, but wholly on the departure of the insured from the contract of insurance.

The consequences of such a violation of the contract are immaterial to its legal effect, as it is, per se, a discharge of the underwriters; and the law attaches no importance to the degree, in cases of voluntary deviation. Necessity alone can sanction a deviation in any case; and that deviation must be strictly commensurate with the vis major producing it.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant brought by Le Roy and others, against the Maryland Insurance Company, upon a policy of insurance upon the ship John, from New York to five ports on the coast of "Africa, be-"tween Castle D'Elmina and Cape Lopez, in-"cluding those ports, and at and from them, or "either of them, back to New York with liber-"ties as per order of insurance."

The order of insurance was as follows, viz.: "At what rate will you insure three thousand "five hundred dollars upon freight of the ship "John, of New York, valued at that sum, at "and from New York to Castle D'Elmina, on "the gold coast of Africa, with liberty for the "vessel to touch at the Cape de Verd Islands "for the purchase of stock, such as hogs, goats "and poultry, and taking in water?

27*] *"Also, nine thousand dollars on the "American ship John, valued at this sum; and "eleven thousand eight hundred dollars on "cargo by said ship, consisting of wine, rum, "beef, geneva, dry goods, tobacco, molasses, "&c., at and from New York to five ports on "the coast of Africa, between Castle D'Elmina "and Cape Lopez, including those ports, with "liberty of touching and trading at all, or any "of said ports, backwards and forwards, and "at and from her last port on the coast, to "New York, with liberty of touching at the "Cape de Verds on her return passage, for "stock and take in water. It is understood "that the captain returning to one or more "ports that he had touched and traded at be-"fore, shall not be considered a deviation. "The John was ready and expected to sail the "13th inst. There are no contraband goods on "board, and the ship is armed with eight car-"riage guns, with ammunition in proportion, "and is an excellent vessel, and Captain Law-"rence, who commands her, is a native of "New York, well acquainted on the coast of "Africa, and has been at most of the places it "is intended the vessel is to stop at, and is a "careful, experienced seaman."

The declaration was for a total loss by the perils of the sea. The cause was tried upon the issue of non infregit conventionem, and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs with 5476 dollars damages.

Upon the trial of this issue the defendants (the plaintiffs in error) took twelve bills of exceptions, but as the opinion of this court was given upon the 7th only, it is deemed unnecessary to state the others.

1. The first bill of exceptions stated not only the facts which the plaintiffs and defendants offered to prove, but detailed at great length the testimony, and circumstances tending to prove those facts, or from which they might be inferred. Among other facts it stated that the ship, in the prosecution of her voyage arrived at the island of Fogo, one of the Cape de Verd Islands, on the 7th of May, 1805, where the captain received on board four bullocks and four jackasses, besides water and other provisions, and unstowed the dry goods and broke 28*] open two *bales and took out 40 pieces of each for trade. That the ship remained there until the 24th of May. That the time generally employed by a vessel in taking in stock and water at the Cape de Verd Islands is from two to three days unless the weather should be very unfavorable; that the weather was good; and that the bullocks and jackasses incumbered the deck much more than small stock would have done.

7. The 7th bill of exceptions stated that the defendants gave in evidence all the facts detailed in the preceding bills of exceptions, and thereupon prayed the court to direct the jury, that if they believe the same, then the taking the said jackasses on board the said ship John, while she lay at the Island of Fogo, was not within the privilege allowed to the plaintiffs in this cause to touch at the Cape de Verd Islands in the performance of the voyage insured for the purchase of stock and to take in water, and therefore vitiates the policy, which direction the court refused to give; but the court was of opinion, and accordingly directed the jury, that the taking in the four jackasses at the Isle of Fogo as aforesaid, did not avoid the policy, unless the risk was thereby increased; whereupon the counsel for the defendants excepted.

Martin, for plaintiffs in error,

As to the 7th exception, contended, that the liberty to touch at the Cape de Verds to purchase stock and take in water, did not authorize the taking the jackasses on board. The natural tendency was to increase the risk, and it was immaterial whether the risk was in fact increased.

Winder, contra.

The question upon the 7th bill of exceptions is only whether the court did right in leaving it to the jury to decide whether the risk was increased by taking in the jackasses. It is like the case of Livingston and al. v. The Maryland Insurance Company (6 Cranch, 274), where this court decided that the question whether a fact was material to the risk was a question to be decided by a jury under the direction of a court.

Harper, on the same side, [29

As to the 7th bill of exceptions, contended, that it was a question of fact to be decided by the jury, whether the taking in the jackasses increased the risk. This court has so decided in the case already alluded to of Livingston v. The Maryland Insurance Company. The principle of the case of Rayne v. Bell is, that there was no increase of risk and no delay. The case of Sheriff v. Potts is overruled by that of Rayne v. Bell. But the license to take in stock included jackasses.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, in reply.

The 7th bill of exceptions states in effect that the court refused to say that the taking in of the jackasses discharged the underwriters, although it might produce delay. It is not stated that it did not produce delay; and the evidence shows that it did. The principle of deviation is not increase of risk, but delay. If, therefore, here was any delay, the policy was void from that time.

But it is said they had license to take in jackasses, because they were stock. But the order for insurance upon the vessel refers to the preceding order for insurance on the freight, which was written on the same paper, and connected by the word "also." In the order for insurance upon the freight, the stock is particularly stated to be "such as hogs, goats and poultry." They could no more take jackasses under this license than they could take plows, horses, carts, or goods and merchandise, which are also stock.

The ship had a special license to touch for a special purpose, and Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The contract of insurance is upon a voyage specific as to its nature, destination, &c. If the act done be calculated to tend to increase the risk, it is immaterial whether the risk be actually increased. The case of Rayne and Bell, in 9 East, 195, in some respects is not law, but in this respect it is good law and supported by analogy. It goes on the ground of delay or risk. The case of Sheriff and Potts, cited in the late edition of Marshall, is not overruled by Rayne and Bell, although Stitt and Wardell is.

30*] *Feb. 22. All the judges being present, JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In deciding on this cause the court will confine itself to the case made out on the 7th exception. Its decision on the point presented by that exception disposes of the case finally.

The opinion prayed for was, that, by taking in, at Fogo, an additional cargo, not sanctioned by the contract of insurance, the insurers were discharged from their liability under the policy. The charge, delivered by the court, was, that the subsequent liability of the underwriters must depend upon the question whether any increase of risk resulted from the shipping of that additional cargo.

In this charge, this court are of opinion that the court below erred.

The discharge of the underwriters from their liability in such cases, depends, not upon any supposed increase of risk, but wholly on the departure of the insured from the contract of insurance. The consequences of such violation of the contract are immaterial to its legal effect, as it is, per se, a discharge of the underwriters, and the law attaches no importance to the degree in cases of voluntary deviation; necessity alone can sanction a deviation in any case; and that deviation must be strictly commensurate with the vis major producing it. The case of Rayne and Bell has been cited as supporting a contrary doctrine.

Without being understood to acquiesce in the correctness of that decision, it may be remarked that the question was not, in that case, whether the lading, taken in at Gibraltar, was within the terms of the policy, as in the present, but what acts were lawful to be done during the delay occasioned by a justifiable cause of deviation. On the contrary, the case of Sheriff and Potts was a case of voluntary departure from the stipulations of the policy, and the decision supports the opinion we now give.

31*] *It may also be remarked, that, in the case of Rayne and Bell the notice which Lord Ellenborough takes of the case of Sheriff and Potts, virtually admits the doctrine upon which this court founds its decision.

The terms of this policy so far as connected with this decision, are, "with liberty of touching at the Cape de Verd Islands, on her outward passage, for stock, and to take in water." Touching, in its nautical sense, is known to be the most restrictive word that can be adopted in such a case. Construing the license according to the subject matter, and in its necessary connection with the offer on the freight, it could mean no more than permission to provision the vessel with live stock, such as is usual on a voyage, and may be procured at the Cape de Verds.

It might, indeed, admit of a doubt whether any of the larger animals used for food were included within the policy. The words of the first offer certainly were intended to confine the permission to the smaller animals. Stock is a term of the most general import. In its present extended application, it would include a great variety of subjects that never could have entered into contemplation of the parties.

In what sense was the term used? is the question to be decided; not what uses it might have been applied to in other contracts, or between other parties. The general want of precision in the language of maritime contracts is an endless source of litigation among mercantile men. Courts of justice are therefore obliged to resort to such reasons as the nature, object and terms of the contract present, to determine the precise extent of the obligation of the parties.

We feel no inclination to add to the number of causes which vitiate a policy; but the amount of the premium depends upon such a variety of considerations (as often suggested by caprice as by judgment), that the contract, whatever it is, must be substantially adhered to.

Judgment reversed.

*THE UNITED STATES [*32
v.
HUDSON AND GOODWIN.

Absent—WASHINGTON, Justice.

The courts of the United States have no common law jurisdiction in cases of libel against the government of the United States. But they have the power to fine for contempts, to imprison for contumacy, and to enforce the observance of their orders, &c.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Connecticut, in which, upon argument of a general demurrer to an indictment for a libel on the President and Congress of the United States, contained in the Connecticut Currant, of the 7th of May, 1806, charging them with having in secret voted two millions of dollars as a present to Bonaparte for leave to make a treaty with Spain, the judges of that court were divided in opinion upon the question, whether the Circuit Court of the United States had a common law jurisdiction in cases of libel.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, in behalf of the United States, and Dana for the defendants, declined arguing the case.

THE COURT, having taken time to consider, the following opinion was delivered (on the last day of the term, all the judges being present) by JOHNSON, J.:

The only question which this case presents is, whether the circuit courts of the United States can exercise a common law jurisdiction in criminal cases. We state it thus broadly because a decision on a case of libel will apply to every case in which jurisdiction is not vested in those courts by statute.

Although this question is brought up now for the first time to be decided by this court, we consider it as having been long since settled in public opinion. In no other case for many years has this jurisdiction been asserted; and the general acquiescence of legal men shows the prevalence of opinion in favor of the negative of the proposition.

33*] *The course of reasoning which leads to this conclusion is simple, obvious, and admits of but little illustration. The powers of the general government are made up of concessions from the several states; whatever is not expressly given to the former, the latter expressly reserve. The judicial power of the United States is a constituent part of those concessions; that power is to be exercised by courts organized for the purpose, and brought into existence by an effort of the legislative power of the Union. Of all the courts which the United States may, under their general powers, constitute, one only—the Supreme Court—possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the constitution, and of which the legislative power cannot deprive it. All other courts created by the general government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power that creates them, and can be vested with none but what the power ceded to the general government will authorize them to confer.

It is not necessary to inquire whether the general government, in any and what extent, possesses the power of conferring on its courts a jurisdiction in cases similar to the present; it is enough that such jurisdiction has not been conferred by any legislative act, if it does not result to those courts as a consequence of their creation.

And such is the opinion of a majority of this court. For, the power which Congress possess to create courts of inferior jurisdiction, necessarily implies the power to limit the jurisdiction of those courts to particular objects; and when a court is created, and its operations confined to certain specific objects, with what propriety can it assume to itself a jurisdiction—much more extended; in its nature very indefinite; applicable to a great variety of subjects; varying in every state in the Union—and with regard to which there exists no definite criterion of distribution between the district and circuit courts of the same district?

The only ground on which it has ever been contended that this jurisdiction could be maintained is, that, upon the formation of any political body, an implied power to preserve its own existence and promote the end and object of its creation, necessarily results to it. But, without 34] *examining how far this consideration is applicable to the peculiar character of our constitution, it may be remarked that it is a principle by no means peculiar to the common law. It is coeval, probably, with the first formation of a limited government; belongs to a system of universal law, and may as well support the assumption of many other powers as those more peculiarly acknowledged by the common law of England.

But if admitted as applicable to the state of things in this country, the consequence would not result from it which is here contended for. If it may communicate certain implied powers to the general government, it would not follow that the courts of that government are vested with jurisdiction over any particular act done by an individual in supposed violation of the peace and dignity of the sovereign power. The legislative authority of the Union must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offense.

Certain implied powers must necessarily result to our courts of justice from the nature of their institution. But jurisdiction of crimes against the state is not among those powers. To fine for contempt, imprison for contumacy, inforce the observance of order, &c., are powers which cannot be dispensed with in a court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others; and so far our courts no doubt possess powers not immediately derived from statute; but all exercise of criminal jurisdiction in common law cases, we are of opinion, is not within their implied powers.

ALEXANDER SHIRRAS, JOHN BLACK, WILLIAM MILLIGAN, WILLIAM BLACKLOCK, AND JOSEPH VERREES.

v.

JOHN CAIG AND ROBERT MITCHEL.

Absent—WASHINGTON, Justice,

A mortgage of land, made by one who has a legal and equitable title to a moiety of the property which the mortgage purports to convey, passes only his legal right, although he had a power, from the person who held the residue of the legal, but not of the equitable estate in the land, to sell and convey his right also; the mortgageor not having affected to convey any part of it under his power from the other person, although his deed purported to mortgage the whole; and the equitable title not being in the person who gave the power.

A plat referred to in the deed as being annexed to it, but which was never in fact annexed, and was not recorded with the deed, affords no evidence in aid of the description of the property mentioned in the deed. A person cannot be charged with fraudulently secreting a deed who places it upon record as soon as the law requires.

It is not necessary to the validity of a mortgage that it should truly state the debt it is intended to secure; but it shall stand as a security for the real equitable claims of the mortgagees, whether they existed at the date of the mortgage or arose afterwards upon the faith of the mortgage, before notice of the defendant's equity.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia, by Shirras and others, original complainants, *against Caig and Mitchel, [35 original defendants, in a suit in equity to foreclose a mortgage of a lot, houses and wharf in Savannah, called Gairdner's wharf, which were in the possession of the defendants.

The mortgage was made on the 1st of December, 1801, by Edwin Gairdner, in his own name, and also as attorney for the defendant, Caig (but without any authority from Caig so to do), to secure the payment of £30, 000 sterling, for which E. Gairdner had, on the same day, executed a bond for himself and Caig.

In the year 1796, this property had been purchased by James Gairdner, Edwin Gairdner, and Robert Mitchel as joint tenants, who took a conveyance from Levi Sheftall to themselves, by the description of James Gairdner, Edwin Gairdner and Robert Mitchell, merchants and copartners of the city of Savannah. The name of the firm was Gairdners & Mitchell. In 1799 this firm was dissolved, and the business was carried on in Charleston by Edwin Gairdner alone under the firm of Edwin Gairdner & Co.; and by mutual consent, in December, 1799, an entry was made in the books of Gairdners & Mitchel, by James Gairdner, charging this property, to the account of Edwin Gairdner & Co., at the price of 20,000 dollars. In 1800, Edwin Gairdner entered into partnership with John Caig, the defendant, at Savannah under the firm of Edwin Gairdner & Co., under which name he continued to carry on business alone at Charleston; and upon his books at that place, made an entry charging this property to the Savannah house (consisting of himself and Caig) at an agreed price; and the Savannah house by an entry on their books credited the same on the account of the Charleston house, consisting of Edwin Gairdner alone.

On the 7th of January, 1802, Edwin Gairdner and John Caig dissolved their partnership at Savannah, and a new firm was established consisting of Edwin Gairdner, John Caig and the defendant, Robert Mitchel, under the name of Gairdner, Caig & Mitchel, who, by their articles of copartnership under seal, agreed to take the property in question, at a valuation, and hold it as their joint property.

36*] *Previous to this, viz., in March, 1800, Mitchel had by deed conveyed his third part of this property to Edwin Gairdner and John Caig, as joint tenants; and at the time of executing the mortgage (viz., December 1, 1801,) Edwin Gairdner had full power and authority from James Gairdner to sell and convey his share of the property.

Subsequent to the mortgage, viz., on the 27th of July, 1802, Edwin Gairdner, as attorney for James Gairdner, by deed conveyed to Mitchel one-third of the property, and by his own deed of the same date he conveyed one-sixth of the property to Caig, who had before received a conveyance of one other sixth from Mitchel.

These two last deeds were proved and recorded on the 14th of September, 1802.

The mortgage was proved on the 10th and recorded on the 17th of September, 1802.

By the law of Georgia, deeds of bargain and sale are to be recorded in 12 months, and by a law of 1768, every mortgage and deed recorded within ten days after its execution, shall have preference of other deeds and mortgages, not recorded within that period.

At the time of executing the mortgage, therefore, the legal title of three-sixths of the property was in Edwin Gairdner, and according to the book entries of the several copartnerships he was also equitably entitled to the same. The legal title of two-sixths was in James Gairdner, and of the other sixth in Caig, who, according to the book entries, was equitably entitled to three-sixths; so that although Edwin Gairdner had a legal power to sell and transfer James Gairdner's two-sixths, yet he was bound in equity to transfer them to Caig.

The complainants in their bill claim the whole. They state that Edwin Gairdner was the real bona fide owner of the property; that the book entries were made only to give a credit to the Savannah house, and were without consideration; that the Savannah house was only to hold it in trust for Edwin Gairdner during the copartnership. That Edwin Gairdner became bankrupt on the 3d of November, 1802, has received his certificate of discharge, *and that two of the complainants, [37 Blacklock and Verrees, were duly appointed his assignees. That Caig and Mitchel, and the firm in which they are partners, are still largely indebted to Edwin Gairdner, who is also very largely indebted to the complainants. And they pray that all conveyances, under which Caig and Mitchel claim to hold possession of the property, may be declared void and may be cancelled; that the property may be sold and the proceeds applied towards payment of the debts due to the complainants; and for general relief.

The answers of Caig and Mitchell, the defendants, do not admit that anything was due by E. Gairdner to the complainants on the 1st of December, 1801, the date of the mortgage, and suggest that if anything was due it has since been paid off or otherwise settled. That Caig was made a party to the bond and mortgage without his authority and consent. That the bond and mortgage were carefully kept secret until the 13th of September, 1802. That it was not a regular transaction and ought not to avail against the defendants, who are bona fide purchasers.

They set forth the several copartnerships and entries in the books and aver that they and all the parties considered them as good transfers of the property which was always holden and considered as stock in trade. They deny all private, secret, or confidential trust for the benefit of E. Gairdner. They aver, that they believe, that at the date of the mortgage the Charleston house was indebted to the Savannah house, after allowing credit for the property in question.

In this state of the cause, the defendants, Caig and Mitchel, filed a cross bill against the complainants, Shirras and others, alleging secret transactions between them and E. Gairdner, and praying a discovery. They charge that the execution of the bond and mortgage was an act of hurry and despair, in the confusion and embarrassment of entangled circumstances, and at the eve of one of the greatest and most distressing bankruptcies. That the deeds were not signed until some weeks or months after their date. That no title papers were shown to the mortgagees (they being all in the hands *of Caig at Savannah), nor [38 any authority from Caig to convey his interest. That the mortgage was taken without reflection or previous contemplation as to the security intended to be given, but as the last hope of saving or securing something from a person on the eve of insolvency. That the bond and mortgage were not executed for advances made, or money lent on the security, or hope of security arising from the mortgage, but with the intent to indemnify the mortgagees for indorsements at the banks in South Carolina for E. Gairdner, and for other collateral securities entered into for him; all which were settled and discharged by the exertions of E. Gairdner, and the resources he was then enabled to bring into activity. That there is no money due on the bond, or on the consideration for which the bond was given. That all the obligees have been fully paid, satisfied and indemnified, without having recourse to the mortgaged premises, and that the mortgage is kept up for speculating purposes, and to oppress Caig and Mitchel, or to cover some transaction between E. Gairdner and one of the obligees, subsequent to the execution of the mortgage and which has no relation to the same. That the mortgage was concealed from Caig and Mitchel for fear of injuring E. Gardner's credit, and was not delivered to the mortgagees till some time before it was recorded; and was not recorded until Caig and Mitchel had paid a valuable consideration for two-thirds of the property and were in the quiet possession thereof, with the knowledge of the mortgagees. They claim title to two-thirds of the property under the various book entries of the several firms.

The bill then seeks a discovery of the day and consideration on which the bond and mortgage were really executed; and whether the mortgagees had not notice of the claim of Caig and Mitchel. Whether the mortgagees gave notice of the mortgage to them, and requires Shirras and others to disclose the real debts, together with the particulars thereof, actually due from E. Gairdner to each of them, at the date of the mortgage. It prays that the mortgage may be decreed to be fraudulent and void as to Caig and Mitchel, and for general relief.

The separate answers of the several defendants, Shirras and others, to the cross bill, set 39] forth minutely *their several claims against E. Gairdner, and aver that the moneys loaned and responsibilities incurred were upon the faith of the mortgage; except Wm. Blacklock, who did not know that he was included in the mortgage till some time after its date. Black in his answer produces on oath the plat referred to in the mortgage, which he says had remained with him ever since the execution of the mortgage.

They all admit that Caig and Mitchel were not notified of the mortgage, and that they knew of no authority from Caig to E. Gairdner to incumber his share of the property. They admit they did not see any title papers, and that they did not require them, having a perfect confidence in the representations and character of Edwin Gairdner. They deny that they had any knowledge of any transfer to Caig and Mitchel, except that E. Gairdner stated that Caig held one-sixth. They admit that the mortgage was kept secret until the 10th September, 1802, lest it should injure the credit of the mortgageors. They aver that it was executed on the day of its date or within a very few days afterwards, and was not retained by E. Gairdner, but immediately delivered to the defendant, Black. The testimony in the cause related merely to the authentication of the instruments; and the entries upon the books, and to the balance of the accounts between the Charleston and the Savannah house, and tending to prove that the Savannah house was considerably indebted to the Charleston house at the date of the mortgage.

In May, 1807, the Circuit Court, consisting of Judges Johnson and Stevens, gave the following opinion:

"In the great confusion of legal and equitable interests which exist in this case, the mind can resort to no other means of making a just discrimination but that of recurring to the original state of the interests of the several parties and following their respective portions through the several changes of property which resulted from subsequent transactions.

"By the conveyance from Levi Sheftall to James Gairdner, Edwin Gairdner and Robert Mitchel, each acquired a fee-simple in one-third of the property in question.

"*In legal language they were each [40 seized per my and per tout of a third part in joint tenancy. The third part of James Gairdner never was legally conveyed, until the deed of July, 1802, by Edwin, attorney for James Gairdner, conveying it to Robert Mitchel. With regard, therefore, to that third, and the one sixth conveyed by Mitchel and Caig, making up a moiety of the whole, there can be no doubt that the complainants are not entitled to recover. Both law and equity are on the side of the defendants. The only difficulties that exist arise in relation to the one-sixth conveyed by Mitchel to Edwin Gairdner and by him conveyed to Caig, and the remaining third originally vested in Edwin Gardiner.

"With regard to these propositions the complainants are in possession of the legal right, and the question is, how far are the defendants relieved in equity?

"It is contended that this court ought not to aid the complainants, on several grounds.

"1. Because this property ought to be considered as a part of the copartnership funds of the first firm of Gairdner, Caig & Mitchel, and of E. Gairdner & Co., and neither copartner is at liberty to alienate his share until the debts of those concerns are discharged, and their balances adjusted.

"2. Because the amounts claimed by the several mortgagees were for loans and assumptions not existing at the time of the mortgage, but incurred afterwards, with a small exception.

"3. Because by the articles of copartnership, the property is legally pledged to the last concern of Gairdner, Caig & Mitchel, and this instrument, as well as the conveyance of one-sixth to Caig from E. Gairdner, are entitled to a preference to the mortgage, in consequence of the mortgagee's having neglected to record their mortgage, and thereby to put others on their guard.

"On the first of these grounds we remark, there are many cases in which real property may be pursued as part of a copartnership stock, but it is only in the hands of legal representatives in cases of descent, bankruptcy, *&c., but not where a legal alienation has [41 been made, or the property is unaffected by articles of copartnership.

"With regard to the 2d and 3d grounds, we think them of much importance. This court will certainly support a mortgage when there exists no actual debt, if the mortgagee is under any liability or engagement which may ultimately subject him to loss, or the payment of money for the mortgageor; such, for instance, as the indorsement of notes the renewal of notes originally indorsed, or an arbitration or administration bond, or other undertaking from which a debt only may be incurred. But it is evident that some bounds ought to be set to this mode of mortgaging on contingencies, especially when the mortgagee retains an absolute unrestrained option, whether the mortgageor shall or shall not be his debtor; when he is under no legal or moral obligation to make loans or assume a liability in his behalf. But as we do not mean to found our decree in this case on this ground, we shall not now attempt to draw the line. The subject is a very delicate one.

"On the 3d ground the court feel themselves compelled to decree in favor of the defendants.

"The complainants, by not making known to the world the existence of this mortgage, have lost their right to the aid of this court in obtaining a foreclosure in their behalf. The defendant, Caig, ought not to lose the benefit of the conveyance of the one-sixth executed to him by Gairdner. He was legally proprietor of the one-sixth, and, by book entries, equitably, of another sixth.

"We consider the acknowledgment of interest in him by Gairdner upon the face of the mortgage as sufficient notice, to complainants, of his interest both legal and equitable. This alone would be sufficient to entitle him to the favor of this court, independently of his having become purchaser afterwards of the legal title without notice of the mortgage. With regard to the remaining third, we consider the articles of copartnership, accompanied with the payment of the consideration, as a covenant to stand seized to the use of the firm, and entitled to a precedence to the mortgage because of the latter's not having been recorded.

42*] *"The copartners, therefore, will be entitled to a preference as to Gairdner's third, both as to payment of creditors of the last house of G. C. & M., and for the satisfaction of any demand which the copartnership may have upon him. Subject to their claims the complainants will be entitled to relief."

In May, 1808, the Circuit Court made the following final decree:

"The court, referring to the interlocutory decree of May term, 1807, order, adjudge and decree, that the bill be dismissed with costs as against the defendants, John Caig and Robert Mitchel, as to the two-third parts of the mortgaged premises; and that the bill be sustained as to one-third of the mortgaged premises, reserving a preference on the said third part of the premises, both as to the payment of the creditors of the late house of Gairdner, Caig & Mitchel, and for the satisfaction of any demand which the copartnership may have upon him, said Gairdner."

To reverse this decree, the present writ of error was sued out by Shirras and others.

C. Lee, for plaintiffs in error.[1]

The mortgage ought to avail the mortgagees to the extent of the power and interest of the mortgageor.

Edwin Gairdner had the legal estate of three-sixths in himself, and had full power and authority from James Gairdner to dispose of, sell and convey the two-sixths, whereof the legal estate remained in him. So that Edwin Gairdner's power and interest extended to five-sixths. It is true he omitted to refer to his power of attorney in making the mortgage; but this defect may *be supplied in a court [43 of equity. (10 Mod., 36, Sir Edward Cleer's case, cited by Ch. J. Parker; 6 Co., 17 [b] S. C.; 3 Levinz., 372; 2 P. Will., 490; Tollet v. Tollet, 2 P. Will., 623; 1 Ca. in Chancery, 263; Smith v. Ashton, 1 Br. C. C. 368; Wade v. Paget, 2 P. Will., 222; Coventry v. Coventry, 1 Str., 596, 604, S. C. 4, Br. C. C., 462; Jackson v. Jackson, Ambler, 640, 684; Hob., 165, 4 Vez., Jun., 631; 7 Vez., 567; 10 Vez., 246; 6 East., 105; Carth., 427.)

There was no obligation upon the mortgagees to prove or record the deed sooner than they did. The law allows twelve months. Neither of the deeds was recorded within ten days after its date, and therefore neither can claim a preference under that law.

It is no objection that the mortgage was made to indemnify against future indorsements. (3 Cranch, 73, U. S. v. Hooe.)

If the power from James had been given to a third person, he would have conveyed to Edwin, but the power being to Edwin, he could not convey to himself, and the law will consider the equitable title, united with the power, as a legal conveyance to him.

The creditors of Edwin, who are the mortgagees, are superior in equity to Caig or Mitchel, who never paid anything for the property, and who are indebted to Edwin at this time; and who, if so indebted, would, if necessary, be decreed, in equity, trustees for the mortgagees, rather than they should lose their debts.

The entries on the books conveyed no legal title to the property; but if it is to be considered as stock in trade and therefore liable to be transferred by book entry, E. Gairdner, being a partner, had a right to sell and dispose of the whole partnership effects.

Harper, contra.

It is admitted that the mortgage transferred all the legal and equitable estate of Edwin Gairdner, but not of James Gairdner. If an attorney means to convey the rights of his constituent, he must speak in the name of *his principal; Edwin had only one- [44 half; the other half belonged to Caig and Mitchel.

The plat not having been recorded with the deed, the description of the property is imperfect; it can convey at most, only Gairdner's wharf, and not the lot which lies at a distance on the other side of the street.

The articles of copartnership between E. Gairdner, Caig and Mitchel, being under seal, operate as a conveyance by way of covenant to stand seized. Each party covenants to stand seized to the use of the firm.

The complainants admit that they concealed the mortgage, and held it up, to prevent injury to the credit of Edwin Gairdner, and they contend they had a right so to do.

Although they may have such a right at law, yet they have not in equity. Where the mortgagee does anything to induce a belief that the mortgageor has still a right to encumber the property—such as suffering him to retain the title papers whereby he gains a false credit—the first mortgagee shall be postponed to the second, who is deceived thereby. So in this case the deeds to Caig and Mitchel are to be preferred to the mortgage which was thus concealed. (1 Fonb., 153.)

Besides, the mortgage untruly recites the whole transaction. The bond was altogether fictitious.

It was calculated to impose upon the world. The mortgage was in truth made only to cover future contingent responsibilities.

This property is to be considered as part of the joint funds of Gairdner, Caig & Mitchel, and liable in the first place to the debts of that firm. The separate creditors of Edwin Gairdner can only claim his share after payment of all the joint debts.

P. B. Key, in reply.

It cannot be denied that, at the date of the mortgage, Edwin Gairdner had a legal estate in one-half of the mortgaged premises.

45*] *The mortgage, therefore, to that extent, is good, unless it wants some formality, or unless the defendants have a prior title at law, or some prior equity of which the complainants had notice previously to the mortgage.

No want of formality, nor prior legal estate are suggested; nor can it be contended that Mitchel or Caig had any prior equity as to one-half the property. Mitchel in his answer expressly disclaims any interest prior to the mortgage.

It is indeed suggested that this real estate is to be considered as part of the joint stock in trade of the firm of Edwin Gairdner & Co., of Savannah, consisting of E. Gairdner and John Caig; and one partner cannot dispose of any part of the joint funds to his own use without the consent of the other partner.

But neither at law nor in equity will real estate be considered as stock in trade, so as to alter the nature of the estate, unless there be some express agreement for that purpose. (3 Br., C. C., 199, 200, Thornton v. Dixon.) In the present case there were no articles of copartnership prior to the mortgage, nor any agreement that the real estate should be converted into stock in trade. (5 Vez., 189, Smith v. Smith.) In order to make partnership stock of real estate, it must be purchased with partnership funds, or there must be an agreement at the time of purchasing that it shall be used and invested as partnership stock.

But in the present case nothing was paid by the firm of E. Gairdner & Co., of Savannah, for this property, nor was there any agreement converting it into stock.

The firm of Gairdner, Caig & Mitchel was formed after the mortgage, and therefore whatever interest they took in this property was subject to the mortgage.

There can be no doubt that the mortgagees had a right, under such a mortgage, to recover in equity all advances made upon the credit of the mortgage subsequent to its date, and before notice of junior incumbrances; and recording the subsequent incumbrance is not of itself notice. (Powell on Mort., 229, 230, 285.)

46*] *As to the objection that one of the mortgagees was not a creditor at the date of the mortgage, and did not become a creditor upon the faith of the mortgage, it is laid down in Powell on Mort., 275, that if one purchase in the name of another without any authority to do so, yet if he afterwards agree to it, he makes the former his agent ab initio.

The complainants therefore, are entitled to a decree for a foreclosure of one-half of the property described in the mortgage, and for the recovery of all sums advanced on the faith of the mortgage before the mortgagees had notice of the second incumbrance.

Feb. 17. All the judges (except WASHINGTON, J.)[1] being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an appeal from a decree rendered by the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia.

Shirras and others, the appellants, brought their bill to foreclose the equity of redemption on two lots lying in the town of Savannah, alleged to have been mortgaged to them by Edwin Gairdner. The deed of mortgage is dated the first of December, 1801, and purports to be a conveyance from Edwin Gairdner and John Caig, by Edwin Gairdner his attorney in fact. Edwin Gairdner not appearing to have possessed any power to act for John Caig, the conveyance, as to him, is void, and could only pass that interest which was possessed by Gairdner himself. The court will proceed to inquire what that interest was.

It appears that, on the 17th May, 1796, the premises were conveyed to James Gairdner, Edwin Gairdner and Robert Mitchel, merchants and copartners of the city of Savannah.

In 1799, this partnership was dissolved; and, in December in the same year, James Gairdner made an entry *on the books of the com- [47 pany charging this property to Edwin Gairdner & Co., of Charleston, at the price of 20,000 dollars. This firm consisted of Edwin Gairdner alone. James Gairdner also executed a power of attorney authorizing Edwin Gairdner to sell and convey his interest in this and other real property.

In March, 1801, a partnership was formed between Edwin Gairdner and John Caig to carry on trade in Savannah, under the firm of Edwin Gairdner & Co.; and in the same month, Robert Mitchel conveyed his one-third of the lots in question to Edwin Gairdner and John Caig.

About the same time it was agreed between the house at Charleston and that in Savannah to transfer the Savannah property to the firm trading at that place; and entries to that effect were made in the books of both companies; and possession was delivered to Edwin Gairdner & Co., of Savannah.

Such was the state of title in December, 1801, when the deed of mortgage bears date.

The plaintiffs claim the whole property, or, if not the whole, five-sixths; because they suppose Edwin Gairdner to have been equitably entitled to his own third, to that of James Gairdner, and to half of the third of Robert Mitchel. But for this claim the court is of opinion that there can be no just pretension, because he did not affect to convey by virtue of the power from James Gairdner; he did not affect to pass the interest of James Gairdner, but to pass the estate of John Caig and himself. Consequently the power of attorney may be put out of the case, and the conveyance could only operate on his own legal or equitable interest.

1.—JUDGE WASHINGTON was prevented by indisposition from attending on the 13th, 14th, 15th, 17th and 18th of February.

In law, he was seized under the original deed, and the deed from Robert Mitchel of one undivided moiety of the property.

Under the various agreements and entries on the books of the firms at Charleston and Savannah which have been stated, his equitable interest was precisely equal to his legal interest.

48*] In the law and equity he held one *moiety of the premises in question. The other moiety was in John Caig. To one-sixth Caig was legally entitled by the conveyance from Robert Mitchel, and to two-sixths he was equitably entitled by the agreement with Edwin Gairdner and the consequent entries on the books.

Of the equitable interest of John Caig the mortgagees were bound to take notice, because the purchaser of an equitable interest, purchases at his peril, and acquires the property burdened with every prior equity charged upon it, because the deed itself gives notice of Caig's title, and because Caig was in possession of the property.

The mortgage deed of December, 1801, could not, then, in law or equity, pass more than one moiety of the property it mentions.

A question arises on the face of the deed respecting the extent of the property comprehended in it. The plaintiff's contend that both lots are within the description; the defendants that only the wharf lot is conveyed.

The property conveyed is thus described: "All that lot of land, houses and wharfs in the "city of Savannah as is particularly described "by the annexed plat, and is generally known "by the name of Gairdner's Wharf."

The plat was not annexed, nor was it recorded with the deed. It is, however, filed as an exhibit in the cause, and appears to be a plat of part of the town of Savannah, including the lot on which Gairdner's Wharf was, and also one other lot belonging to the same persons, which was designated as No. 6, and which does not adjoin the property on which the wharves are erected.

The words descriptive of the property intended to be conveyed do not appear to the court to be applicable to more than the wharf lot. The word "lot" is in the singular number; the term "houses" is satisfied by the fact that there are houses on the wharf lot; and there is no evidence in the cause, nor any reason to believe that lot No. 6 was "generally known by the "name of Gairdner's Wharf." The court, therefore, cannot consider that lot as comprehended within the conveyance.

49*] *The mortgaged property is in possession of the defendants, Caig and Mitchel, who derive their title thereto in the following manner:

On the 7th of January, 1802, a new partnership was formed between Gairdner, Caig and Mitchel, and, by the articles of copartnery, which are under seal, the Savannah property is declared to be stock in trade, and an entry was made on the books of the old firm transferring this property to the new concern. On the 12th of the same month, the copartnership of Gairdner & Caig was dissolved.

On the 27th of July, 1802, by deeds properly executed, one-third of the property became vested in John Caig, and one other third in Robert Mitchel.

On the 3d of November, 1802, Edwin Gairdner became a bankrupt; and this bill is brought by his mortgagees and assignees.

The claim to foreclose is resisted by Caig and Mitchel, because, they say:

1st. The mortgage was not executed at the time it bears date, but long afterwards, and on the eve of bankruptcy.

2d. That the transaction is not bona fide, there being no real debt, nor any money actually advanced by the mortgagees.

3d. That the mortgage was kept secret, instead of being committed to record.

4th. That the whole transaction is totally variant from that stated in the deed.

They therefore claim the property for the creditors of Gairdner, Caig & Mitchel.

1st. From the testimony in the cause it appears that the deed, if not executed on the day, was executed about the day of its date; and that Gairdner, at the time, was believed to be solvent.

*2d. It appears, also, that the mortgage [50 was executed, in part, to secure the payment of money actually due at the time, and, in part, to secure sums to be advanced, and to indemnify some of the mortgagees for liabilities to be incurred.

3d. The mortgage is dated the 1st of December, 1801, and was recorded in September, 1802.

By the laws of Georgia, a deed is valid if recorded within twelve months; but any deed recorded within ten days after its execution takes preference of deeds not recorded within that time, or previously, on the record.

It appears to the court, that neither negligence nor that fraud which is inferred from the mere fact of omitting to place a deed on record, can, with propriety, be imputed to the person who has used all the dispatch which the law requires. If subsequent purchasers, without notice, sustain an injury within the time allowed for recording a deed, the injury is to be ascribed to the law, not to the individual who has complied with its requisition.

In this case the subsequent purchasers might have proceeded to record their deeds within ten days and have thereby obtained the preference they claim, but they have failed to do so. They are themselves chargeable with the very negligence which they ascribe to their adversaries; and, were they to be preferred, the court would invert the well-established rule of law, and postpone, under similar circumstances, a prior to a subsequent deed.

4th. It is true that the real transaction does not appear on the face of the mortgage. The deed purports to secure a debt of 30,000*l.* sterling due to all the mortgagees. It was really intended to secure different sums, due at the time from particular mortgagees, advances afterwards to be made, and liabilities to be incurred to an uncertain amount.

It is not to be denied that a deed, which misrepresents the transaction it recites, and the consideration on which it is executed, is liable to suspicion. It must sustain a *rigorous [51 examination. It is, certainly, always advisable fairly and plainly to state the truth.

But if, upon investigation, the real transaction shall appear to be fair, though somewhat variant from that which is described, it would seem to be unjust and unprecedented to deprive the person claiming under the deed, of his real equitable rights, unless it be in favor of a person who has been, in fact, injured and deceived by the misrepresentation.

That cannot have happened in the present case.

There is the less reason for imputing blame to the mortgagees, in this case, because the deed was prepared by the mortgageor himself, and executed without being inspected by them, so far as appears in the case.

It is, then, the opinion of the court that the plaintiffs, Shirras and others, have a just title, under their mortgage deed, to subject one moiety of the lot, or parcel of ground, commonly known by the name Gairdner's Wharf, to the payment of the debts still remaining due to them, which were either due at the date of the mortgage, or were afterwards contracted upon its faith, either by advances actually made or incurred prior to the receipt of actual notice of the subsequent title of the defendants, Caig and Mitchel; and that the decree of the Circuit Court of Georgia, so far as it is inconsistent with this opinion, ought to be reversed.

The following is the decree of this court:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is the opinion of this court, that the deed of mortgage in the proceedings mentioned, and dated on the 1st of December, 1801, is, in law, a valid conveyance of one moiety of that lot of land, houses and wharves in the City of Savannah, which was generally known by the name of Gairdner's Wharf, being the parcel of ground lying between the river and the street, and that the mortgagees in the said deed mentioned are entitled to foreclose the equity of redemption in the said mortgaged property, and to obtain 52] a sale *thereof, and to apply the proceeds of the said sale to the payment of what remains unsatisfied of their respective debts, which were either due at the date of the mortgage or have been since contracted, either on account of moneys advanced or liabilities incurred prior to their receiving actual notice of the title of the defendants, John Caig and Robert Mitchel. And the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia, so far as it is inconsistent with this opinion, is reversed and annulled, and in all others things is affirmed; and the cause is remanded to the said Circuit Court for the District of Georgia, that further proceedings may be had therein according to equity.

SCHOONER PAULINA'S CARGO
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—WASHINGTON, Justice.

The 3d section of the act of Congress of the 9th of January, 1808, which prohibited the transhipment of goods from one vessel to another, did not include the case of a vessel lading in port by means of river craft, &c.

The 2d section of the act of Congress of the 25th of April, 1808, did not require a permit to lade any vessel, nor authorize the forfeiture and condemnation of the vessel or cargo for lading without the inspection of a revenue officer; the only penalty for such lading being the denial of a clearance.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island.

The schooner Paulina and cargo were seized and libeled by the collector of the port of Newport, alleging that the cargo was laden on board, within the district of Newport, between the 1st of June and the last of July in the year 1808, in the night season, without a permit from the collector, and without the inspection of the proper revenue officers, and contrary to the 2d section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled an act "laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in "the ports and harbors of the United States, "and the several acts supplementary thereto, "and for other purposes," passed the 25th of April, 1808; and contrary to the 50th section of the act to regulate the collection of duties, &c., passed the 2d of March, 1799. In the District Court the vessel and cargo were both ordered to be restored.

Upon the appeal in the Circuit Court, the libellant had leave to amend his libel, by stating that on the waters *of Warwick Bay, in [53 the District of Rhode Island, at a place called the Fulling Mill in Warwick, and about 120 fathoms from the landing, at sundry times, between the 1st of June and the last of July, in the year 1808, the articles constituting the cargo of the Paulina, were transhipped from a small sloop called the May-flower into the schooner Paulina, without the intervention of any other water craft, or of any intermediate landing, with intent to be transported without the United States, contrary to the 3d section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled an act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," passed on the 9th of January, 1808, whereby the said cargo is forfeited, &c.

The words of the 2d section of the act of 25th of April, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 146), are, "That "during the continuance of the act laying an "embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and "harbors of the United States, and of the sev- "eral acts supplementary thereto, no ship or "vessel of any description whatever, other than "those described in the next preceding section, "and wherever bound, shall receive a clearance, "unless the lading shall be made hereafter un- "der the inspection of the proper revenue of- "ficers, subject to the same restrictions, regu- "lations, penalties and forfeitures as are pro- "vided by law for the inspection of goods, "wares and merchandise imported into the "United States, upon which duties are imposed, "any law to the contrary notwithstanding."

By the 50th section of the act of 2d of March, 1799, (vol. 4, p. 360), to regulate the collection of duties, &c., it is enacted "that no goods, "wares or merchandise, brought in any ship "or vessel from any foreign port or place, "shall be unladen or delivered from such ship "or vessel within the United States, but in

"open day, that is to say, between the rising "and the setting of the sun, except by special "license from the collector of the port, and "naval officer of the same (where there is one), "for that purpose, nor at any time without a "permit from the collector, and naval officer "(if any), for such unlading or delivery; and if "any goods, wares or merchandise shall be un-"laden or delivered from any such ship or "vessel, contrary to the directions aforesaid, "or any of them, the master," &c., "shall 54] "*forfeit and pay, each and severally, "the sum of 400 dollars for each offense, and "shall be disabled from holding any office of "trust or profit for a term not exceeding seven "years," "and all goods, wares or merchandise, "so unladen or delivered, shall become for-"feited, and may be seized by any of the of-"ficers of the customs;" and if the value shall exceed 400 dollars, the vessel, &c., shall be subject to like forfeiture and seizure.

By the 3d section of the act of the 9th of January, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 11), it is enacted, "That if any ship or vessel shall, during the "continuance of the act to which this is sup-"plement, depart from any port of the United "States without a clearance or permit, or if "any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the pro-"visions of this act or of the act to which this "is a supplement, proceed to a foreign port or "place, or trade with or put on board of any "other ship or vessel, any goods, wares or "merchandise, of foreign or domestic growth "or manufacture, such ships or vessels, goods, "wares and merchandise, shall be wholly for-"feited;" "and the master or commander of "such ship or vessel, as well as all other per-"sons who shall knowingly be concerned in "such prohibited foreign voyage, shall each "respectively forfeit and pay a sum not ex-"ceeding 20,000 dollars," &c.

The Circuit Court affirmed the sentence of the District Court so far as it decreed the restitution of the vessel, but reversed it so far as it decreed restitution of the cargo, which the Circuit Court condemned.

To reverse this sentence of condemnation the present writ of error was sued out by Simeon Jones, the owner and claimant of the vessel and cargo.

On the 20th of February, 1810, a dedimus was issued from the Supreme Court to take depositions in Rhode Island, which was executed and returned on the 14th of March.

The material facts appearing upon these depositions were that the former owners of the Paulina, being prevented by the embargo from 55] using their vessel, in order *to save expense, took her into Warwick Bay, which was near the residence of one of the owners. Shortly afterwards they sold her to the present claimant, Jones, who caused her to be publicly, and in open day, laden by means of the sloop May-flower, which was a little vessel of 15 tons burthen, whose usual business it was to carry goods from Providence to Warwick and East Greenwich. That he thus caused her to be laden in the expectation that the embargo would be very shortly taken off. There was also some evidence tending to excite suspicion that the intention was to evade the embargo.

Pitkin, for the plaintiff in error.

Neither this vessel nor cargo were liable to forfeiture under either of the laws mentioned in the libel.

1. As to the 2d section of the act of the 25th of April, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 146), it has been uniformerly decided in all the circuit courts, that this section does not impose a forfeiture of either the vessel or cargo. In the present case Judge Cushing condemned the cargo, not under this section, but under the 3d section of the act of the 9th of January, 1808, which prohibits the transhipment. The only penalty for lading the vessel without the inspection of a revenue officer is the refusal of a clearance. The 2d section of the act of the 25th of April does not refer to the 50th section of the collection law, but to the 53d, 54th and 55th sections, which apply to the duties of inspectors, and provide for their due execution by penalties, but they contain no regulation whereby either the vessel or cargo can be forfeited. The construction contended for by the government is contrary to the spirit of the embargo system. Nothing had been before said respecting the lading of a vessel. She might lade as she pleased, and might go to sea upon giving bond, &c. This act is the first which regulates the lading.

The object of the embargo was to prevent foreign voyages. The provision that the lading should be under the inspection of a revenue officer was intended to enable the collector to judge from the nature of the cargo whether it was intended for a foreign voyage; and if he *should be of that opinion, he was, by [56 the same law, authorized to detain the vessel until the pleasure of the President should be known. The object of the legislature was completely answered by denying a clearance, and thereby preventing the vessel from going to sea, in case she had taken in her ladiug without the inspection of a revenue officer. It was not intended to prevent the owner from using his vessel as a store-house without a permit, or from putting goods on board without the inspection of an officer.

That this was the understanding of the legislature upon the subject is evident from the act of the 9th of January, 1809, usually called the enforcing act, the second section of which (vol. 9, p. 186) requires a permit, and prohibits the lading of any vessel without one, and without the inspection of a revenue officer, all which would have been necessary if the law was the same before.

2. As to the 3d section of the act of the 9th of January, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 11), the supposed violation of which is, by the amendment of the libel, made a ground for the claim of condemnation of the cargo, it does not apply to a lading or transhipment in port.

The objects of this law were three:

1. To prevent a vessel from departing without a clearance.

2. To prevent her, after having obtained a clearance, from going to a foreign port; and,

3. To prevent her, after clearance, from taking in goods at sea.

It does not contemplate an act done in port. The expressiou "such prohibited foreign voyage," shows that the legislature were contemplating foreign voyages only, and not merely the lading of a vessel in port. There were many ports in which a vessel could not be laden but by the intervention of lighters. It cannot be supposed that the legislature meant to prohibit all lading at those ports. The act of 25th of April has an express exception in favor of all vessels then 57] laden, without regard *to the manner of their lading; so also has the act of the 9th of January, 1809.

Dallas, Attorney of the United States for the District of Pennsylvania, contra.

Penal laws are to be construed according to their plain intent. No construction ought to be given which would defeat the object of the law.

1. As to the claim of forfeiture under the 2d section of the act of the 25th of April, 1808, and the 50th section of the collection law.

Let us consider what was the previous law, the mischief intended to be remedied, and the remedy intended to be applied.

1. As to the previous law. The first embargo law, of the 22d of December, 1807, (vol. 9, p. 7), required bonds from registered and sea-letter vessels only, conditioned to reland their cargoes in the United States.

The second embargo law, of January 9th, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 10), required vessels, licensed for the coasting trade, to give a similar bond; and those licensed for the fisheries, or whose employment had been uniformly confined to rivers, bays, and sounds, were to give a general bond. It also forfeited the vessel and cargo if she departed without a clearance or permit, or proceeded to a foreign place, or traded with, or put goods on board any other vessel, or if (being a foreign ship) she took in a cargo.

2. The mischief intended to be remedied, was, that there was no provision for compelling vessels which were confined to bays, &c., to take a clearance, and give a manifest of their cargoes, and to produce a certificate of relanding them in the United States. Nor any provision for inspecting the lading of vessels.

3. The remedy provided by the legislature was, to prohibit all bay craft, &c., from departing from a district without having obtained a 58] clearance, and delivering *a manifest of their cargoes; and to require a certificate of the relanding of the cargo within the bay, &c.

And to prohibit all other vessels from receiving a clearance, unless the lading should be made under the inspection of the proper revenue officers, subject to the same restrictions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures, as are provided by law for the inspection of goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States, upon which duties are imposed.

We are thus referred expressly, in a case of lading for exportation, to the rule of a case of importing to unlade.

There is no case of inspection of lading, but for the benefit of drawback, which is a case of *ex*portation and not *im*portation, and is therefore out of the reference, The penalties and forfeitures apply to a relanding, or to not producing a certificate of relanding, and not to the lading.

We are therefore to adopt the restrictions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures of the import law, mutatis mutandis.

Under that law, goods must be unladen in the day-time.

Under this, they must be laden in the day-time.

Under that, there must be a permit to *un*lade.

Under this, there must be a permit to lade.

Under that, the *un*lading must be under the inspection of a revenue officer.

Under this, the lading must be under the like inspection.

Under that, goods *un*laden without permit are forfeited.

Under this, they are forfeited if laden without permit.

*If the legislature meant this, it is well; [59 if they did not, there is no meaning in the sentence; nothing upon which the reference can operate. That this is the true construction of the act appears from the provisions made by the legislature in pari materia in the act of the 9th of January, 1809, (vol. 9, p. 186), where the same ideas are expressed in different language.

2. As to the claim of forfeiture under the 3d section of the act of January 9th, 1808. (Vol. 9, p. 10.)

1. What was the previous law? 1. An embargo had been laid on all American vessels, but no penalty was inflicted. 2. Foreign vessels might sail in ballast and with the goods then on board. 3. Bonds were to be given by registered and sea-letter vessels only, not to violate the embargo.

2. What was the mischief to be remedied? 1. American vessels might slip away without clearance or permit. 2. Registered and sea-letter and licensed vessels might go to foreign places. 3. Or might trade. Or, 4. Might put goods on board another vessel.

3. What was the remedy provided? 1. That licensed and fishing vessels should give bond. 2. That no vessel should sail without a clearance or permit. 3. That no vessel should proceed to a foreign place. 4. That no ship should trade with another; and 5. That no vessel should tranship goods, under the penalty of the forfeiture of the goods.

The fact is not denied that the Paulina took in her lading without a permit, and without the inspection of a revenue officer, and that it was transhipped from the May-flower.

She is then within the letter of the law, and we say she was also within the spirit and meaning.

The circumstances also show that the intention was to violate the embargo; and the provisions of the law were intended to punish that intention when it should be manifested by certain acts.

Pitkin*, in reply. [*60

The words of the 2d section of the act of the 25th of April are "subject to the same restrictions, &c., as are provided by law for the inspection of goods imported." If we are to be guided by the grammatical construction of the sentence, the revenue officers, being the last antecedent, are to be subject to the same restrictions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures, &c. But if the lading is to be subject to the restrictions, &c., it is only to be subject to the restrictions, &c., respecting the inspection of goods imported. We are not referred to the law respecting the necessity of a permit. And there was no reason for a permit to lade. The permit was evidence that the duties had been paid or secured, upon goods imported. But as there were no duties to be paid upon goods exported, no such evidence was required, and a permit would have been useless.

February 21st. All the Judges being present, MARSHALL, Chief Justice, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The libel in this case, as amended in the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, claims the schooner Paulina and her cargo as forfeit under the 3d section of the act supplementary to the act laying an embargo, and under the 2d section of the act in addition to the original embargo act and its several supplements, and under the 50th section of the act regulating the collection of duties on imposts and tonnage.

In the District Court both vessel and cargo were acquitted; but in the Circuit Court the cargo was condemned.

In construing these laws, it has been truly stated to be the duty of the court to effect the intention of the legislature; but this intention is to be searched for in the words which the legislature has employed to convey it. The legislature has declared its object to be to lay an embargo on the vessels of the United States, and to prevent the transportation of any article whatever from the United States to any foreign 61*] port or *place; and therefore such transportation is prohibited. To prevent evasions of this law, certain acts which do not in themselves amount to a breach of the embargo, but which may lead to it, have been successively prohibited under such penalties as the wisdom of Congress has prescribed. Those acts become criminal and subject the person to such punishment as the law inflicts. In ascertaining what they are, the court must search for the intent of the legislature, guided by those rules which the wisdom of ages has sanctioned.

But should this court conjecture that some other act, not expressly forbidden, and which is in itself the mere exercise of that power over property which all men possess, might also be a preliminary step to a violation of the law, and ought therefore to be punished for the purpose of effecting the legislative intention, it would certainly transcend its own duties and powers, and would create a rule instead of applying one already made. It is the province of the legislature to declare, in explicit terms, how far the citizen shall be restrained in the exercise of that power over property which ownership gives; and it is the province of the court to apply the rule to the case thus explicitly described, not to some other case which judges may conjecture to be equally dangerous.

The fact made out in the present case is this:

The Paulina, a registered vessel, lying in the common anchorage ground of Warwick Bay, in the District of Rhode Island, about two hundred fathoms from the shore, received her cargo from the May-flower, a small vessel of fifteen tons burthen, accustomed to ply between Providence and Newport. The lading of the Paulina was continued in open day for several weeks, but not under the inspection of a revenue officer. When her cargo was nearly on board, she was seized and libeled as having violated the acts of Congress which have been mentioned.

The question will, it is conceived, be the more clearly understood if we consider the laws in the order in which they were passed, and inquire, first, whether the 3d section of the supplementary act has been violated. *In [62 pursuing this inquiry, it is essential to examine how far lading a vessel under the circumstances of the Paulina was prohibited by the original and supplementary acts without taking into view any subsequent act of Congress.

The original act, passed on the 22d of December, 1807, lays an embargo on all vessels bound to foreign ports, and directs that no clearance be furnished to such vessel. The 2d section directs that before a registered vessel shall receive a clearance for a port in the United States, a bond shall be given with a condition that the cargo shall be relanded in some port of the United States, dangers of the seas excepted.

This act contains no provision applicable to the lading of any vessel whatever, or to licensed vessels, nor does it inflict any forfeiture or penalty on vessels which should depart without a clearance.

The incompetency of this act to effect its object could not be long unobserved. It was soon perceived that foreign trade might be carried on by licensed vessels, and that further regulations respecting registered vessels would also be necessary.

On the 9th of January, 1808, the supplemental act was passed.

The first section directs that bonds shall be given on the part of vessels licensed for the coasting trade, conditioned not to proceed to any foreign port or place, and to reland the cargo in some port of the United States.

The second section contains a proviso declaring that it shall be sufficient for the owners of vessels of the description of the May-flower, to give bond with a condition not to be employed in any foreign trade.

This review of the prohibitions contained in the original and supplementary embargo acts, was necessary to a complete understanding of the 3d section of the supplemental act, which is the section supposed by the libellants to comprehend the present case.

*That section is in these words: [63

"And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel shall, during the continuance of the act to which this is a supplement, depart from any port of the United States without a clearance or permit, or if any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this act is a supplement, proceed to a foreign port or place, or trade with or put on board of any other ship or vessel any goods, wares or merchandise, of foreign or domestic growth or manufacture, such ships or vessels, goods, wares and merchandise, shall be wholly forfeited."

This section contemplates three distinct transactions:

1. A departure from any port of the United States without a clearance or permit.

2. Contrary to the provisions of the original or supplementary acts to proceed to a foreign port or place; or,

3. To trade with or put on board any other ship or vessel any goods, wares or merchandise.

The offense last described is supposed to have been committed by the Paulina.

Nothing can be more apparent than that the legislature could not have intended to prohibit any person from putting a cargo on board a vessel of any description.

1. The coasting trade was still lawful, and might be carried on by either registered or licensed vessels; consequently any vessel might be laden for that purpose.

2. There is no direct prohibition to lade a vessel with any articles whatever.

3. There are provisions in subsequent laws on the same subject which regulate the manner of lading vessels in order to entitle them to a clearance; which provisions are entirely incompatible with the idea that all lading was prohibited.

64*] *With a view to this principle the section must be construed.

The first inquiry which presents itself to the mind is this: Do the words "contrary to the provisions of this act or of the act to which this act is a supplement," limit and restrain both the succeeding members of the sentence, or only the first of them? Are they applicable only to "proceeding to a foreign port or place," or also to "trading with or putting on board any other ship or vessel any goods, wares or merchandise."

If the sentence be construed literally and grammatically, the introductory words which have been stated, are attached to all the offenses afterwards described. The departure without a clearance under any circumstances, is an offense. The circumstances of the departure do not affect the case. But to render the facts afterwards enumerated criminal, they must be committed under circumstances described in the law. "If any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this is a supplement, proceed to any foreign port or place, or trade with, or put on board of any other ship or vessel," &c., "such ships or vessels, goods, wares and merchandise, shall be wholly forfeited." The connection between the different parts of this sentence is inseparable. There is nothing to disjoin them. The nominative to the verbs, "proceed," "trade with," and "put on board," is the same. It is not repeated, but is to be found in the first part of the sentence, and must be taken in the same sense, and with the same qualifications. The relative "such," in that part of the sentence which inflicts the forfeiture, refers to the ship or vessel, which contrary to the provisions, &c., shall have done any one of the acts described.

If this be the literal construction of the sentence, it is still more apparently its real meaning.

If the words, "trade with, or put on board any other ship or vessel," be not limited by the words "contrary to the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this act is a supplement," they would not only prohibit a vessel from lading, but from unlading in a manner, which is frequent and perfectly innocent. There are 65] *many ports in the United States whose situation requires that a sea vessel should stop at a considerable distance from the place for which she is destined, and convey part of her cargo in lighters or river craft to the place of destination. Under such circumstances, to load or unload, would amount to a forfeiture. But such was not the intention of the legislature.

Most apparently, then, both the letter and the spirit of the law must be disregarded, or it must be admitted that the "trading with, or putting on board," that is rendered culpable, must be such a trading with, or putting on board, as is "contrary to the provisions" of the original or supplementary act.

The subsequent words of the section imposing a penalty of from one to twenty thousand dollars on the offense, tend still further to illustrate and confirm this construction. They are "the master or commander of such ship or vessel, as well as all other persons who shall knowingly be concerned in such prohibited foreign voyage, shall forfeit and pay," &c.

The master or commander of the "ship or vessel" described in this part of the sentence, would seem to be the master or commander of any ship or vessel which had committed any one of the offenses previously described. If this be true, it is difficult to resist the opinion that the words "as well as all other persons who shall knowingly be concerned in such prohibited foreign voyage" were considered by the legislature as applicable to all the voyages previously prohibited. Consequently the legislature, at the time, supposed themselves to be punishing foreign voyages only.

The Paulina having committed no offense by taking her cargo on board, unless she incurred the penalties of the law by receiving it from the May-flower, the sentence will now be examined with a view to this question. Is the employment in this way of a vessel whose business is confined to the rivers, bays and sounds within the jurisdiction of the United States, a forfeiture of the vessel and cargo?

*The bond given by such vessel is that [66 she will not be employed in any foreign trade.

This exemption from the necessity of relanding the cargo, proves the intention of the legislature that such craft might be employed in lading vessels. This employment is not contrary to the provisions of either the original or supplemental act.

If, then, the May-flower had transhipped her cargo in the port in which she was laden, it is apparent that no part of the law would have been violated.

The section under consideration inflicts forfeiture on any ship or vessel which shall depart from any port of the United States without a clearance or permit.

If by law this would produce a forfeiture of the cargo when on board the Paulina, it is to be inquired whether, under this libel, the fact of her having passed out of one port into another without a clearance or permit, is examinable.

The libel charges the simple fact of transhipment, without alleging the only circumstance which could render such transhipment criminal. The question, then, of a departure from the port of Providence into that of Newport is not brought before the court. It does indeed appear in the evidence that, in consequence of an opinion among the revenue officers, as well as others, a clearance in such a case was not requisite, the May-flower carried a considerable part of her cargo to the Paulina without having obtained permits. But the court cannot notice this fact unless the prosecution had, in some degree, been founded upon it.

It is, then, the opinion of the majority of the court that, as this case stands, the sentence cannot be sustained under the 3d section of the act of January, 1808. No opinion is given on the construction of that act in a case of transhipment from a vessel which has actually passed from one district to another without a clearance.

The libel also claims a forfeiture under the 67] 50th section *of the collection law, and under the 2d section of the act commonly called the additional act.

It has been very truly observed that the collection law is in itself totally inapplicable to the case, and can only be relied on for the purpose of explaining the 2d section of the additional act which refers to the collection law.

The operative words of the 2d section are: "No ship or vessel shall receive a clearance unless the lading shall be made hereafter under the inspection of the proper revenue officers subject to the same restrictions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures as are provided by law for the inspection of goods, wares and merchandise imported into the United States upon which duties are imposed."

Had the sentence terminated with the word "officers," it is admitted that its only operation would have been to exclude from a right to a clearance a vessel laden in a different manner from that which the act prescribes. The doubt grows out of the residue of the sentence.

This section does not, in terms, refer to the 50th section of the collection law. Whether, in strict grammatical construction, the adjective "subject" agree with and refers to the words "lading," "inspection," or "officers," still the "restrictions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures" which are inflicted, are those which are provided by law for the inspection of goods, not those which are provided by law for unlading them. The word inspection is the governing word which explains the meaning of the sentence; and the provisions for the inspection of goods contain restrictions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures; but they do not affect the cargo.

It is difficult to read the sentence without being impressed with the opinion that the sole penalty intended by the legislature was the denial of a clearance. This will strike any person as the principal object of the clause. What follows is expressed with some confusion and would not seem to constitute the most essential part of the sentence. It cannot be believed 68] that the legislature *could intend to inflict so heavy a forfeiture under such cloudy and ambiguous terms. The natural as well as usual course would be to inflict the forfeiture in direct and substantive terms, not by way of loose uncertain reference.

But if this section be construed as the libelants construe it, then, if the value of $400 be put on board a vessel, not only the goods so put on board, but the vessel itself shall be forfeited. For what purpose, then, direct that she shall not receive a clearance? The legislature can scarcely be suspected of making a solemn regulation which, in terms, forbids its officers to grant a clearance to a vessel, which vessel is, by the same sentence, confiscated.

It is the decided opinion of the court, that no forfeiture is incurred under this section of the act.

The majority of the court is of opinion that the sentence of the Circuit Court, condemning the cargo of the Paulina, is erroneous, and ought to be reversed.

The court certified that there was probable cause of seizure.

The Chief Justice observed that three of the judges who had heard the argument in the present case, and one who did not hear it, but who had heard the points argued in another case, concurred in this opinion, and that the other judges concurred in the result of the opinion.

JOHNSON, Justice, observed that he dissented from the opinion just delivered by the Chief Justice upon one ground only.

He was of opinion that the transhipment, if with intent to prosecute a foreign voyage, in violation of the embargo, subjected the goods to forfeiture. But as the evidence of that intent was doubtful, he was of opinion that the cargo should be acquitted; and two other judges concurred with him in opinion.

Sentence reversed.

*NATHANIEL RUSSELL [*69
v.
JOHN I. CLARK'S (a) EXECUTORS AND OTHERS.

Absent—WASHINGTON, Justice.

The construction of a letter of credit, or of guaranty, must be the same in a court of equity as in a court of law; and any facts which might be introduced into one court, to explain the transaction, may be introduced into the other. On the question of fraud also, the remedy at law is complete. Where the only ground of equitable jurisdiction is the discovery of facts solely within the knowledge of the defendant, and the defendant by his answer discloses no such facts, and the plaintiff supports his claim by evidence in his own possession unaided by the confessions of the defendant, the plaintiff should be dismissed from the Court of Chancery and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law. To charge one person with the debt of another, the undertaking must be clear and explicit. It is the duty of him who gives credit to another upon the responsibility or undertaking of a third person, immediately to give notice to the latter of the extent of his engagements. A fraudulent recommendation will subject the person giving it to the damages sustained by the person trusting to it. An answer, responsive to the bill, is evidence in favor of the defendant. A misrepresentation of the solidity of a mercantile house, made under a mistake of the fact, without any interest or fraudulent intention, will not sustain an action, although the plaintiff may have suffered damage by reason of such misrepresentation. A merchant who indorses the bills of another upon the faith of the guaranty of a third, cannot (upon the insolvency of the principal debtor and of the guaranty) resort to a trust fund created by the principal debtor for the indemnity of the guaranty for the amount which the guaranty should pay. But the person for whose benefit a trust is created, who is to be the ultimate receiver of money, may sustain a suit in equity to have it paid directly to himself. When the guaranty is insolvent, a court of equity will not decree the money (raised for his indemnity) to be paid to him without security that the debt to the principal creditor should be satisfied. This court will not make a final decree upon the merits of the case, unless all persons who are essentially interested are made parties to the suit, although some of those persons are not within the jurisdiction of the court.

Murray, in London, and indorsed by the complainant, Nathaniel Russell, upon the faith of two letters written to him by Clark & Nightingale, in the following words:

PROVIDENCE, 20th January, 1796.

"NATHANIEL RUSSELL, Esq., DEAR SIR,—Our friends, Messrs. Robert Murray & Co., merchants in New York, having determined to enter largely into the purchase of rice, and other articles of your produce in Charleston, but being entire strangers there, they have applied to us for letters of introductiou to our friend; in consequence of which we do ourselves the pleasure of introducing them to your correspondence as a house on whose integrity and punctuality the utmost dependence may be placed. They will write you the nature of their intentions, and you may be assured of their complying fully with any contract or engagements they may enter into with you. The friendship we have for these gentlemen, induces us to wish you will render them every service in your power; at the same time, we flatter ourselves the correspondence will prove a mutual beuefit.

We are, with sentiments of esteem,
Dear Sir,
Your most obedient servants,

70*] *PROVIDENCE, 21st January, 1796.

"NATHANIEL RUSSELL, Esq., DEAR SIR,—We wrote you yesterday a letter of recommendation in favor of Messrs. Robert Murray & Co. We have now to request that you will render them every assistance in your power. Also that you will, immediately on the receipt of this, vest the whole of what funds you have of ours in your hands in rice, on the best terms you can. If you are not in cash for the sales of the China and Nankins, perhaps you may be able to raise the money from the bank, until due; or purchase the rice upon a credit, till such time as you are to be in cash for them; the truth is, we expect rice will rise, and we want to improve the amount of what property we can muster in Charleston, vested in that article, at the current price; our Mr. Nightingale is now at Newport, where it is probable he will write you on the subject.

We are, dear sir,
Your most obedient servants,
CLARK & NIGHTINGALE."

The bill stated that in February, 1796, Jonathan Russell arrived in Charleston, from New York, bringing a letter of credit from the house of Joseph and William Russell, of Providence, with whom the complainant had only a slight acquaintance, but believed them to be in good credit.
